NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

NO. 1 OF VOL. IX.]

BALTIMORE, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 2, 1815.

[WHOLE NO. 299.]

Hac olim meminisse juvabit.—VIRGIL.

PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, NO. 29, SOUTH CALVERT-STREET, AT $5 PER ANNUM.

The editor has the pleasure to offer this first number of the 9th vol. printed on a beautiful new type of American manufacture. It is with pride we make the declaration; that the printing business of the United States is completely independent of the old world for its materials.

It may be well again to mention, that the SUPPLEMENT FOR THE EIGHTH VOLUME is nearly finished, and will be forwarded (to those who have ordered it) with the index for that volume, in about or less than two weeks. Those who wish it, will please to pay the editor's agents for it at the time they settle for the present year's REGISTER in advance. The supplement contains a very great mass of curious, entertaining and important things.

The present sheet will be found to have an unusual quantity of important matter. The grand drama in Europe has nearly closed; but some suppose it may again be opened with events as astonishing as any that have yet occurred. The details belonging to things past have latterly monopolized our pages so as to forbid the insertion of articles that we are more pleased to lay before our readers. If the REGISTER may lose some of its usefulness as a book of reference, by the calm of the world, the editor is satisfied he can render it much more interesting, to the generality of his subscribers, as a periodical paper: To do which, he has a very ample stock of original and selected matter. And, indeed, the task is also easier to make up half of the sheet with articles from manuscript, than to labor through the tens of thousands of reports and paragraphs of the newspapers, to keep up and preserve a chain of facts.

"The prospect before us."

It is so much the custom for editors of works like this, to make an occasional stop, and hold a little familiar chat with their patrons, that I might be supposed to want due respect for the numerous readers of the WEEKLY REGISTER, if I were to omit an observance of it.

The existing state of things, as well as the "prospect before us," is most happy for the American people. THE REPUBLIC, REPOSING ON THE LAURELS OF A GLORIOUS WAR, GATHERS THE RICH HARVEST OF AN HONORABLE PEACE. Every where the sound of the axe is heard opening the forest to the sun, and claiming for agriculture the range of the buffalo.—Our cities grow and towns rise up as by magic; commerce expands her proud sails in safety, and the "striped bunting" floats with majesty over every sea. The busy hum of ten thousand wheels fills our seaports, and the sound of the spindle and the loom succeeds the yell of the savage or screech of the night owl in the late wilderness of the interior. The lord of the soil, who recently deserted the plough to meet the enemies of his country on its threshold, and dispute the possession, has returned in quiet to his fields, exulting that the republic lives; and in honor! The hardy hunter, whose deadly rifle lately brought the foeman to the earth, has resumed his former life, and, in the trackless forest, employs the same weapon, with unerring aim, to stop the fleet deer in his course. Plenty crowns the works of peace with abundance, and scatters from her cornucopia all the good things of this life, with prodigal bounty. A high and honorable feeling generally prevails, and the people begin to assume, more and more, a NATIONAL CHARACTER; and to look at home for the only means, under Divine goodness, of preserving their religion and liberty—with all the blessings that flow from their unrestricted enjoyment. The 'bulwark' of these is in the sanctity of their principles, and the virtue and valor of those who profess to love them; and need no guarantee from the blood-stained and profligate princes and powers of Europe. Morality and good order ever prevails—canting hypocrisy has but few advocates, for the Great Architect of the universe is worshipped on the altar of men's hearts, in the way that each believes most acceptable to Him—undirected by the ministers of the "evil one," in the shape of inquisitors or government priests. The great body of the clergy of the United States are really "ambassadors of Christ," of moral lives and virtuous deportment; and the people, to whom they are amenable, liberally support them in these good dispositions. All sects unite, each in their own way, in love and unity, to seek the hidden treasure, and raise the grand anthem of "holiness to the Lord" when they find it in a conscience at ease. No man has a preference over another because he is supposed by the law to worship God more correctly than his neighbor. No man is compelled to contribute to the support of a sect that his own sense of reason does not approve. Every one is free to pursue what course he pleases in civil or religious matters, provided, only, he observes the rules laid down to preserve order and the moral law.

A practical proof of the advantages of these things was found in the god-like HUMANITY of the soldiers and seamen of the United States, in the late war. Determined to conquer, they seemed, in the strong metaphor of the late general Wayne, ready to pursue an enemy to the "gates of h—," but equally willing to risk every thing to preserve those who submitted, even though they had been associates of the tomahawk and scalping knife—villains that purchased the bloody trophy torn from the heads of women and children! When all have so well deserved a crown of glory for the practice of this heavenly quality, a notice of particular cases may appear invidious and unjust; but the forbearance of the gallant Kentuckians to the individuals of Proctor's army, who had recently been silent spectators, if not accomplices, in the massacre and burning to death of their fellow citizens at the river Raisin; and of the crew of the Hornet, who, hot from the fight, and with the shout of victory still on their lips, rushed into danger to rescue the crew of the Peacock from a watery grave, in doing which three of our noble fellows perished! nor was this all—for they stripped themselves to clothe the naked prisoners, who had not time to save any thing from the wreck—may merit the most distinguished regard.—Such things are the more resplendant from the opposite conduct of the British—whose general proceedings have been marked by an African insensibility to the sufferings of those who unhappily fall in their power. As one case, the generous, dying Lawrence, was refused a drop of his own wine to moisten his parched lips, and cheer the last struggles of expiring nature.*

Such are among the inestimable blessings that flow from a free constitution. May heaven, in mercy, to mankind, preserve it as an example, and take our beloved country into its charge as the permanent asylum for the oppressed of all nations—as a city of refuge where the weary may find repose; acknowledging no throne but that of the CREATOR of all things; yielding to no law not built upon the public will.

The progress of our country in population, wealth, and resources, is without parallel. The census of 1820 will give us not less than ten millions of people; of which a large and unexpected portion will be found westward of the Alleghanies, having emigrated from the east—with a tripled proportion of wealth and resources compared with what they were in 1810, the “calamities of the war,” notwithstanding. The great ease with which a livelihood is obtained in the republic, will continue a like increase of the first for many generations; and the others will go on with a geometrical ratio. And much assistance to each may be expected from war-worn Europeans, seeking a place of rest from oppression and chains. It is hardly possible to imagine with any degree of certainty, the value annually created by the recently applied industry of the people to MANUFACTURES, aided by the various labor-saving machinery adapted to large institutions or household establishments. We are friendly to the farmer to a given extent, but it is on the latter that we chiefly rely to accomplish a sublime independence of the new world. The one is liable to objections as to health, morals and intelligence [the soul of liberty] and may also be productive of a state of dependence, that the other is free from; and by means of the time of women and children, unprofitably lost six years since, now gives a value to the general stock of wealth of not less than 30 or 40 millions of dollars a year. This is a clear gain to the country—not to speak of the multitude of large manufacturing of cotton and wool spread over the United States.

I believe it may now be fairly calculated that the

*I give it as a deliberate opinion, that the British character, as exhibited by the officers of the army and navy, is more barbarous and cruel than that of any other people. See the WEEKLY REGISTER, in a thousand places, for the evidence on which this opinion is founded—see even the cases which accidentally, and in course, are stated in the present sheet, page 14. Are these wretches “the bulwark of our religion?” “Let me never see heaven,” said the Peruvian to the murdering Spaniards that desolated his country, and who were exhorting him to turn Christian, “if it be filled with such men!” And perish the religion, say I, that seeks protection in rivers of human blood, and heaps of human misery.

How magnificent and appropriate are the ideas that strike us from a consideration of the following words, with which the reverend doctor Ingles commenced his address to the throne of grace, on the happy occasion of laying the corner stone of a monument to be erected to the memory of Washington, in Baltimore:

“SOVEREIGN OF NATIONS, whose throne is the only throne before which our free republic bows herself; if we know our own hearts, it is our delight to do thee homage, as our monarch, our judge and our God!”

farmers of the United States, on an average, receive as much money for articles manufactured in their own houses, over and above what they require of them for their own wants, as they expend for others of a foreign product. This is a grand affair; and those who know some of the facts, will not esteem it unreasonable to say, that the stores in the city of Baltimore dispose of domestic goods to the value of a million per annum—the like general character and quality of which must have been looked for abroad eight or ten years ago. And so it is in other parts of the United States. It is true, we have latterly received vast quantities of foreign goods, so that perhaps, and probably, the whole revenue accruing in the year 1815, may amount to forty-five millions of dollars, the duties being doubled, as they are; but the country was completely exhausted of many things which the national industry, diverted by other objects, was yet incompetent to supply; and besides, with the progress of wealth, there is also a progressive demand made by luxury, far beyond the real wants or mere conveniences of a people.

A reduction and general modification of the existing duties, as well as a relinquishment of all the indirect taxes, is expected at the end of a year after the close of the war; but still, the national income will amply supply all its wants, and diminish the public debt as fast, perhaps, as true policy may require; for the national securities present us with a medium of commerce as well foreign as domestic, that, it is possible, might be too suddenly withdrawn. That is, supposing we shall have peace, of which there is the happiest prospect, in the late news received of a commercial treaty being signed with England, the nation most likely to involve us in war. But the demand for foreign manufactures will be small compared with what it would have been, if the orders and decrees of the late belligerents had not driven us into the idea of being independent of them. It is not less easy to abandon habits that do “very well,”* than adopt others with the prospect of doing so. A general spirit for manufacturing was got up with great difficulty, and cannot now be laid aside without immense exertion and sacrifice. The money that has been invested in our various branches of manufacture, including the rearing of sheep and cultivation of the cane to make sugar, within the last 8 or 10 years, and now employed in them, far exceeds that occupied by foreign trade. And happily it is so; for if the weight of the power of the “legitimates” of Europe shall settle the people down into the calm of despotism, and a general peace lasts for five years, the shipping interest of the United States, now or recently engaged in trading with that part of the world and its colonies, will suffer a diminution of 40 or 50 per cent. and the demand for some of our most valuable and bulky staple articles of agriculture will be exceedingly reduced. The fact is, we had a great deal more of the commerce of the world than our share, as they who would have sold every honorable feeling to England for a miserable part of it, will soon ascertain. But this is of little consequence to the bulk of the people; who would rather have peace and quietness than Boston memorials, insurrection resolutions, or Hartford conventions.

In the general prosperity, we behold the downfall of that faction which would have made a common interest with the British, during the late war—a faction that, for the profligacy of its proceedings, all things considered, stands without precedent—a faction that would have raised itself to power on the broken fasciæ of the union! It falls as its country rises—the stability of the republic is arsenic to its hopes and wishes. Miserable, in the honorable result of the war; miserable, that Great Britain did not reduce us to "unconditional submission"—miserable, that Mr. Madison was not "deposed" by a foreign force; miserable, that they are despised by the people they would have given soul and body to serve; miserable, that they are laughed at by all who consider them too contemptible for serious rebuke—they drink the very dregs of the cup of mortification, but alter their ways with bitterness and cursings. These men had no pride in the name of an American,* and it may be right to treat them as aliens when we speak of the affairs of the republic. But, if they must be considered as of our people, we have the satisfaction to say that they are a small and the only portion of the population whose heart does not leap with gratitude to heaven for its munificence to the UNITED STATES.

While thus the republic prospers in plenty and peace, with the exception of some shreds of the war yet existing with the late British allies, the savage murderers of the frontier west—a guarantee for whose good conduct will speedily be found in punishment received, if they do not cease their depredations, and all the departments of government go on with vigorous harmony; a part of the power of the nation is exerted to chastise Algiers. Unawed by the humiliation of the neighboring government of Tripoli, that of Algiers, following the lead of its patron, began to capture our ships and impress our seamen, for his déshonneur "wanted men." But no sooner was the affair with the principal settled, than preparations were made to open a new theatre of glory for our tars, and carry the "bit of striped bunting" in triumph over the African seas. With eagle-rapidity they have pounced upon the man-stealing barbarian, and, in a measure, already annihilated his marine, with an inferior force, and threatened his capital! Oh! that it may fall to the lot of this youthful republic to have the high honor of reducing this nest of pirates, so long the pest of the christian world, to an observance of the rights of peace and war; and make the civilized nations of Europe blush for that vile jealousy, wicked policy, and dirty calculation of interest which induced them to permit or endure such depredators. What men can do will be done by our forces in the Mediterranean—they who prostrated the bloody cross will bring down the pale crescent—the eagle on the ocean will not desert the pine tree's top that was his nesting place in the forest.

Let us then, fellow citizens, cherish our republican institutions, and hold up as "objects for scorn to point her slow unmoving finger at" any one that would jeopardize them, or bring them into disrepute. We have a strong monarchical party amongst us, whose principle is imported from England, that must be carefully watched. Let us recollect the saying of the sage who declared, that he who gives up essential liberty to purchase temporary safety, deserves neither liberty nor safety; and, always acting up to it, fix the disposition in our mind as a part of our existence, that these United States are, of God and by our right, free, sovereign and independent; and, in this persuasion, also feel a determination to obey the injunction of Washington, "and frown indignantly on the first drawing of an attempt to alienate one portion of our country from the rest, or to enfeeble the sacred ties that now link together the various parts."

Money Statistics.

The following calculations will shew the relative plenty, or scarcity, of money in Baltimore and Boston—on which every one may reason for himself. The 1st column is the name of the bank—the 2nd the sum paid in on each share—the 3d the selling price, and the 4th the advance per cent.

Bank of Maryland	$300	$350	$20
— Baltimore	300	350	16 66
Union Bank (half shares)	50	63	26

Massachusetts Bank 1 a 1½ above par	—1 25
New-England Bank* 2 a 3	2 50—3 75

Six banks—6)19 25

Average depreciation per cent. $3 20

This account of the selling prices of the several stocks mentioned, is taken from the public prices current of the two places, and may be accepted as sufficiently accurate.

We have the following result—

The average advance of the } Baltimore bank stock is }	$28 19 per cent.
The average depreciation of } the Boston bank stock is }	3 20

These added together, shew that $100 of bank stock is worth $31 39 more in Baltimore than it is in Boston.

But the Bostonians will say that money there is at par with specie, and that ours is not. We admit it is so at present, but will not probably remain so. However, specie, at present, obtains a premium of from 12 to 14 per cent at Baltimore. Take even all that at the most unfair method it can be calculated, and still $100 of bank stock in Baltimore is worth $18 39 more than it is in Boston.

Nominal superior value per cent. of the.

Baltimore stocks	$31 39
Deduct premium for specie—(medium)	13

$18 39

Now, this clearly shews that the Baltimore banks are "bankrupts," as the Boston folks very liberally and kindly have said they were; and also proves—THAT THE PEOPLE THINK SO!! Mirabile dictu!

Very correct ideas of the prevailing circulation of money in the two places, may be gathered from a consideration of these facts.

*The real advance of the N. England Bank shares per cent is not stated. The price current says they are at 6½ a 6¾ per share advance. The above is, therefore, merely supposition, but, perhaps nearly correct.

British Parliament.

HOUSE OF LORDS—JULY 12.

A few minutes after 12 o'clock his royal highness the prince regent, attended by the royal suite, entered the house, and being seated on the throne, in his royal robes, sir Thomas Tyrwhitt, knight, gentleman usher of the black rod, was despatched to order the attendance of the commons, who forthwith, to a great number, with the speaker at their head, appeared at the bar.

The prince regent then delivered the following speech from the throne:—

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I cannot close this session of parliament without again expressing my deep regret at the continuance of his majesty's lamented indisposition.

"At the commencement of the present session, I entertained a confident hope, that the peace which I had concluded, in conjunction with his majesty's allies, would meet with no interruption; that, after so many years of continued warfare and unexampled calmity, the nations of Europe would be allowed to enjoy that repose for which they had been so long contending; and that your efforts might be directed to alleviate the burthens of his majesty's people, and to adopt such measures as might best promote the internal prosperity of his dominions.

"These expectations were disappointed by an act of violence and perfidy, of which no parallel can be found in history.

"The usurpation of the supreme authority in France by Bonaparte, in consequence of the defection of the French armies from their legitimate sovereign, appeared to me to be so incompatible with the general security of other countries, as well as with the engagements to which the French nation had recently been a party, that I felt I had no alternative but to employ the military resources of his majesty's dominions, in conjunction with his majesty's allies, to prevent the re-establishment of a system which experience has proved to be the source of such incalculable woes to Europe.

"Under such circumstances you will have seen with just pride and satisfaction, the splendid success with which it has pleased Divine Providence to bless his majesty's arms and those of his allies.

"Whilst the glorious and ever-memorable battle, obtained at Waterloo, by field-marsals the duke of Wellington and prince Blucher, has added fresh lustre to the characters of those great commanders, and has exalted the military reputation of this country beyond all former example, it has at the same time produced the most decisive effects on the operations of the war, by delivering from invasion the dominions of the king of the Netherlands, and by placing, in the short space of fifteen days, the city of Paris, and a large part of the kingdom of France, in the military occupation of the allied armies.

"Amidst events so important, I am confident you will see how necessary it is, that there should be no relaxation in our exertions, until I shall be enabled, in conjunction with his majesty's allies, to complete those arrangements which may afford the prospect of permanent peace and security to Europe.

"Gentlemen of the house of commons,

"I thank you for the very liberal provision you have made for the services of the present year.

"I deeply lament the continuance and increase of those burthens which the great military exertions of the present campaign, combined with the heavy arrears remaining due for the expences of the former war, have rendered indispensable, and which his majesty's loyal subjects, from a conviction of their necessity, have sustained with such exemplary fortitude and cheerfulness.

"You have already seen, however, the fruit of the exertions which have been made; and there can be no doubt that the best economy will be found to result from that policy which may enable us to bring the contest to the most speedy termination.

"My lords and gentlemen,

The brilliant and rapid success of the Austrian arms at the opening of the campaign, has led to the restoration of the kingdom of Naples to its ancient sovereign, and to the deliverance of that important portion of Italy from foreign influence and dominion.

"I have further the satisfaction of acquainting you, that the authority of his most Christian majesty has been again acknowledged in his capital, to which his majesty has himself repaired.

"The restoration of peace between this country and the United States of America has been followed by a negotiation for the commercial treaty, which I have every reason to hope will be terminated upon conditions calculated to cement the good understanding subsisting between the two countries, and equally beneficial to the interests of both.

"I have great pleasure in acquainting you, that the labors of the congress at Vienna, had been brought to a conclusion by the signature of a treaty, which, as the ratifications have not yet been exchanged, could not be communicated to you, but yet I expect to be enabled to lay before you when I next meet you in parliament.

"I cannot release you from your attendance without assuring you, that it is in a great degree to the support which you have afforded me, that I ascribe the success of my earnest endeavors for the public welfare; and on no occasion has that support been more important than in the course of the present session.

"In the further prosecution of such measures as may be necessary to bring the great contest in which we are engaged to an honorable and satisfactory conclusion, I shall rely with confidence on the experienced zeal and steady loyalty of all classes of his majesty's subjects; and they may depend on my efforts to improve our present advantages in such manner as may best provide for the general tranquility of Europe, and maintain the high character which this country enjoys amongst the nations of the world."

At the conclusion of the royal speech, the lord chancellor having approached the throne, and received the prince regent's commands for the purpose, came forward, and addressed both houses as follows:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"It is the will and pleasure of his royal highness the prince regent, acting in the name and on the behalf of his majesty, that this parliament be prorogued to Tuesday the twenty-second day of August next, to be then there holden: and this parliament is accordingly prorogued to Tuesday the 22d day of August next."

PROCLAMATION OF LOUIS XVIII.

LOUIS, by the grace of God, king of France and Navarre, to all our faithful subjects, health:

At the time when the most cruel of enterprizes, seconded by the most inconceivable defection, compelled us to quit momentarily our kingdom, we informed you of the dangers which threatened you, unless you hastened to shake off the yoke of a tyrannical usurper. We were not willing to unite our arms, nor those of our family, to the instruments which Providence has employed to punish treason. But now that the powerful efforts of our allies have dissipated the satellites of the tyrant, we hasten to re-enter our states, there to re-establish the constitution which we have given to France, to repair by all means in our power the evils of revolt, and of the war, its necessary consequence; to reward the good, to put in execution the existing laws against the guilty; in short, to call round our paternal throne the immense majority of Frenchmen, whose fidelity, courage and devotedness have brought such pleasing consolations to our heart.

Given at Chateau Cambresis, 26th of June, in the year of grace 1815, and our reign the 29th.

LOUIS.

PARIS, JULY 5. Proclamation of the Commission of government to the French:

Frenchmen.—In the difficult circumstances in which the reins of the state were confided to us, it was not in our power to govern the course of events and to remove all dangers; but it was our duty to defend the interests of the people and of the army, alike endangered in the cause of a man abandoned by fortune, justice and the national will.

It was our duty to preserve to the country, the precious remains of those brave legions whose courage is superior to reverses, and who have been victims of a devotion which the country now claims.

It was our duty to save the capital from the horrors of a siege, or the chances of a battle; to maintain public tranquility in the midst of the tumult and agitations of war; to sustain the hopes of the friends of liberty, amidst the fears and inquietudes of a suspicious vigilance; it was our duty above all to avoid the useless effusion of blood.

It was necessary to choose between securing the national existence, or running the risk of exposing the country and the citizens to a general destruction, which would leave neither hope nor security.

None of the means of defence that time and our resources permitted, nothing that the service of the camps and of the city required, was neglected.

Whilst the pacification of the west was concluding, plenipotentiaries went to meet the allied powers, and all the documents of that negotiation have been laid before your representatives.

The fate of the capital is determined by a convention. Its inhabitants, whose firmness, courage and perseverance are above all praise; its inhabitants continue to guard it.

The declarations of the sovereigns of Europe inspire too much confidence to fear that our liberties and our dearest interests can be sacrificed to victory.

We will receive at length the guarantees which are to prevent those alternate and temporary triumphs of the factions that have agitated us for 25 years, which are to terminate the revolution, and mingle under a common protection the parties to which it has given birth, and those who have opposed it.

Those guarantees, which hitherto have existed only in our principles and in our courage, we shall find in our laws, in our constitution, in our representative system.

For whatever may be the knowledge, the virtues, the personal qualities of a monarch, they are never sufficient to secure the people from the oppression of power, from the prejudices, the pride, the injustice of courts, and the ambition of courtiers.

Frenchmen, peace is necessary to your commerce, to your arts, to the amelioration of your manners, to the development of the resources that remain to you.

Be united, and you are near to the close of your misfortunes.

The repose of Europe is inseparable from yours; Europe is interested in your tranquility and in your happiness.

The Duke of OTRANTO.

Declaration of the house of representatives, July 5.

The troops of the allied powers come to occupy the capital; the house of representatives will nevertheless continue to sit and to deliberate in the midst of the inhabitants of Paris, where the express will of the people has called their delegates.

But, under these weighty circumstances, the house of representatives owes to itself, to France, to Europe, a declaration of its sentiments and of its principles; it declares, therefore, that it makes especially a solemn appeal to the fidelity and to the patriotism of the Parisian national guard, entrusted with the care of the place where the representatives of the nation are assembled.

It declares that it reposes with the highest confidence upon the principles of morality, of honor, of magnanimity, of the allied powers, and upon their respect for the independence of the nation, so strongly manifested in their declarations.

It declares that the government of France, whoever may be at the head of it, ought, at the same time, to be conformable to the wish of the nation legally expressed, and to co-operate with the other governments, to form a mutual connection and guarantee of peace between France and Europe—It declares that a monarch cannot offer a real guarantee, unless he swear to observe a constitution framed by the national representation, and accepted by the people.

Thus, any government which should not have any other title than the acclamations of the minority and the will of a party; or which should be imposed by force; any government which should not adopt the national colors, and should not guarantee the liberty of the citizens, the equality of civil and political rights, the liberty of the press, the liberty of religious worship, the representative system, the free consent to the raising of men and taxes, the responsibility of ministers, the irrevocability of all sales of national property, the inviolability of property, the abolition of tithes, of feudal rights, of the old and new hereditary nobility, and of all confiscations of property; the complete oblivion of the political opinions and votes given in the course of the revolution, the institution of the legion, the distinctions and rewards due to the officers and soldiers, to their widows and to their children; the institution of the jury, the irremovability of judges, the payment of the public debt—would have only an ephemeral existence, and would not secure the tranquility of Europe.

It declares that if the basis specified in this declaration should be either not recognized or violated, the representatives of the people, who this day exercise a sacred power, protest before hand, in the face of the whole world, against the violence and usurpation.

They confide the execution of the contents of this proclamation, to all good Frenchmen, to all generous hearts, to all enlightened minds, to all men jealous of their liberty, and finally to future generations.

Adopted by 443 votes against 24.

CHAMBER OF PEERS—JULY 7.

At half past 5 o'clock the following message was received:

Mr. President—Hitherto we believed that the intentions of the allied sovereigns were not unanimous upon the choice of the prince who is to reign in France. Our plenipotentiaries gave us the same assurance upon their return.

However the ministers and generals of the allied powers have declared yesterday in the conferences they have had with the president of the commission, that all the sovereigns had engaged to replace Louis the 18th upon the throne, and that he is to make this evening or to-morrow his entrance into the capital.

Foreign troops have just occupied the Thuilleries, where the government is sitting.

In this state of affairs, we can only breathe wishes for the country, and our deliberations being no longer free, we think it our duty to separate.

Marshal prince of Essling and the prefect of the Seine, have been charged to watch over the maintenance of public order, safety and tranquillity.

I have the honor, &c.

After reading the message, the members rose spontaneously, and retired without any deliberation.

CHAMBER OF REPRESENTATIVES—JULY 7.

A message was received from government.—[See the peers.]

After it was read, there was a moment of silence and the members seemed to consult together.

M. Maucel—Gentlemen, you foresaw this event, but it ought not to occasion any change in your conduct. In some moments, perhaps, we shall be obliged to separate. Let us shew we are worthy of the confidence of our constituents—let us remain firm at our posts, and leave to other hands the odious task of dispersing the national representation. These expressions once electrified France and Europe. Let us repeat them a second time—“Say we are representatives of the people, and that we will not quit this place, but by the force of the bayonet.”

Bravo, bravo! yes, yes! from all parts of the assembly and the tribunes.

It was moved that M. Manuel's proposal be put to vote. This motion was not supported.

The members dispersed; but the president announced that the sitting adjourned until to-morrow at eight o'clock.

London Gazette Extraordinary, Friday July 7.

Downing Street, July 7.

Captain Lord Arthur Hill arrived last night with despatches, of which the following are extracts, and a copy addressed to Earl Bathurst by the duke of Wellington, dated Gonasse the 2d and 4th, 1815.

GONASSE, July 2d, 1815.

The enemy attacked the advanced guard of marshal prince Blucher's corps at Villars Coterets, on the 28th, but the main body coming up they were driven off, with the loss of 6 pieces of cannon, and about 1000 prisoners. It appears that these troops were on their march from Soissons to Paris and having been driven off that road by the Prussian troops at Villars Coterets, they got upon that of Meaux.—They were attacked again upon this road by general Bulow, who took from them 500 prisoners, and drove them across the Marne. They have, however, got into Paris. The advanced guard of the allied army under my command crossed the Oise, on the 28th, and the whole on the 30th, and we yesterday took up a position with the right upon the height of Rochebourg, and the left upon the Bois de Bondy. Field marshal prince Blucher having taken the village of Aubervilliers, of Vertus, on the morning of the 30th of June, moved to his right; and crossed the Seine at St. Germain as I advanced, and he will this day have his right at Plesis Pique, his left at St Cloud, and the reserve at Versailles. The enemy have fortified the heights of Montmartre and the town of St. Dennis strongly; and by means of the little rivers Rouillon and La Vielle Mer, they have inundated the ground on the north side of the town, and water having been introduced into the canal de l'Oureq, and the bank formed into a parapet and batteries, they have a strong position on this side of Paris. The heights of Belleville are likewise strongly fortified, but I am not aware that any defensive works have been thrown up on the left of the Seine.

Having collected in Paris all the troops remaining after the battle on the 18th, and all the depots of the whole army, it is supposed the enemy have there about 40 or 50,000 troops of the line and guards, besides the national guards, a new levy called Les Tirailleurs de la Garde and the Federes. I have great pleasure in informing your lordship that Quesnoy surrendered to his royal highness prince Frederick of the Netherlands on the 29th June. I enclose the copy of his royal highness' report upon this subject, in which your lordship will observe with satisfaction the intelligence and spirit with which this young prince conducted this affair. I likewise understand that Baffaume has surrendered to the officer sent there by the king of France to take possession of that town.

“On the day before yesterday I had the honor of receiving your grace's letter dated Juncourt, 28th inst. sent by your aid-de-camp, captain Cathcart, whom I have requested to inform your excellency that marshal count Rothallier had arrived this morning to summon the place in the name of Louis XVIII. He entered into a negotiation with lieutenant general Delpreaux, governor of Quesnoy. The only result however, produced by this, was a very singular reply from the governor, from which it appeared to me that he might possibly be induced to capitulate, and I determined at once on firing some shells and shot into the town, and of advancing our trail-leurs to the very glacis to annoy them in every quarter, with a view of making some impression on the commandant, and of endeavoring by that means to excite to revolt the national guards and inhabitants, who are said to be well disposed towards us.

“From the information collected as to the fortifications, there appears to me no reasonable chance of taking it by escalade, the ditches being filled with water, in addition to the inundation which had been made. At 11 o'clock at night, I ordered five howitzers and 6 six pounders to open on the town, and I continued the fire until 3 o'clock in the morning. The town was at one time on fire in three places, but the fire was shortly extinguished. Some men were killed in the town and several wounded, which appears to have produced exactly the effect which I wished. Last night, general Anthing, who commands the Indian brigade, sent an officer with the proposals to the commandant, according to the authority which I had given to him and coupled with a threat of bombardment and assault.

“Upon this a negotiation was entered into, which ended in the signing of the following capitulation, this night; that is to say: that he would send an officer, with an aid-de-camp of general Anthing, to Cambrai, to ascertain the fact of the residence of the king of France in that town, and the abdication of Bonaparte in favor of his son, and that, thereupon, he would give us this night (at 6 o'clock) possession of the port des Forets, to be occupied by a company of artillery, and that the next morning the garrison should march out of the town; the national guards to lay down their arms and return to their homes; the commander and that part of the garrison who were not national guards, were to go and receive the orders of Louis the XVIII. in whose name we shall have possession of the town."

GONASSE, July 4, 1815.

MY LORD.—Field marshal prince Blucher was strongly opposed by the enemy in taking the position on the left of the Seine, which I reported in my despatch of the 2d inst. that he intended to take upon that day, particularly on the heights of St. Cloud and Mendon; but the gallantry of the Prussian troops, under general Ziethen, surmounted every obstacle, and they succeeded finally in establishing themselves on the heights of Mendon, and in the village of Issy. The French attacked them again in Issy at 3 o'clock on the morning of the 3d, but were repulsed with considerable loss; and finding that Paris was then open on its vulnerable side, that a communication was opened between the two allied armies by a bridge which I had established at Argenteuil, and that a British corps was likewise moving upon the left of the Seine towards the Pont de Neuilly, the enemy sent to desire that the firing might cease on both sides of the Seine, with a view to the negotiation at the Palace of St. Cloud, of a military convention between the armies, under which the French army should evacuate Paris. Officers accordingly met on both sides at St. Cloud; and I enclose the copy of the military convention which was agreed to last night, and which had been ratified by marshal prince Blucher and me, and by the prince d'Eckmuhl on the part of the French army. This convention decides all the military questions at this moment existing here, and touches nothing political.—General lord Hill has marched to take possession of the posts evacuated by agreement this day, and I propose to-morrow to take possession of Montmartre. I send this despatch by my aid-de-camp, captain lord Arthur Hill, by way of Calais. He will be able to inform your lordship of any further particulars, and I beg leave to recommend him to your favor and protection.

WELLINGTON.

This day the 3d of July, 1815, the commissioners named by the commanders in chief of the respective armies, that is to say, the baron Bignon, holding the porte feuille of foreign affairs; the count Guilleminot, chief of the general staff of the French army; the count de Bondy, prefect of the department of the Seine, being furnished with the full powers of his excellency the marshal prince of Eckmuhl, commander in chief of the French army on one side, and major general baron Muffling, furnished with the full powers of his highness the field marshal Blucher, commander in chief of the Prussian army;—colonel Hervey, furnished with the full powers of his excellency the duke of Wellington, commander in chief of the English army, on the other side, have agreed to the following articles:

Art. I. There shall be a suspension of arms between the allied armies commanded by his highness the prince Blucher, and his excellency the duke of Wellington, and the French army under the walls of Paris.

Art. II. The French army shall put itself in march to-morrow, to take up its position behind the Loire. Paris shall be completely evacuated in three days; and the movement behind the Loire shall be effected within eight days.

Art. III. The French army shall take with it all its material, field artillery, military chest, horses, and property of regiments, without exception. All persons belonging to the depots shall also be removed, as well as those belonging to the different branches of administration, which belonged to the army.

Art. IV. The sick and wounded, and the medical officers whom it may be necessary to leave with them, are placed under the special protection of the commanders in chief of the English and Prussian armies.

Art. V. The military, and those holding employments to whom the foregoing article relates, shall be at liberty, immediately after their recovery to join the corps to which they belong.

Art. VI. The wives and children of all individuals belonging to the French army, shall be at liberty to remain in Paris. The wives shall be allowed to quit Paris for the purpose of rejoining the army, and to carry with them their property, and that of their husbands.

Art. VII. The officers of the line, employed with the Fedres, or with the travailleurs of the national guard, may either join the army or return to their homes or the place of their birth.

Art. VIII. To-morrow, the 4th of July, at mid-day, St. Dennis, St. Ouen, Cluichy, and Neuilly, shall be given up. The day after to-morrow, the 5th, at the same hour, Montmartre shall be given up. The 3d day, the 6th, all the barriers shall be given up.

Art. IX. The duty of the city of Paris shall continue to be done by the national guard, and by the corps of the municipal gens d'armes.

Art. X. The commanders in chief of the English and Prussian armies engage to respect, and to induce those under their command respect, the actual authorities so long as they shall exist.

Art. XI. Public property, with the exception of that which relates to war, whether it belongs to the government, or depends upon the municipal authority, shall be respected, and the allied powers will not interfere in any manner with its administration and management.

Art. XII. Private persons and property shall be equally respected. The inhabitants and in general all individuals who shall be in the capital, shall continue to enjoy their rights and liberties without being disturbed or called to account either as to the situation which they hold or may have held; or as to their conduct, or political opinions.

Art. XIII. The foreign troops shall not interpose any obstacle for the provisioning of the capital, and will protect, on the contrary, the arrival and the free circulation of the articles which are destined for it.

Art. XIV. The present convention shall be observed, and shall serve to regulate the mutual relations until the conclusion of peace. In case of rupture it must be announced in the usual forms at least ten days beforehand.

Art. XV. If difficulties arise in the execution of any one of the articles of the present convention, the interpretation shall be made in favor of the French army and of the city of Paris.

Art. XVI. The present convention is declared common to all the allied armies, provided it be ratified by the powers, on which these armies are dependent.

Art. XVII. The ratification shall be exchanged.

to-morrow, the 4th of July, at six o'clock in the morning, at the bridge of Neuilly.

Art. XVIII. Commissioners shall be named by the respective parties, in order to watch over the execution of the present convention.

Done and signed at St. Cloud, in triplicate, by the commissioners above named, the day and year before mentioned.

(Signed) The Baron RIGNON,
Count GULLEMINOT,
Count De BONDY,
The Baron De MUFFLING,
F. B. HERVEY, Colonel.

Approved and ratified the present suspension of arms, at Paris, the 3d of July, 1815.

WAR DEPARTMENT.

Downing-Street, July 11.

A despatch of which the following is a copy, was this day received from field marshal the duke of Wellington, K. G. addressed to earl Bathurst.

Paris, July 8th, 1815.

MR LORD.—In consequence of the convention with the enemy, of which I transmitted your lordship a copy, to my despatch of the 4th, the troops under my command and that of field marshal prince Blücher, occupied the barriers of Paris on the 6th, and entered the city yesterday, which has ever since been perfectly quiet.

The king of France entered Paris this day.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WELLINGTON.

From the London Gazette of July 8.

War Department—Downing-Street, July 6.

Despatches, of which the following are copies, have been this day received by earl Bathurst, from field marshal his grace the duke of Wellington, dated Louvres, 30th June, and Gonasse, 2d July.

Louvres June 20.

MR LORD.—I have now the honor of enclosing to your lordship, the returns of killed and wounded of the army on the 16th, 17th, and 18th; lists of officers, &c.

Brigadier general Hardinge, who was employed by me with the Prussian army, is not included in these returns; but he received a severe wound in the battle of the 16th, and has lost his left hand.—He had conducted himself during the time he was so employed in such a manner as to obtain the approbation of marshal prince Blücher, and the officers at the Prussian headquarters, as well as mine, and I greatly regret his misfortune.

I have the honor to be, &c.

(Signed) WELLINGTON.

[Captain Newton Chambers, 1st foot guards, aide-camp to sir T. Picton, was omitted in the return of officers killed; and lord F. Somerset severely wounded—right arm amputated.]

British killed, wounded, and missing, in the battles of the 16th, 17th, and 18th of June.

Officers killed 108; non-commissioned 192; rank and file 1549; officers wounded 436; non-commissioned 383; rank and file 5123; officers missing 12; non-commissioned 17; rank and file 778—Grand total 8458.

PROCLAMATION OF THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON.

On entering the French territory, the duke of Wellington issued the following proclamation:

"I announce to the French, that I enter their territory at the head of an army already victorious, not as an enemy (except of the usurper of the enemy of the human race, with whom there can neither be peace nor truce) but to aid them to shake off the iron yoke by which they are oppressed. I therefore give to my army the subjoined orders, and I desire that every one who violates them may be made known to me.—

The French know, however, that I have a right to require that they conduct themselves in such a manner that I may be able to protect them against those who would seek to do them evil. They must, therefore, furnish the requisitions that will be made on them, by a person authorized to make them, taking receipts in due form and order. They must remain quietly at their homes, and have no communication with the usurper or his adherents. All those who shall absent themselves from their homes, after the entrance of the army into France, and all those who shall be absent in the service of the usurper, shall be considered as enemies, and his adherents, and their property shall be appropriated to the subsistence of the army.

“WELLINGTON.

Extract of the order of the day, June 20.

“As the army is going to enter the French territory, the troops of different nations now under the command of field marshal duke of Wellington, are desired to remember that their respective sovereigns are the allies of his majesty the king of France, and that France therefore be considered as a friendly country. It is ordered, that nothing be taken either by the officers or soldiers without payment. The commissaries of the army will provide for the wants of the troops in the usual manner; and it is not permitted to the officers or soldiers of the army to make requisitions. The commissaries will be authorized by the field marshal, or by the generals, who command the troops of the respective nations (that is to say, in case their provisions are not regulated by an English commissary) to make the necessary requisitions for which they will give regular receipts; and they must perfectly understand that they will be responsible for all they receive by requisitions from the inhabitants of France, in the same manner as if they made purchases for the account of their government. “Acting Adj. General.”

THE LATEST.

Paris dates to the 28th July, received at New-York.

Napoleon Bonaparte, finding no chance of escape, gave himself up to the captain of a British 74, on 15th July. The London papers are full of speculations of what shall be done with him. Some are for sending him to Dumbarton Castle, in Scotland, a very strong place; others for shutting him up in the tower of London—and some for imprisoning him at Sheerness or in Newgate. The Paris papers suggest the idea of sending him to the island of St. Helena; or hint that his death might be useful. What his fate will be it is impossible to conjecture. If the accounts of his conduct before he delivered himself up be true, he exhibited a greater degree of indecision and want of fortitude than we supposed him capable of. The details at length are below.

The Prussians are treating France with great severity. They levied a contribution of fifty millions on the city of Paris, and demanded the payment of thirty millions of it in three days! Their troops have become so exceedingly licentious, that the emperor Alexander and lord Wellington had declared that unless they desisted from their depredations they would withdraw their armies from France, and leave them to the vengeance of the enraged populace. Whether this declaration had the desired effect, was not known at our latest dates.

The emperors of Russia and Austria and kings of Prussia and France, are daily entertaining each other in great style at Paris.

France appears generally to have hoisted the white flag. Several of the generals have sent in their adhesion to Louis. Lyons capitulated on the 12th of July, and the allied troops entered on the 18th. Valenciennes held out, and was suffering a terrible bombardment; several of the streets were said to be in ruins. Cardinal Fesch was taken from Paris by a body of Austrian cavalry—destination not mentioned. The fortress of Belfort, in Alsace, has been carried by the Austrian troops, after five assaults, which cost much blood on both sides. It is said that the allied sovereigns will not quit Paris until after having witnessed the coronation of the king at Rheims.

Soult has been arrested by the national guards at Mendes. Davoust seems to have left the army beyond the Loire, and returned to Paris. It is stated that Macdonald was to have the command of it. Desertions are very numerous from it. The duchess of Angoulême arrived in Paris on the 27th of July, and was received with great shouts by the people! On the 12th of July a mob attempted to haul down the tri-colored flag at Bordeaux; the soldiers fired upon them and dispersed them. But Clausel has sent in his adhesion, and the white-flag has been hoisted, with magnificent rejoicings.

The letter of Davoust, prince of Eckmühl, late minister of war, as is well observed by the Gazette de France, contains some mysterious expressions. What will be the fate of France is yet, in our opinion, somewhat uncertain. The power of the foreigners who invaded it may, for a time, press down the spirit of the people, but it is impossible they should forget that their king was imposed upon them by foreigners. And there is a high republican spirit in France. They have got so used to revolutions that Louis will sit uneasily on his throne, unless supported by hordes of foreign mercenaries near his person.

The Prussians have destroyed the bridge of Austerlitz, the trees of the garden of Luxenberg, and the garden of plants, at Paris.

The army of observation at Mount Jura, the army of the Loire, and in short the troops of every description through France, have conformed to the new order of things, but after more fighting than was supposed. In a proclamation from general Lecourbe to his army at Belfort, the 23d July, he says "ten combats fought or sustained from the gates of Huningue till the walls of Belfort, have proved to the enemy that this portion of the army of Jura have preserved the bravery and honor of Frenchmen." He then recommends obedience to the new government.

Strasburg refused to open its gates to the foreigners, but immediately sent in its submission to Louis.

Of the French legislative body.—A London paper of July 11, says—"The expiring factions in the French legislative body, after debating and wrangling to the last moment, have all dispersed and the leaders fled, some across the Loire with the army; and others to different ports to embark. A Paris paper of the 8th says, at six o'clock, yesterday, general Dessolles, commander of the national guard sent a body of men and closed the chambers of the peers and representatives.

The grand staff of the allied armies in and near Paris, with Wellington at the head, about 300 in number, paid a visit to the king of France in his palace on the 16th July, and were all presented to him. He made a personal acknowledgment to the duke for his humanity and the good conduct of his army towards the French people.

The prince of Orange, by proclamation has declared the annexation of Belgium to Holland, agreeably to the treaty made at London by the allied powers in the month of June 1814. He now takes the title of king of Netherlands, prince of Orange, Nassau, grand duke of Luxembourg, &c.

A letter from Bordeaux, of the 28th of July, contains the following:

"The allied powers must and will be paid for the trouble and expense incurred. 20,000 men, it is said, will remain in France for some time, until a new army can be re-organized on different principles."

A new declaration of the allied powers is expected to appear immediately.

The accounts from England affirm, that permanent garrisons of foreign troops are to be kept in the principal fortress of France: 12,000 troops have proceeded to reinforce the English army in the vicinity of Paris—a clear proof that Louis, 18, is the desired of the French people!

The duke of Otranto, who proved treacherous to Bonaparte, is said to have accepted an office temporarily under Louis, on condition that the king should observe the moderate course he has promised, and of which he (Fouche) set an example in his own conduct.

The French official papers, in 5 sheets, contain the acts of the congress of Vienna for dividing Europe. A summary of them may be received and shall be inserted.

Wellington has been created prince of Waterloo, by the king of the Netherlands, who has also conferred upon him the estate of La Belle Alliance.

In an eloquent letter from Fouche to Louis XVIII, he conjures him "to believe that the French people attach, at present, as much importance to their liberty as to their lives," &c. and urges him to make concessions before they be extorted from him by calamitous events.

The Austrian army, under the prince of Schwarzenburg, had arrived at Fontainebleau, after much hard fighting with the French garrisons.

The royal chamber of deputies was dissolved the 14th July, and a new election was to take place on the 14th and 22d August. A new house of peers is to be formed.

The island of Elba has been given back in sovereignty to the grand duke of Tuscany.

His Sicilian majesty (king Ferdinand IV.) entered Naples, his capital, on the 17th June, after an absence of nine years.

A Paris paper, of the 17th July, has the following curious article. It is proper to remark, on account of the allusion to the violet, that that color was the secret badge of the adherents of Napoleon Bonaparte, during his absence at Elba; the leaders of which had formed themselves into a secret association, having certain words by which to know each other. &c.

"Yesterday we remarked in the public promenades, a number of persons, always walking, three or four together, and wearing in the button-holes of their coat a red pink. Many citizens, perhaps too readily alarmed, have conceived this pink to be the successor of the violet, and a rallying sign. Some quarrels took place; the most serious, of which we were eye-witnesses, occurred on the boulevard of the Temple. Several of the king's guards, right or wrong, took offence at some words uttered among a groupe of individuals, all of whom wore the red pink. Acts succeeded to words, and the crowd and the tumult equally augmented. Some seditious cries were heard, but the disappearance of the principal actors in the affray terminated a scandalous scene, which doubtless will not be renewed. It is to be hoped that the public will be able to prevent the recurrence of such events, and to defeat the projects of those who might be inclined to disturb the public tranquillity.

Two men presented themselves, yesterday, to the Keeper of the Thuilleries. One of them wore the decoration assumed by the national guard of Bordeaux. They requested that the dress of the body guards should be given them, in order, as they said, that they might approach his majesty, and present a petition to him. This story appeared suspicious, and the commissary of the police was informed of the affair. He interrogated them; but they had no paper about them, not even the petition of which they had spoken. They were immediately arrested and conveyed to the office of the prefect of police.

We have stated, on the authority of several journals, that a war contribution of one hundred millions had been required from Paris by the Prussians, and the king had obtained its reduction to eight millions."

It was understood at London, about the 12th of July, that the French army beyond the Loire amounted to about 70,000 men.

Lord Castlereagh arrived at Paris on the 6th of July.

The Prussian troops are accused of having plundered and destroyed the palaces of St. Cloud and Malmaison.

Louis was received at Paris with the cry of vive le roi.

PROSCRIPTION.—A decree issued by Louis 18, on the 26th July, singles out for example the following general officers, accused of treason against the king before the 23d of March, &c.

Ney, Labedoyere, the two brothers Lallemand, Drouet d'Erlon, Leclerc, Desnouettes, Amcill, Brayer, Gilly, Monton Duvernet, Grouchy, Clausel, Laborde, Debelles, Bertrand, Drouot Cambrone, Lavalette, Rovigo.

"2. The individuals whose names follow, viz.

Soult, Alix, Excehnans, Bassano, Marbot, Felix, Lepelletier, Boulay de la Meurthe, Mehes, Fressinet, Thibaudeau, Carnot, Vandamme, Lamarque, (general), Lobau, Harel, Pirc, Barrere, Arnault, Pommereuil, Regnault de St. Jean d'Angely, Arighi (de Padoue), Dejean son, Garrau, Real, Buvier, Dumolard, Merlin de Donai, Durbach, Dirat, Defermont, Bory, Saint Vincent Felix Desportes, Garnier de Saintes, Mellinet, Hullin, Cluys, Courtin, Porbin Janson eldest son, Le Lorgne Dideville. shall depart within three days from the city of Paris, and retire into the interior of France, to such places as our minister of the general police shall point out for them, where they shall remain under surveillance, until the chambers shall decide on their case whether they ought to leave the kingdom, or be delivered up for the prosecution of the tribunals."

By a second decree, the following peers are struck from the peerage.

The marshals dukes of Dantzick, Elchingen, Albufera, Conegliano, Treviso. The dukes of Raslin, Plaisance, Cadore, counts Clement-de-Ris, Colchen, Cornudet, d'Abouville, de Croix, Delclay d'Agier, Dejeau, Fabre de Pande, Gassendi, Lacedede, de Zaton, Manbourg, de Barral, archbishop of Tours, Boissy d'Anglas, Canclaux, Casabianca, Montesquieu, Pontecoulant, Rampon, Segur, Valence, Béliard.

Great division of opinion prevails at Paris—M. Darnoville reproaches with baseness and sycophancy those who flatter the court; it is a disgrace, he says, to rejoice when "the blood of 20,000 Frenchmen was still reeking." This reproach is angrily retorted. The "Independent" accuses the Journal de Paris of denouncing good citizens—yes, replies its editor; as Cicero denounced Cataline and Verres. These brief selections give a glimpse of the temper of Paris and the state of the country.—Col.

The following is the answer which the deputies of the provisional government received from the allied cabinet:

Hagueau, July 1.

"The three powers regard as an essential condition of peace and of durable tranquillity, that Napoleon Bonaparte shall be put out of a state to trouble, by any chance, the repose of France and Europe; and after the events which occurred in the month of March last, the allied powers expect that his person will be delivered up into their keeping."

NAPOLÉON BONAPARTE,

London, July 22d.—The news of Bonaparte's surrender to the British fleet gave rise to a number of extraordinary reports here yesterday.—Every description of business appeared to have been forgotten. His surrender was in the mouth of every one, affording food for the most ludicrous conversation. Some doubted the fact; but at 4 o'clock all doubts were put at rest, by the receipt of an official letter by Lord Castlereagh from the duke of Otranto, containing an official despatch of the 17th of July, of which the following is an extract:

After having closed my despatches to you of this morning, I received the enclosed communication:

"I have the honor to make known to your excellency that Napoleon Bonaparte, finding it impossible to escape the British cruisers and troops who were stationed to guard the coast, came to the resolution of going on board the British ship of the line Bellerophon, captain Maitland. I have the honor to be, etc.

(Signed)

Le Duc d'OTRANTO."

Bonaparte's letter to the Prince Regent.

"In consequence of the factions which have divided my country, and the hatred of the greatest powers of Europe, I have terminated my political career; and I come, like Themistocles, to place myself under the protection of the British nation. I place myself under her protection and her laws, and which I demand of your royal highness, as the most powerful, the most constant, and the most generous of my enemies."

Despatches from M. Bonnefoux, naval commandant of the maritime prefect, to the minister of the marine, dated Rochefort, July 15, 10 in the evening.—In execution of your excellency's orders, I embarked in my boat, accompanied by baron Ricard, prefect of the lower Charante. The reports from the Roads of the 14th, had not reached me, but I was informed by captain Phillebert, commanding the Amphitrite frigate, that Bonaparte has embarked on board the Epervier brig as a flag of truce, determined to proceed to the English cruising station. Accordingly at day break, we saw him manœuvring to make the English ship Bellerophon, captain Maitland, who on perceiving that Bonaparte was steering towards him, had hoisted the white flag at his mizen. Ba Naparte, and the persons composing his suite, were received on board the English ship. The officer whom I had left to make observations, communicated to me this important news, and general Becker who arrived soon after confirmed it.

BONNEFOUX.

From a Paris paper, of July 25.—Extract of a letter, dated Rochfort, July 19.—“I can at length give you authentic particulars respecting the departure of the man who has done us so much evil. His last moments upon the French soil did not answer the expectations of his partizans. Why could they not all have been witnesses of them like us? They would soon have forgotten him.

During his stay in the road, Bonaparte exhibited only weakness and hesitation in the measures that he sought to take to escape from his enemies. To his embarrassment and his anxieties was joined an insurmountable drowsiness that took possession of his senses. Both at the Isle of Aix, where he remained two days, and on board of the Saal, sleep would overpower him, even in the midst of conversation.

The more pressing the danger became, the more his indecision augmented. He distrusted the advice that was given to him to save him. The project of departing with the frigates had been abandoned, since the English commander had refused to let him pass. He resolved to defend himself at the isle of Aix; he caused the 14th crew to be exercised for a short time, and the batteries to be prepared in case of attack; but by the confession even of his warmest partizans, eye-witnesses, his energy had totally abandoned him; he had no more ideas.

To the acclamations of our seamen, he answered that it was too late; that he had been left in ignorance of the devotion of his marine—that those corps ought to have been clothed, and that he saw plainly that Decres had deceived him like the rest. At last, in the midst of all his uncertainties, he takes a fancy to freight a Danish vessel, and to escape, if he can, the English cruisers: upon reflection, he relinquishes that expedient; another is then employed—two French vessels are purchased for the sum of 1400 francs; they are armed in haste. Eight officers of the 14th, dressed as seamen, composed his crew; they were commanded by M. Gent, captain in that corps. The roll d'équipage, made out at the naval office, was sent on board. It was then believed that the measure was determined upon.—Every thing was ready for setting off. But M. Bertrand and his wife were in tears; they were affrighted at so perilous a voyage, undertaken in a frail bark of 12 tons.

Bonaparte assembles on board the council, and enquires what are the dangers to which he is to be exposed. The commandant Philebert declares to him that he cannot be answerable for the success of the voyage; all the officers are of the same opinion. It is then that he takes the resolution of delivering up himself to his enemies—thus terminating his bloody career by an act of cowardice. On the 15th, at 4 o'clock in the morning, dressed in the habit of a dragoon, accompanied by his suite, he leaves the frigate. He had personally superintended the embarkation of his people and of his effects. The wind and tide were contrary; he did not arrive until eight o'clock on board of the English commander, who was at anchor in the Road des Basques.—He was very well received. Assuming a firm countenance, he said “the fate of arms leads me to my most cruel enemy, but I rely upon his honor.” Afterwards he questioned the officers respecting the force of the ship, and about all her armament, and walked about all the batteries as if it had been a review. At this moment our people left him to return to the isle of Aix.

I can assure you of the accuracy of these details. They are not hearsay—I was present.

Extract from the official correspondence of the maritime prefect of Rochfort.

ROCHFORD, JULY 17.

My lord—I have the honor to inform your excellency, that his Britannic majesty's ship Bellerophon, on board of which Napoleon Bonaparte embarked on the 15th of this month, set sail for England yesterday the 16th, at one o'clock in the afternoon.

That vessel carries, besides that personage, all his followers, a list of whom is annexed; they were at first divided between the frigates La Saal and La Meduse; they afterwards passed in the evening of the 14th to the brig L'Epervier, and schooner la Sophie, from whence they went on board vessels belonging to the English division, commanded by admiral sir Henry Hotham.

List of the principal personages embarked in the Bellerophon with Napoleon Bonaparte:

Lieutenant-general count Bertrand, grand marshal of the palace.

The countess Bertrand and three children.

Lieutenant-general the duke de Rovigo.

Lieutenant-general Talleman.

Major-general the baron Gourgaud, aid-de-camp of Napoleon.

Major-general Montholon-Semonville, do.

The countess Montholon-Semonville.

The count de las Casas, counselor of state, and his son.

M. de Resigny, chef d'escadron, officier d'ordonnance.

M. Planat, chef d'escadron, officier d'ordonnance.

M. Autrie, lieutenant, officier d'ordonnance.

M. Schultz, chef d'escadron.

M. Pointkorski, captain.

M. Mercher, captain.

M. Maingault, surgeon to Napoleon.

[Here follows the names of forty persons, composing the suite of Napoleon, and of the other passengers embarked with him.]

(Signed) The baron BONNEFOUX.

To his excellency the minister secretary of state for the department of marine and colonies.

Report made to his excellency the minister of marine and colonies, by M. de Rigny, captain of a frigate, sent upon a mission to Rochfort:

MY LORD—I have the honor to render to your excellency an account of the information that I have collected, relative to the mission with which I have just been charged at Rochfort.

Upon my arrival at this port, on the morning of the 18th, I learned that Napoleon Bonaparte had departed for England, in his Britannic majesty's ship Bellerophon, captain Maitland, on the 16th of July, at half past one in the afternoon.

My instructions, prescribing me to have on this subject official communications with admiral Hotham, commanding the English squadron, I hastened to write to him, addressing to him at the same time despatches from Mr. Croker, secretary of the admiralty of England, of which I was the bearer.—Those letters were delivered to the admiral by lieutenant Freuriau, whom his excellency was pleased to associate with me.

It appears from the different communications that I have had with the English admiral and M. the maritime prefect, that Napoleon having arrived at Rochfort on the 3d July, took up his residence at the maritime prefecture until the 8th. Pressed by general Becker, who had been charged to escort and see him on board, and by M. the baron Bonnefoux, maritime prefect, to avoid himself of every opportunity afforded by the wind and tide, he determined at length to embark in the boats that were waiting for him at every tide, and repaired at ten o'clock in the evening on board the Saal, and caused his suite to be divided between that frigate and the Meduse.

The next morning, the 9th, he landed upon the Isle of Aix, and visited its fortifications.

On the 10th, the wind was favorable for putting to sea—but the English cruisers and the bright moon left the frigate but little hope of escaping.

Between the 10th and the 11th, Napoleon sent in a flag of truce on board the English ship Bellerophon, the generals Savary and Las Casas. The flag of truce returned on the 11th.

Between the 11th and 12th, Napoleon learned from his brother Joseph the dissolution of the chambers, and the entry of the King, into Paris. Until then, Bonaparte had often expressed the opinion that the chambers would recall him, either because he wished the authorities that surrounded him to believe so, or because he really entertained such an expectation.

On the 12th he landed upon the island of Aix with his suite and their baggage, and in the night between the 12th and 13th, two half decked boats arrived there from Rochelle. It appeared that Napoleon had caused them to be purchased with the intention of embarking in them, and of endeavouring to gain, by favor of the night, a Danish smack, with which it is supposed he had agreed, and who was to wait for him at 30 or 40 leagues distance in the offing. It is not known why he did not avail himself of these arrangements, but doubtless they appeared to him to be too hazardous.

In the night between the 13th and 14th, he went aboard the French brig l'Epervier; and on the evening of the 14th, general Becker, who had been with a flag on board of the English squadron, having returned, Napoleon caused his suite and their baggage to be embarked in the Epervier.

On the 15th, in the morning, that vessel was perceived making sail as a flag of truce towards the admiral's ship; the sea not permitting her to approach quickly, the English boats met her and transported the passengers on board the Bellerophon. Under these circumstances, lieutenant Jourdan, commander of the Epervier, conceived it his duty to request, and accordingly obtained from the commander of the Bellerophon, a written attestation of his having taken Bonaparte on board of that vessel.

On the same day a frigate belonging to the squadron set sail for England.

On the 16th, the Bellerophon set sail at half past one in the afternoon. The lightness and the direction of the wind that has prevailed since, does not admit of the supposition that she could have arrived on the English coast, before the 19th or 20th.

On the 17th, the maritime prefect of Rochefort addressed to the troops and seamen under his orders, a proclamation, which, in announcing the return of his majesty to Paris, amidst the acclamations of all the inhabitants, directed them at the same time to assume the white cockade.

The white flag was hoisted upon the forts, and on board of the vessels in the road, on the 17th at noon, and saluted by the artillery.

Ever since the 15th, M. the Baron Bonnefoux had manifested his intention to cause those colors to be hoisted by the troops under his command, but the commandant of the place not having yet received the orders addressed to the general, M. the Baron de Bonnefoux was of opinion, that he ought to wait, in order to act in concert with that superior officer, who soon received from major general Bertrand, commanding the department of the Lower Charente, orders to follow the movements of the marine.

I ought not to omit informing your Excellency, that the wise measures taken by M. the Maritime Prefect and major general Bertrand would have prevented the intentions of ill-designing persons, had there been any such.

Rochefort and Rochelle are animated by the best spirit; and those parts, which were the last under the influence of Bonaparte, have not on that account failed to be the first to manifest their devotion to the king's person, and their joy, on learning the return of our august monarch to his capital.

Your excellency will find annexed the copy of a letter addressed by Napoleon to the prince regent of England, and which must have reached his royal highness through the medium of the English squadron.

I pray your excellency to accept the homage of my profound respect,
H. DE RIGNY.

ANECDOTES OF BONAPARTE.

An Exeter (Eng.) paper says—"Bonaparte, we are told, walks the deck freely and sometimes talks to the sailors. The officers treat him with great politeness.

London July 20.—The Cabinet have not yet, we believe, finally resolved on the spot to which Bonaparte shall be sent. St. Helena is still spoken of, but with less confidence that when his unconditional surrender to us was first known.—Meanwhile he remains on board the Bellerophon. Upon the arrival of the vessel at Torbay, captain Maitland made the signal for general orders, the telegraphic answer to which was, to prohibit all communication with the shore, and to stand out three leagues to sea, and await the orders of the Admiralty.

A gentleman who arrived in town yesterday evening, and who left the Bellerophon, states, that Bonaparte was almost constantly upon deck, with his glass, reconnoitering, frequently walking backwards and forwards in a hurried step, and incessantly talking to himself.

The Bellerophon, as we said yesterday, has been ordered to Plymouth, where strict orders have been issued to prevent all intercourse between the shore and the ship. The curiosity of all ranks, as may well be conceived, is excessive. Persons from London and from other parts are flocking down to Plymouth, though they know that Bonaparte is not expected to land, and that they cannot go on board the Bellerophon.—But they can row in boats around the vessel, and can occasionally catch a glimpse of him.

He is the greater part of the day in the stern gallery, either walking backwards and forwards with his hands behind him, as he is represented in some of the pictures in the print shops, or surveying the shipping and shore through a glass. In general, he keeps alone, Bertrand and Lallemand remaining at some distance behind him. Occasionally he beckons to some of them to point out something to him, or to make some observation. He then walks on alone. Captain Maitland is more frequently with him than any of his suite, and he pays him great attention. He is in good health. As usual, he passes but a short time at his meals, and drinks but little wine. He is said to drink regularly to the health of the prince regent. Coffee is frequently served up to him on the deck, and when he first came near the land about Torbay, he is reported to have exclaimed, "Enfin, voilà ce beau pays!" (At length, here is this fine country!) adding that he had never seen it except from Calais to Boulogne, whence the only points that could be seen were the white and bold rocks about Dover. He is plainly dressed, in general in a green coat, without any decorations, and a cocked hat.

Another paper says—"On board the Bellerophon he (Bonaparte) seemed to think himself emperor, taking possession of captain Maitland's cabin, and shortly afterwards invited him to dinner. When he first went on board the Superb this morning, Bertrand first ascended the side, and was introduced to the admiral; Napoleon followed—"The emperor," said captain M.—Napoleon bowed to the admiral, without further ceremony walked into the cabin, and sent his compliments that he would be glad to speak with him!!

"Nothing escapes his notice; his eyes are in every place, and on every object, from the greatest to the most minute. He immediately asked an explanation of the ropes, blocks, masts and yards, and all the machinery of the ship. He sent for the boatswain to question him; that officer always fitting out the French ships. He requested the marines to pass in review before him, examined the arms evolutions, dress, &c. and expressed himself highly pleased. He enquired into the situation of the seamen, their pay, prize-money, food, tobacco, &c. and when told of their being supplied by a purser or commissary, asked if he was not a rogue.

"In conversing with the admiral, he said, "I have given myself up to the English; but I would not have done so to any other of the allied powers; in surrendering to any of them I should be subject to the caprice and will of an individual; in submitting to the English I place myself at the mercy of a nation."

The following particulars are equally curious and interesting. We derive them from head-quarters:—

"On board the Bellerophon—By some passengers who came in the Bellerophon it appears, that Bonaparte was quite at his ease on board that ship; took possession of the captain's cabin, sans ceremonie, invited the officers of the ship to his table, talked with great freedom on the present state of things, said it was impossible for the Bourbons to govern France, and that Napoleon II. would be very soon recalled to the throne, that Fouché was an ass, and totally unfit for the office assigned to him. He acknowledged that England alone had ruined all his grand plans, and that but for her he had been now emperor of the east as well as the west. He walked on the poop and quarter-deck, conversed with the seamen, and affected great gaiety and unconcern. In short, such is the talent of this "child and champion of jacobinism," that before they arrived in Torbay he was considered by all on board a devilish good fellow.

Of his family. Joseph Bonaparte is to be sent to Russia, Jerome to Prussia, Lucien to England, Louis to Austria, madame Letetia and cardinal Fesch to Rome, M. Hortense to Switzerland—and it is said that Murat embarked at Toulon for England, about the 18th of July.

What will be done with Bonaparte? is asked by every one—but no one is able to frame an answer satisfactory even to himself. The British cabinet seem also bothered about it—though they "stick at nothing."

London, July 29.—Yesterday evening it was announced by telegraph that the Bellerophon was arrived at Torbay, and this morning about 5 o'clock lieutenant Fletcher, flag lieutenant of sir H. Hotham, arrived in town with despatches, giving an account of her arrival at that anchorage with Bonaparte and his suite, consisting of 45 persons, viz. marshal Comte de Montholon, marshal Bertrand, the generals Savary and L'Allemand, the comte de Las-Casas, three lieutenant-cols. four captains, &c. the countesses, Montholon and Bertrand, and their four children.

We understand that the Bellerophon has been ordered round to Plymouth, and that the most positive instruction has been given to prevent all intercourse with the ship, that none of the party will be allowed to come on shore, and that no persons whatever will be permitted to visit the ship. St. Helena is still mentioned as the place of his future destination.

FROM THE LONDON GAZETTE.

Admiralty-office, July 25.

Extract of a letter from captain Maitland, of H. M. ship Bellerophon, to John Wilson Croker, esq. dated in Basque Roads, the 14th inst.

For the information of my lords commissioners of the admiralty, I have to acquaint you that the count Las Casces and general Allemand, this day came on board his majesty's ship under my command, with a proposal for me to receive on board Napoleon Bonaparte, for the purpose of throwing himself on the generosity of his royal highness the prince regent.

Conceiving myself authorised by their lordships secret order, I have acceded to the proposal, and he is to embark on board this ship to-morrow morning.

That no misunderstanding may arise, I have explicitly and clearly explained to the count Las Casces, that I have no authority whatever for granting terms of any sort; but that all I can do is to convey him and his suite to England, to be received in such manner as his royal highness may deem expedient.

The journal of this city contains the following letter:—

The marshal prince of Eckmühl, commander in chief of the armies on the left bank of the Loire, to lieutenant general Maux. Lumarque, commander in chief of the army at the Loire.

"ORLEANS, July 11, 1815.—The army, on quitting Paris and retiring behind the Loire, according to the terms of the convention of the 3d of July, left near the provisional government commissioners appointed to require instructions, in case a new government should be established.

"These commissioners, in rendering an account to the army of the late events of the capital and the entrance of the king, have informed me of the overtures which have been made to them to induce the army to recognise that its union with the system of the government could alone prevent the dissolution of the state.

"The commissioners, in their communications give the assurance, that under a constitutional government no re-action is to be feared; that the passion will be neutralized; that the ministry will be one and responsible; that men and principles will be respected; that arbitrary dismissals shall not take place; that the army shall be treated conformably to its honor: these are the terms transmitted by the commissioners.

"As a pledge and proof of what they advance, they state, as a certainty, that marshal St. Cyr is appointed minister of war; that the duke of Otrante is minister of police, and that he only accepts this office with the assurance that the government will proceed in a spirit of moderation and wisdom, of which he himself has always given the example.

"On these conditions, national interest ought freely to unite the army to the king. These interests require sacrifices; they should be made willingly, with a modest energy; the army subsisting, the army united, will become, should our misfortunes increase, the centre and rallying point of all Frenchmen, even the most violent royalists.

"Every one must feel that the union and the oblivion of all dissensions can alone effect the salvation of France, which will become impossible, should hesitation, difference of opinion, or private considerations bring dissolution to the army, either by its own means, or those of foreign force.

"Let us unite, then—let us never separate. The Vendéans have given us a touching example; they have written to us offering to lay aside all resentments, and to unite with us in the patriotic wish of preventing all dismemberment of the country. Let us be Frenchmen; you know that this sentiment always reigned exclusively in my soul; it will only leave me with my latest breath. In this name I demand your confidence; I am sure of meriting and obtaining it.

(Signed) "The marshal commander in chief,
"The prince of ECKMÜHL."

N. B.—There is in this letter several paragraphs which appear to us unintelligible; events will doubtless explain them. The whole contents of the letter are contradictory to the positive account of the army having submitted to the king as it ought to do, purely and simply. [Gazette de France.

London, July 22.—Soult has been signally defeated between Châlons and Nancy, by prince Wrede; 14,000 men fell on this occasion. Lecourbe has also been overpowered, and compelled to shut himself in Belfort, with great loss.

A German act of confederation was concluded and signed at Vienna, on the 8th of June. The sovereign princes and free cities of Germany bind themselves not to make war on each other under any pretext, nor to decide their differences by force, but to bring them under the consideration of the diet, &c.

July 24.—Paris papers to the 22nd instant, arrived this morning. The following principal conditions of the treaty negotiating at Paris, it is said, are finally settled:

The integrity of France to be maintained. The expenses of the war to be defrayed by France in 4 years. The evacuation of the country by the allied troops to commence on the 25th of August, with the exception of some corps, whose stay will be prolonged until the complete and solid re-establishment of the public tranquility.—This statement appears to be a mere speculation. Davoust has not submitted. On the contrary he is said to have re-crossed the Loire at Cosne, with intent to transfer the war to Burgundy. Cosne is on the Loire, above Gien, at which place the left division of his army lately passed that river.—If he has taken that direction, he must have joined Suchet, who left Lyons on the 13th. This army may yet prove troublesome. A Russian force has marched to the Loire, to join the Prussian troops previously sent to observe it.

Marshal Jourdan has concluded an armistice with the Swiss troops which occupied part of Franche Comte.

The French funds decline rapidly. The 5 per cent consols were on Thursday down to 57, a fall of 9 per cent since the preceding day. Bank actions 240.

The British government has officially announced the cessation of hostilities "on the coast of France," and against all French vessels under the white flag.—Napoleon Bonaparte having surrendered himself.

Dusseldorf, June 20. Bonaparte's travelling carriage, which was taken by the Prussian major Keller, arrived here to-day. It is provided with some services of massy gold, valued at 250,000 francs.

Basle, June 27. At Bourgfeld, a village within musket-shot of this place, some peasants fired from a house upon the Austrian troops: they were all sabred and the house destroyed. In the evening, it was discovered that five voltigeurs and one officer had been assassinated; in consequence, the village was wholly pillaged and burnt.

Hegenheim, Bourglibre and Altkirch, and several other places, have been treated with nearly the same severity, and for the same reason. The allies have entered Munhausen. The archduke John is here.

"Every man that has the least particle of patriotism within him, revolts at the idea of receiving the law from foreigners, and feels impelled to resist their entry.* Let us call to mind the horrible howlings that were made about French cruelties in Spain, where the soldiers of Bonaparte meted to the Spaniards the same measure of punishment that the Austrians have inflicted on the French. If it was wrong in Spain, it is not right in France. The love of monarchy, and a thirst for power, generate the same crimes in all countries; but there are many vile enough to call the same things by different names.

War Events:

Some articles prepared for this department, and alluded to in the editorial address, are, with many others, omitted for want of room.

A naval court of enquiry has been held, by order of the secretary of the navy, on board the U. S. ship Hornet, in the harbor of New-York, on the 25d day of August, 1815, to investigate the causes of the return of that ship into port, and to enquire into the circumstances attending the loss of armament, stores, &c. during her late cruise; and the following opinion has been pronounced by the court:—

The court, after mature deliberation on the testimony adduced, are of opinion, that no blame is imputable to captain Biddle, on account of the return of the Hornet into port with the loss of her armament, stores, &c. and that the greatest applause is due to him for his persevering gallantry and nautical skill, evinced in escaping, under the most disadvantageous circumstances, after a long and arduous chase by a British line of battle ship.

SAMUEL EVANS, President.

HENRY WHEATON,
Special Judge Advocate.

Copy of a letter from lieutenant N. D. Nicholson, of the late U. S. brig Syren, to captain Samuel Evans, commanding naval officer at New-York, dated New-York, August 24, 1815.

SIR—Conceiving it my duty to make known the treatment exhibited by British officers and men to those who are so unfortunate as to fall in their power, I am induced to acquaint you with the following circumstances:—

After the surrender of the Syren to the Medway,

*If this proposition be correct, it follows that our eastern jacobins, folding their arms in regard to Ceylons, &c. had not a particle of patriotism.

the officers and crew of the former were removed to the latter, the crew not being allowed the privilege of taking their clothing, &c. with them, so that the prize crew had a fair opportunity of plundering such articles as they thought proper, which opportunity they took care to profit by, as many of our men were pillaged of every article they possessed, excepting what they had on at the time; and the officers in like manner were plundered on board the Medway; the midshipmen, some of them, were completely stripped, others lost their watches, &c.

For my own part, I came off with the loss of about half my clothing, and thought myself well off, when compared with the losses of my shipmates. The morning after our capture, we were mustered on the quarter deck to undergo a search; the men were there stripped to the skin, and their clothing not returned, so that many of them were left without any thing more than a shirt and trowsers; the next day Mr. Barton (the first lieutenant of the Medway) distributed the clothing he had taken from our men, to his quarter-masters and quarter-gunners, in my presence. After being on board the Medway five weeks, we were landed at Simons-town, twenty-five miles to the eastward of the Cape of Good Hope, myself and brother officers paroled, and the men marched to Cape-town, under an escort of dragoons, being obliged to ford a lake on the march, where the boys were compelled to go over on the backs of the tall men; this march of twenty-five miles was performed in one day, and without shoes or food, the latter article they were kept without four and twenty hours; their shoes were stolen by the crew of the Medway while they were asleep; after remaining in this situation nearly eight months, without bed or bedding (they were not even furnished with straw, and their hammocks were taken on a plea of their being public property) we were all embarked in different men of war and Indiamen, for England; myself, with about sixty officers and men, in the Cumberland 74, captain Baker: we were all put on the lower gun-deck, without distinction, among their own crew, and fed on prisoner's allowance; and on my remonstrating with the captain for receiving such treatment, he ordered me off the quarter deck, with a threat, at the same time, to put me in irons. We remained in this situation eighteen days, after which lieutenants German, Gordon and myself, were removed to the Grampus 50, at St. Helena, admitted to the wardroom mess and treated with civility.

With respect, I have the honor, &c.

Bounty Lands.

FROM THE NATIONAL INTELLIGENCER.

To those patriotic citizens who composed the late United States' Army:

FELLOW-CITIZENS!—Observing that attempts are making in some of the public papers to lessen your confidence in the honor and assurances of the government, which pledges itself to give those who enlisted for the war donations of public land, because those lands are not miraculously prepared at the moment of the termination of the war for location; I have therefore thought it might be proper and satisfactory to you to submit for consideration the following facts, in order that you may know that the government, which has already expressed its sense of your meritorious services, is anxious to comply with its engagements.

Soon after the ratification of the treaty of peace, with Great Britain, I received the directions of the President of the United States, through the honorable the commissioner of the general land office, to set apart the best bodies of land belonging to the government, so that two millions of acres which had been appropriated by Congress, lying in the Michigan territory, two millions in Illinois, and two millions in the territory of Missouri, might be surveyed without delay for the soldiers of the late army, &c. In obedience to these instructions, a sufficient quantity was selected in Michigan as near the southern shore of Lake Erie and the northern boundary of the state of Ohio, as the private claims would allow—the same quantity north of the Illinois river and extending to the Mississippi, and down those rivers to their junction; and a like quantity between the St. Francis and the Arkansas rivers, extending down the Mississippi, believed to be the most valuable tracts in these territories; and a sufficient number of skillful surveyors were immediately engaged to survey and lay off these lands, that they might as soon as possible be prepared for location. Four of those surveyors, with all their assistants, were dispatched to Michigan—four were instructed as soon as practicable to commence the surveys north of the Illinois river—and arrangements were in train to prepare the rest to follow on, so soon as preparations were made for their commencement.—While we were thus proceeding, with a fond hope of soon having your land ready for location, our surveyors were driven by the Indians from Michigan, who, misled by a miserable policy, refused to permit them to proceed. The same hostile disposition of the lower tribes has thrown impediments in the way in the lower country,—although the surveyors report that that had the Indians been peaceable, such was the state of that country, from the uncommonly wet season and the richness of its soil producing an astonishing under growth, that it would have been impossible to commence during the heat of summer. Under these circumstances we are obliged to desist and wait the issue of the treaties which are authorised by the President of the United States to be held with the contending tribes of Indians, which every principle of humanity sanctions before a sad appeal to arms.

I can, therefore, with the greatest truth, assure you, that so soon as the difficulties are removed, which the government is using its endeavors to do, as it respects the Indians, no time will be lost in surveying those lands and preparing the way for you to obtain what you so justly merit.

EDWARD TIFFIN, Surveyor-General,
Chillicothe, Aug. 10, 1815.

CHRONICLE.

From the Mediterranean we have a multitude of accounts; and it is stated in so many ways that Decatur has nearly annihilated the Algerine power at sea, that we gladly believe it, though the fact is not stated as positively as is desired. One of the reports says—"that commodore Decatur, having been informed that the crew of an American vessel were put to the sword in Algiers, had declared an intention of beheading his prisoners (400 in number) in sight of Algiers, should the report prove true."

Spain and Naples are also said to have declared war against Algiers. The Dutch squadron has at last arrived in the Mediterranean, and a Swedish force was expected. But Decatur's "bit of striped hunting" will have pretty nearly settled the business for them. It does not appear certain that the Algerines had captured more than 1 American vessel.

The following account from the Providence (R. I. American, of the 25th ult. is the most particular of any received, and comprises in itself, also, the numerous reports prevailing, on this interesting subject:

Arrived here, late last evening, brig Brazilian, Snow, in 42 days passage from Gibraltar. We were politely favored with the following interesting intelligence, by an intelligent gentleman who came passenger in the B.

The American squadron fell in with the Algerine frigate Messode, of 46 guns, and from four to six hundred men, off Cape de Gat. She was engaged by the Guerriere alone, and after an action of one hour and a half was captured by her; the Messode had 24 killed and 24 wounded; the Guerriere had 7 wounded. They afterwards captured another frigate and a corvette off Cape Palos; the particulars of the action not stated.

The prizes were sent into Carthage, and were ordered, by the Spanish government, to leave the place; in consequence of which they proceeded to Toulon. It was reported that another Algerine cruiser, a brig, had been spoken going into Toulon, a prize to the American squadron. It was confidently expected at Gibraltar, that the greatest part, if not the whole of the Algerine fleet, would be captured, as there was certain accounts of their being at sea, long after they passed the Straits, which preceded the American squadron only forty-eight hours. There was another report in circulation, that the squadron had taken the second seaport in Algiers, called Oran.

Vessels which had arrived from the Straits brought various but confirmatory accounts of the probability of the entire capture of the Algerine fleet; but as they assert nothing particular as to the actual capture, except these already mentioned, they are only entitled to the credit of plausible conjectures. The report of the capture of the two frigates and the corvette was confirmed by a letter from captain Lewis, of the Guerriere, to one of the American consuls in Spain, and by him communicated to Mr. Horatio Sprague, American commission-merchant at Gibraltar.

The Dutch squadron, consisting of five frigates, and one sloop of war, passed Gibraltar on the 3d of July, and it was presumed would form a junction with the Americans.

A large Swedish frigate came to anchor at Gibraltar on the 11th, bound up. It was said she was the van-guard of a much larger force, to operate against the Algerines.

Further.—A vessel has arrived at New-York, by which an account is received, of a vessel being spoken in the bay of Biscay from Leghorn, that reported—Commodore Decatur had made peace with the dey of Algiers, and the American squadron was then in the harbor of Algiers.

Another account says, that the Algerine frigate Mossoda, or, as she is called by some, the Missaouda, had 160 killed and wounded, and was a complete wreck. She was formerly captured from the Portuguese. Though the loss on board the Guerriere was trifling by the fire of the Algerine, the bursting of one of her guns is said to have killed and wounded about 30 of our gallant fellows. She did not sustain any injury in her hull.

On the 19th June, the schooner Flambeau, captain Nicholson, after leaving the prize at Carthage, sailed with another schooner, and on the 20th fell in with a large polacre brig, which made sail from them and run on shore near Carthage. The Americans, from respect to the neutral territory, drew off—but on the Algerine commencing a heavy fire on them, and thus violating the Spanish neutrality, returned and captured the brig, with about 200 men, 48 of the crew escaped on shore by swimming. The brig, mounting 22 guns, was got off, and also carried into Carthage.

At Lisbon, the 4th July, an Ottoman ship arrived from the Mediterranean, the captain of which states that about 14 days ago, he heard a very heavy cannonade, and the next morning saw the American squadron capture and take possession of three Algerines, one frigate and two brigs. The Ottoman captain already knew of the capture of the vessels carried into Carthage.

Treaty with America. The following article is copied from the London Courier of the 17th July:

The following are reported to be the principal terms of the commercial treaty about to be concluded with the United States of America.

By the 1st article, the navigation laws of the two countries are, for mutual benefit, dispensed with, and British vessels trading to American ports, and American vessels trading to British ports, have equal privileges in regard to duties and exemptions with native vessels respectively. This benefit not only extends to the ships but to the cargoes. Thus cotton wool, which on coming to England in British ships from the United States, is liable to a duty of only one penny per lb. and if imported in American vessels, is a subject to a charge of three pence in the pound, will incur the same duty, if conveyed in the bottoms of either of the two countries.

The second article admits of free trade to Calcutta, and to all the British settlements of the Peninsula of Hindostan. With regard to China there is no regulation, because that trade is exclusively with the India Company, and this company has no power or authority to obstruct the trade to China, either with regard to the Americans or any other foreign state.

A third article, and not the least important in the view of the American government, restricts the British from entering into any trade with the numerous tribes of Indians occupying any part of the country within the jurisdiction of the United States.

The London Globe of the 19th July, says—"In the new commercial arrangements with America, we learn that some privileges have been granted to America in the fur trade."

Foreign Office, (London) July 15—His royal highness the Prince Regent has been pleased in the name and on behalf of his majesty, to permit Robert Gaunt Beasley, esq. to act as consul general in this country for the United States of America, until his successor in that situation shall have been duly appointed. And approved of James Maury, esq. as consul at Liverpool.

The honorable Mr. Bagot, the British minister to this country, was preparing to sail in the frigate Lacedemonian, captain Jackways, which was fitting up for his reception.

Specie. We congratulate the public on the prospect that specie may soon again come into circulation. The late events in Europe, with the eagerness of some to supply the wants of the British government, have, together, reduced it nearly to par at Liverpool; one vessel having arrived there from Boston with 2,000,000 dollars! The consequence was that dollars fell from 5s. 8d. to 4s. 9d. This is very pleasant news—the speculators will make a swamping business of it. The brokers, generally, have made a stand in purchasing the precious metals.

Guadaloupe surrendered at discretion, early in the last month.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

No. 2 of VOL. IX.]

BALTIMORE, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 9, 1815.

[WHOLE NO. 210.]

Ilac olim meminisse juvabit.—VIRGIL.

PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, NO. 29, SOUTH CALVERT-STREET, AT $5 PER ANNUM.

West-Point.

To a distinguished friend who lately visited West Point, the editor of the REGISTER is indebted for the following description of that celebrated post.

How often has the traveller occasion to remark the incongruity of geographical descriptions, with the real appearance of places which come under his notice! From the manner in which Dr. Morse has mentioned West Point, a stranger would hardly expect to behold a spot, where awful magnificence, romantic wildness, and august sublimity of scenery, rivet the attention with mingled influence; while associated recollection revives the days long past, when a band of patriots here opposed the sole barrier to the subjugation of our fathers. It is, indeed, a spot formed by nature to be the nursery of heroes. As its name imports, it is a point of land on the Western shore, of the river Hudson; sixty miles from the city of New-York and one hundred from Albany. Viewing it as you ascend the river, it appears to be nothing more than a rugged and almost inaccessible promontory; but having gained the summit of the bank, you are at once struck with surprise and admiration at finding yourself on a beautiful verdant plain, containing nearly eighty acres, and forming the area of an amphitheatre; the one half of which is encircled by the river, and the other by the lofty mountain upon which stand the mouldering ruins of the old Fort Putnam. From the centre of this area, looking up the river, the first object which arrests the eye, is the towering and precipitous mountain called the Crow's Nest; whose rocky sides overhang the water, in awful and terrific grandeur.* Opposite to this, in the middle of the river, as if it had been riven by some convulsive throes of its parent mountain, from its original attachment, stands a small, but beautiful island; smiling in all the wild luxuriance of uncultivated nature. Farther on, at the distance of ten miles, is to be seen the village of Newburg, a name which will awaken, in the revolutionary soldier, the remembrance of other times. Beyond this, the sight is bounded by a distant view of the Catskill mountains, the highest in the state. Thence casting the eye on the Eastern shore of the river and pursuing its downward course, bleak and barren mountains, delightful valleys teeming with the fruits of industry, and here and there a farm-house peeping through the embowering wood, alternately fix the gaze of the beholder; until at length it rests upon the white chimnies of a mansion, half concealed amid the surrounding foliage, as if still ashamed that it had once been the habitation of the traitor Arnold.

In 1802 the congress of the United States passed a law to organize and establish a Corps of Engineers and Cadets; giving authority to the president to make promotions in the same, so as that the number of the whole corps should at no time, exceed twenty officers and cadets. It was further enacted by the same law "that the said corps, when so organized, shall be stationed at West Point, in the state of New York, and shall constitute a military academy."

From this circumscribed beginning, has sprung one of the noblest institutions of which our country can boast. For many years after its establishment, the academy was scarcely known beyond the narrow limits of its own circle; until, among other measures preparatory to the declaration of war in 1812, another law was passed, augmenting the corps of Engineers; authorising an additional number of professors; and extending the limit of cadets to two hundred and fifty. Still, however, something was wanting, to excite the attention, and awaken the interest of the public, to this cradle of Mars.

Fortunately, the occasion was not distant, which was destined to rouse the energies of the nation, and call into active exercise the latest benefits of the institution. The names of Wood, McRee, Douglas, and a host of youthful warriors, who with the valour, skill and confidence of hardy veterans, sprung at once from the peaceful lap of science to the rude and stormy field of war, soon rung with re-echoed sound, to the remotest corner of an admiring country. They were pupils of the military academy. Then first, did West Point become an object of eager inquiry. Fathers were anxious to give their sons such an opportunity of rising to renown; and the sons themselves felt the glow of youthful desire, kindle in their bosoms, to emulate the noble examples, before them. The table of the secretary of war was now crowded with applications for cadets' warrants; and, before the commencement of the exercises of the present year, the limited number was complete.

To the indefatigable zeal and exertions of the late colonel Williams, the public is indebted, more perhaps than to any other individual, for the original establishment of the military academy. But for the order, system, regularity and discipline which pervade every branch of the institution, all praise is due to the present superintendent, captain Alden Partridge, of the corps of engineers. This officer, to a cultivated understanding, and extensive scientific acquirements, unites a zeal for the improvement of the cadets, which eminently qualifies him for so responsible a station. His stern justice, rigid impartiality and strict discipline, inspire in the cadets a proper degree of fear, while at the same time, his urbanity of manners, kindness of deportment, and polite condescension, win their respectful affections. His frown is deprecated as the severest punishment for dereliction of duty; his smile is hailed as the best reward for its observance.

The whole number of cadets is divided into two companies; young men of the largest size forming the first, and the smaller ones the second.—They are governed by officers appointed, in rotation, from among themselves. Those who act as commissioned officers, hold their stations for a month—the non-commissioned officers for a week. At the beat of reville, the companies parade, and the roll is called; after which they return to their quarters, for the purpose of cleaning their respective chambers, making their beds, and preparing for breakfast. At half-past 7 o'clock the bugle calls them to this repast; to which they march in regular order, and take their seats at the table with the same exactness that they would perform a military march. Twelve persons are appointed from their own body as carvers, who have command of the table ceremonies; and except by these, not a word is spoken during the meal. When the time allowed them is elapsed, the order is given to rise; and in an instant the line of march is resumed, and they return to their quarters. At 8 o'clock, the studies are commenced. Those not immediately engaged in reciting to some one or other, of the professors, remain in their own chambers. At half past 12 or 1 o'clock the bugle is again sounded to summon them to dinner; on which occasion the same ceremonies are observed as at breakfast. At 2 o'clock the studies are resumed in the same manner, and continued until the time to prepare for the sun-set parade. At this parade they are put through the manual exercise, and the various evolutions of infantry; all which they perform in a style of military precision, and with an easy elegance and regularity of motion, not surpassed by the best disciplined soldiers. Before the parade is dismissed the companies are drawn up in an open square, and an evening prayer is delivered by the chaplain; after which they retire, and have just time to disencumber themselves of their accoutrements, &c. when the bugle sounds the call to supper. At 8 o'clock the tattoo warns them to repair to their respective chambers, out of which they are seen no more until the next morning's reveille.

On Sundays, the church service is performed in the morning and afternoon by the chaplain of the corps, the reverend Mr. Empie. The writer of this cannot refrain here from expressing the high gratification he derived from hearing two of this gentleman's sermons, during his stay at West Point.—The classical purity of the language, the soundness of their religious doctrine, and the unaffected fervor of manner in which they were delivered, were alike calculated to interest and delight the hearer.

The branches of science now taught at the academy, are mathematics, natural and experimental philosophy, engineering (which, it is believed, includes the whole art of tactics) ethics, the French language, drawing, &c. The professors are all gentlemen of the highest respectability and talents, who appear to have devoted themselves wholly to the good of the institution. With such teachers, and such guardians of their manners, morals and religion; in a spot where every thing combines to awaken love of country, and a veneration for the patriots of the revolution—the cadets cannot fail to become enlightened men, virtuous citizens, and brave defenders of their country's rights.

A little of the fostering care of congress, however, is still wanting to give to this institution that broad and extensive utility of which it is susceptible. A further appropriation of money should be made, for the erection of additional barracks and other buildings. The number of cadets might be advantageously increased to five hundred, and a professor of languages should be added to the academy. That part of the law which directs that they shall "be encamped at least three months of each year," ought to be repealed, not only as unnecessary, but as highly detrimental to the improvement of the cadets, or if not wholly repealed, the time of continuing in camp should be left to the discretion of the superintendent. Entrancement, which is the only thing intended to be taught by encampment, can be as well taught without the necessity of confining the cadets to tents for three months in the year; which, added to the term of winter vacation, leaves them only half the year for mental instruction.

These are points which deserve the serious consideration of congress; and which if correctly decided on, will render the Military Academy at West-Point a blessing to generations yet unborn.

Letter to the Editor.

Charleston, S. C. August 19, 1815.

MR. NILES—In your Weekly Register of the 12th instant, (see vol. VIII. page 420) I observe an anecdote or two said to be related by an officer of the old revolutionary army, which appears to me to be an insidious attempt to diminish the horrors and odium of the Dartmoor massacre, by a false or mutilated representation of affairs which took place at the barracks in Cambridge, near Boston, with the Saratoga convention prisoners. Permit another old officer of the revolutionary army to state the real circumstances of the above affair; and he believes there will appear a material difference between the business of Dartmoor and Cambridge, not only in their situations as depots of prisoners, but in the conduct of the guards. Cambridge barracks were not enclosed, and nothing but a line of centinels kept the prisoners within bounds; in consequence of which many of them escaped and found their way to Newport, R. Island, at that time a British post. Dartmoor appears to have been extremely well secured.

It is well known that the Saratoga convention prisoners were marched to Cambridge, near Boston, not only as at that time a safe depot for them, but also for a more convenient port of embarkation, in case that convention were ratified by Great Britain. Here they were placed under guard of a few hundred militia. Among the British officers and soldiers, it was a good and a standing joke to disregard the challenges of the sentries, and even sometimes to attempt disarming them. Colonel David Henley, an excellent officer of the regular army, being at length appointed to the command of that post, was determined to make himself and his troops respected. Orders were given to fire upon any one who should attempt to pass the sentries without leave. In defiance of this order, a British lieutenant, riding in a chaise with a common prostitute, attempted to pass a sentinel, and, though repeatedly challenged, refused to stop. The sentinel then fired and shot him dead on the spot.

The second anecdote requires to be properly stated. The circumstances are these: when the militia guards were relieved, according to daily routine, the British prisoners were in the habit of surrounding, jeering and insulting, and sometimes impeding their movements. They were repeatedly warned of the impropriety of this conduct, but it sometimes required more than words to check the insolence of the prisoners. In their quarters, also, the guards were resisted, when endeavoring to quiet disturbances. In particular, one night some of the militia had their arms injured, or destroyed. Colonel Henley having seized the chief rioters next morning, was so abused by one of them, that in a moment of irritation, he gave the fellow several pricks in the breast with a sword—but neither ran him through the heart as stated, nor did the prisoner die of his wounds—but was about his usual business in a few days. Colonel Henley was brought before a about martial upon charges preferred against him by general Burgoyne, who acted as prosecutor.—Colonel Tudor, of Boston, was judge advocate; general (at that time lieutenant-colonel) Brooks, I believe, was a member of the court; brigadier-general Glover was president. Colonel Henley was acquitted.

Although I was not immediately on the spot, yet I was not at such a distance as to be entirely ignorant of these facts. But to give you an unerring document, permit me to refer you to the trial of colonel Henley which was published in Boston about the time. It must be a very scarce book, but I believe you may procure a copy from the military philosophical society of the United States—to my certain knowledge one was presented to it; or you may consult general Heath's memoirs; which, whatever else may be said about them, are a very faithful recital of facts.

One of the old Revolutionary Army.

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR.

The preceding letter is inserted as well in respect to the character supported by the writer, as to elucidate the facts belonging to the things alluded to; though we very respectfully, yet decidedly, differ in opinion with him as to the scope or bearing of the paragraphs (extracted from an eastern paper) that gave rise to his remarks. For really, instead of considering the anecdotes as an "insidious attempt to diminish the horrors and odium of the Dartmoor massacre," we supposed that (represented even as they were) they were calculated only to shew a superiority of conduct in our people on that occasion compared with that of the British in the murders of Dartmoor; and we utterly disclaim any other inducement in giving place to them.

REMARKS ON THE ABOVE.

Although in the first volume of the Weekly Register, page 130, we gave a pretty full account of the hideous church establishment of England, it may be profitable to revive the subject, and offer some additional facts and remarks to elucidate its enormity.

The whole exhibits 25 Wings in the church, for which the people at large pay the enormous sum of 164,900 pounds sterling, to which add the living of the bishop of Sodor and Man, with about 1000*l.* more, and we have a grand aggregate for the support of twenty-six fat priests, of 165,900*l.*; equal to $736,596 per annum.

It is worthy of notice that these livings produced about 100,000 dollars more per annum in 1813, than they did five years before—being estimated in the statement above alluded to at 600,000 dollars. To which, for various interesting particulars, the reader is invited to refer.

Let us compare this with the facts that belong to the pay and emoluments of the dignities of the United States; that we may see the merit of those who grumble at our expenditures, and extol the system of the British government:

1	The President of the United States	$25,000
1	Vice President	5,000
4	Secretaries of state, treasury, war and navy	19,000
8	Chief justice, six associate justices and attorney general	28,000
21	District judges of the courts of the United States	51,000
23	Territorial judges	27,500
218	Senate and house of representatives of the United States	283,000
6	Governors of territories of the U. S.	14,500
18	Governors of the states of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, Vermont, N. York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Kentucky, Tennessee, Ohio and Louisiana, whose average salaries are about 2,200 S each	39,600
120	Supposed amount of chancellors and superior judges of the several states, at 2000	240,000
18	Attornies generals	18,000

438 persons Dollars. 730,600

From this it appears, that four hundred and thirty eight persons, of the highest dignity in the government in the United State; and of the individual states, and filling all the most responsible and most active offices, are supported for a less sum than is paid by the people of England to maintain twenty six fellows in the church—a lazy, idle, sottish and gluttonous pack, whose united labor "for the good of souls," is not equal to that of one honest itinerant Methodist preacher.

It is calculated that the church establishment receives in rent and tithes, about one eighth of the whole rental of all the kingdom of England. What a gormandizer is the church—ONE EIGHTH of ALL! The chiefs of those who thus fleece the flocks they are appointed to guard, are mostly appointed by the king, that is, the ministry—and we may easily suppose what pliant creatures they are—ready to "give scripture" for deeds of deepest villainy. They are not worse than other government priests; but no better than the hound-inquisitors of Spain and Italy. The spirit that supports them all is that of ravening wolves. How else could they eat up the substance of the people?

Such is among the most accursed fruit that the tree of monarchy bears.

In contrast to these fat things, let us bear in mind that at least two fifths of the laboring classes in England are paupers—and well they may be.

MARSHAL BLUCHER'S ACCOUNT OF THE BATTLES OF THE 16TH AND 18TH.

[Translated from Dutch papers for the Boston Daily Advertiser.]

Narrative of the operations of the Prussian army of the Lower Rhine.

On the 15th instant Napoleon after having assembled on the day before, between Maubeuge and Beaumont, five corps of the army and the different corps of the guard, commenced hostilities. The points of concentration of the four corps of the Prussian army were Fleurus, Namur, Cimsy and Hanoye, the situation of which permitted the army to unite upon either of the points in twenty-four hours.

On the 15th, Napoleon advanced by Thuin on both banks of the Sambre against Charleroy. General Ziethen had assembled the first corps of the army near Fleurus, and sustained that day a vigorous combat with the enemy, who after having taken Charleroy, directed his march upon Fleurus.—General Ziethen maintained himself in the position near that place. Field-marshal Blucher, with the intention of giving as soon as possible a great battle to the enemy, directed the three other corps of the Prussian army upon Sambreville, one and a half leagues from Fleurus, where the 2d and 3d corps ought to have arrived on the 15th, and the 4th on the 16th.

Lord Wellington had assembled his army near Acli and Nivelles, which put it in his power to give assistance to field-marshal Blucher, in case battle had been given on the 15th.

June 15.—Battle of Ligny.—The Prussian army was posted on the heights of Brie and Sambreville, and in front of the latter place, and occupied with imposing forces the villages of Ligny and St. Amand situated upon its front. In the mean time the 3d corps only effected its junction. The 4th, which had been stationed between Liege and Hanoye had been retarded in its march by many circumstances and had not yet arrived. Nevertheless the field-marshal Blucher resolved on giving battle, believing that lord Wellington had already put in motion to support him a strong division of his army, as well as all his reserve, stationed in the vicinity of Brussels, and that the 4th corps of the Prussian army was on the point of arriving.

The battle began at 3 o'clock in the afternoon. The enemy deployed above 130,000 men. The Prussian army was 80,000. The village of St. Amand was the first point attacked by the enemy, who after a vigorous resistance succeeded in gaining possession of it. He then turned his efforts upon Ligny. It is a large village, strongly built, situated along the stream of that name. There commenced a conflict which ought to be placed in the number of the most obstinate mentioned in history. Villages have often been seen taken and retaken; but here the combat continued for five hours in the village itself, and the movements forward and backward were made with the greatest rapidity. On each side new troops were constantly advancing. Each army had behind that part of the village which it occupied, great masses of infantry which kept up the conflict, and constantly strengthened themselves by reinforcements from the rear, and from the heights upon the right and the left. About 200 pieces of cannon, from the two sides, were pointed at the village, which was on fire in many places at once. From time to time, the battle extended along the whole line, the enemy having likewise brought up a great force against the 3d corps. The height of the action was, the whole time near Ligny.

Affairs appeared to take a favourable turn for the Prussian troops, a part of the village of St. Amand having been retaken from the French by a battalion which the field-marshal Blucher commanded in person, in consequence of which advantage we regained a height abandoned after the fall of St. Amand. Yet at Ligny the battle continued with the same fury. It appeared that the issue of the conflict must depend upon the arrival of the English troops, or at least of the 4th corps of the Prussian army. In fact, the arrival of this last corps would have furnished the field-marshal with the means of making an immediate attack with the right wing, from which might be expected great success. But intelligence was received that the English division destined to support us was vigorously attacked by a corps of the French army, and that it was with difficulty that it maintained its position at Quatre Bras. The 4th corps did not make its appearance, so that we were compelled to sustain alone the attack of an enemy much superior in numbers.

The evening was already far advanced, and the conflict near Ligny was the whole time prolonged with the same animosity and the same equality of success. The arrival of the necessary succors was invoked in vain. The danger became more pressing every hour. All the divisions were in action or had already been engaged, and there was not a single corps to support them. On a sudden a division of the enemy's infantry, under favor of the night, without being perceived went round the village, at the same time that some cuirassiers forced the passage on the other side, and took in the rear the body of our army stationed behind the houses. This surprise on the part of the enemy became decisive, especially at a moment when our cavalry stationed likewise on a height behind the village, was repulsed by the enemy's cavalry, after repeated attacks.

Our infantry posted behind Ligny, although compelled to a retreat, did not suffer any depression, either from the surprise of the enemy in the midst of the darkness, a circumstance which exaggerates to a man all the dangers to which he is exposed, nor by the idea of finding itself surrounded on all sides. Formed into masses, they repulsed with coolness all attacks of the cavalry, and retired in good order to the heights, whence it continued its retrograde movement upon Tilly. In consequence of the sudden charge of the enemy's cavalry, many of our cannon in their precipitate retreat had taken directions which conducted them by defiles, in which they were necessarily disordered; and in this manner 15 cannon fell into the hands of the enemy. At a quarter of a league from the field of battle the army was reformed. The army did not hazard a pursuit. The village of Brie remained in our occupation all night, as likewise Sambreville, where general Thielman engaged the 4th corps of the French army, and at break of day began slowly to retreat for Gemblours, at which place the 4th corps of the army under general Bulow had arrived in the night.—The 1st and 2nd corps marched in the morning past the defile of Mount St. Guibert. Our loss in killed and wounded was great. The enemy made no prisoners except a part of our wounded.

We lost the battle but not our honor. Our soldiers fought with a bravery which left nothing to be desired; and their self-possession was preserved, so that each one retained an entire confidence in his own strength. This day the field-marshal Blucher exposed himself to great dangers. An attack of cavalry, conducted by himself, failed of success, while the cavalry of the enemy was pushing with rigor, a shot penetrated the horse of the field marshal. The animal, far from being arrested in his course by this wound, plunged with the greatest fury, until he fell down dead. The field marshal stunned by this violent fall, remained entangled under his horse. The enemy's cuirassiers were approaching following up their advantage. Our last horsemen had already passed by the marshal; an adjutant alone remained near him, and had just descended from his horse, resolved to share his fate.—The danger was great, but heaven was propitious to us. The enemy continuing the charge passed rapidly near the field marshal without perceiving him; and the next instant, a second charge of our cavalry having repulsed them, they repassed with the same precipitation, and as before without perceiving him. They with some difficulty disengaged the field marshal from under his horse, which was dead, and he soon remounted, upon the horse of a dragoon.

On the evening of the 17th the Prussian army concentrated in the environs of Wavre. Napoleon moved in pursuit of Lord Wellington upon the great road which leads from Charleroy to Brussels. An English division sustained on the same day a violent conflict with the enemy. Lord Wellington had taken position upon the road of Brussels, having his right wing supported against Braine la Lieux, his centre near mount St John, and his left wing against la Haye Saint. Lord Wellington wrote to the field marshal that he was resolved to offer battle in this position if he would support him with two corps of his army. The marshal promised to come with his whole army. He even proposed, that if the enemy did not attack, the allies should themselves make the attack the next day, with all their forces united. From this it may be judged how far the Prussian army had been disorganized by the battle of the 16th, and how much its moral was weakened. Thus ended the 17th.

Battle of the 18th of June.—At break of day the Prussian army was put in motion. The 4th, and 5th corps of the army marched by St. Lambert, where they were to take a covered position in the forest situated near Frichemont, to take the enemy in the rear, when the occasion should be favorable for it. The 1st corps was to operate by Ohain, upon the right flank of the enemy. The 3d corps was to follow slowly, to furnish assistance in case of necessity. The battle commenced at about 10 o'clock in the morning. The English army occupied the heights of mount St. John, the French was upon the heights of Planchenort. The first was about 80,000 strong, the enemy exceeded 130,000. In a short time the battle became general through the whole line. It appeared that Napoleon had the design of throwing back the left wing upon the centre, and of thus effecting a separation of the English army from the Prussians which he thought was in retreat upon Maestricht. For this purpose he had placed the greatest part of his reserve in the centre against his right wing, and at this point he attacked with fury. The English army fought with bravery which it is impossible to surpass. The repeated charges of the old guard had no effect against the intrepidity of the Scotch regiments, and in every shock the French cavalry was overthrown by the English cavalry.

But the numerical superiority of the enemy was too great. Napoleon was continually advancing considerable masses, and with whatever firmness the English maintained their position, efforts so extraordinary must have a termination.

It was half past 4 o'clock. Excessive difficulties which the passage of the defile of St. Lambert occasioned, had considerably retarded the march of the Prussians columns, so that only two brigades of the 4th corps of the army had arrived at the covered position which had been assigned to them. The decisive moment had arrived, and there was not an instant to be lost. The generals did not suffer it to escape. They resolved to attack immediately with the troops that had arrived at their destination. Consequently general Bulow with two brigades and a corps of cavalry advanced rapidly upon the rear of the right wing of the enemy. The enemy did not lose his presence of mind; he immediately turned his reserve against us, and a murderous conflict commenced also at this point. For a long time the battle was uncertain, and the struggle with the English army continued with no less violence.

About 6 o'clock we received intelligence that general Thielemann with the 3d corps of the army was attacked near Wavre by a very considerable corps of the enemy, and that the possession of the town was already disputed. The field marshal did not suffer this news to trouble him. It was on this spot, and no where else, that the affair was to be decided. A struggle kept up with a constantly equal animosity, and always supported by new troops, could alone secure victory, and if it was gained here, every disadvantage whatever near Wavre would be of little importance. Consequently all the columns continued their movements.

It was half past 7, and the issue of the battle was yet uncertain. All the 4th corps of the army and a part of the 2d corps under general Pich had arrived in succession. The French troops fought to desperation; meantime some irregularity was perceived in their movements, and it was remarked that several pieces of cannon were on the retreat. At this moment the first columns of the corps of general Ziethen arrived at their points of attack near the village of Smouhen, on the right flank of the enemy, and immediately charged. This movement decided the fate of the enemy. His right wing was penetrated in all parts, and it abandoned its positions. Our troops sprung forward with a charging step, and assailed them on every part, while the whole English line moved in advance.

Circumstances were extremely favorable for the attack made by the Prussian army. The ground was in form of an amphitheatre, so that the artillery could freely extend its fire from behind a number of heights, gradually disposed above one another, thro' the intervals of which, the troops descended into the plain, formed in brigades, and in the greatest order; while new corps were continually unfolding, as they came from the forest behind us. The enemy preserved the means of retreat until the village of Planchenort in its rear, which was defended by the guard, was taken by assault, after many very bloody attacks. From that time the retreat became a rout, which soon communicated to the whole French army, which in its frightful confusion, hurled along every thing that attempted to stop it, and could not be distinguished from the flight of an army of savages.

It was then half past nine o'clock. The field marshal assembled all the superior officers, and gave them orders to put the last man and the last horse, on the pursuit of the enemy. The head of the army accelerated its march. The French army pursued, without relaxation, was absolutely disorganized. The highway has the aspect of an immense shipwreck. It was covered with an incalculable number of cannon, caissons, carriages baggage, arms and wrecks of every kind. Those of the enemy who wished to repose a short time, and who had not expected so prompt a pursuit, were chased again from their new bivouacs. In some villages they attempted to rest, but as soon as they heard the noise of the drum or the sound of the trumpet, they hastened away, or threw themselves into houses. There was a bright moon, which greatly favored the pursuit, for the whole march was but a continual chase given the fugitives, either in the fields or in the houses.

At Genappe the enemy was entrenched with cannon and overturned chariots. On our approach, we heard all at once, in the town, a great noise, and movement of carriages. At the entrance we were received by a brisk fire of musquetry. We replied by a few discharges of cannon, followed by a hurrah, and an instant after the town was ours. It was there that among many other equipages, the carriage of Napoleon was taken, which he had just quitted to mount his horse; in which, such was his precipitation, that he lost his sword and his hat. The affairs lasted in this manner until break of day. Nearly 40,000 men in the greatest rout, the remnant of the whole army, escaped safe by Charleroy, part without arms, carrying with them only 27 pieces of their numerous artillery.

The enemy passed in his flight, his fortified places, the only defence of his frontier, which are now in possession of our arms.

At 3 o'clock, Napoleon had sent off from the field of battle a courier for Paris, with the news that victory was beyond doubt. Some hours after, he was without an army. We have not an exact knowledge of the loss of the enemy. It is sufficient to know, that two-thirds of this army are killed, wounded or prisoners. Of the number of the last are generals Duhesme, Montou and Compans. At this moment about 300 cannon and 500 caissons are in our power.

Few victories have been so complete; and surely there is no example of an army, two days after having lost a battle, having engaged in such a conflict and so gloriously sustained it. Honor to the troops capable of so much constancy and valor! In the midst of the position occupied by the French army, and upon the very height is a farm called La Belle Alliance. The march of all the Prussians columns was directed upon that farm, which could be seen from all sides. It was there that Napoleon was during the battle; it was there that he gave his orders, that he flattered himself with victory; and it was there that his fall was decided. It was there too, that in the dark, and by a happy chance, field marshal Blucher and the duke of Wellington met, and saluted each other as conquerors.

In commemoration of the alliance which this day exists between the English and Prussian nations, of the union of the two armies and their reciprocal confidence, the field marshal has desired that this battle may bear the name of La Belle Alliance, the happy alliance.

By order of field marshal Blucher.

GEN. GENISENEAU,

From the London Public Ledger.

CONGRESS OF VIENNA.—The "New French official Gazette," dated Wednesday the 19th of July, is filled to the extent of 20 pages, with the acts of the congress of Vienna. It begins by stating, that the powers who have signed the treaty concluded at Paris, May 30, 1814, in conformity with the 32d article of that act, with the princes and states of their allies, in order to complete the dispositions of the said treaty, and to add the arrangements necessary by the state in which Europe remained at the conclusion of the late war, and desiring to comprehend in one common transaction, the different results of their negotiations, and to give effect to them by their reciprocal ratifications, have authorised their plenipotentiaries to in a general instrument the dispositions of greater and more permanent interest and to join to that act as integral parts of the arrangement of congress the treaties, conventions, declarations and other particular acts, such as they are found cited in the present treaty.

There then follows the names and titles of the plenipotentiaries.

The first article relates to the annexation of the duchy of Varsovia to the empire of Russia. This duchy, with the exception of provinces and districts otherwise disposed of, is irrevocably to be possessed by the emperor of all the Russias, who is to join to his other titles that of king of Poland, and the Polonese subjects of Russia, Austria and Prussia, are to be represented in the national institution.

The 2d article refers to the limits of the grand duchy of Posen, and describes the line of territory which shall be under the sovereignty of the king of Prussia.

The 3d article relates to the salt mines of Wieliczka, which the emperor of Russia is to have the full property of.

The 4th article settles the boundaries between Galicia and the Russian territories.

By the 5th article the emperor of Russia restores the circles of Tarnopol to the emperor of Austria.

The 6th declares Cracovia a free city.

The 7th limits the territories of Cracovia.

The 8th grants the privileges of free commerce to Podgarza.

The 9th guarantees the neutrality of Cracovia.

The 10th relates to the constitution of the academy and bishopric of Cracovia.

The 11th grants a general amnesty.

The 12th, in conformity with the preceding article, declares that all sequestrations shall be taken off, and that all proceedings against persons for political acts shall be null and void.

The 13th contains an exception where definitive sentences upon appeal have been announced.

The 14th provides for the free navigation of the canals and rivers, throughout the whole extent of ancient Poland.

The 15th refers to the cession of Saxony to Prussia; these appear to be very considerable.

The 16th settles the titles which have been assumed by the king of Prussia, who is to add to his titles those of the duke of Saxony, Landgrave of Thuringen, Margrave of the two Lusatias, and count of Heneberg. The king of Saxony is to continue the title of Upper Lusatia; and, eventually, some other titles.

The 17th contains an express guarantee, on the part of Russia, Great Britain and France, of all the cessions to the king of Prussia in full sovereignty.

By the 18th Austria renounces the rights of sovereignty over Lusatia.

The 19th contains, on the part of the king of Prussia and the king of Saxony, a reciprocal renunciation of feudal rights.

The 20th allows the liberty of emigration to persons, and the exportation of their property.

The 21st guarantees religious establishments, and establishments for public instruction, in the districts ceded by Saxony.

The 22d grants a general amnesty to the subjects of the king of Saxony.

The 23d designates the provinces of which Prussia is to have possession. The enumeration extends to some length.

The 24th and 25th describe the territory to be enjoyed by Prussia on the banks of the Rhine.

By the 26th the title of king of Hanover is confirmed to the king of Great Britain.

The 27th relates to the cessions of Prussia to Hanover.

The 28th is a renunciation on the part of Prussia to the chapter of St. Pierre-a-Narten.

The 29th specifies the cessions of the king of Great Britain and Hanover to the king of Prussia of a part of the duchy of Lauenbourg.

The 30th provides for the free navigation of the commerce of the port of Embden.

The 31st delineates the military routes through the territories of Prussia and the king of Hanover.

The 32d merely contains minor regulations respecting the bailiwick of Meppen.

The 33d refers to the cessions to be made to the duke of Oldenburg.

The 34th gives the title of grand duke of Oldenburg to the duke of Holstein Oldenburg.

The 35th and 36th settle the titles of the grand dukes of Mecklenburgh, Schwerin and Strelitz, and the grand duke of Saxe Wiemar.

The 37th specifies the cessions to be made to the grand duke of Saxe Wiemar.

The 38th and 39th relate to the same object.

The 40th provides for the cessions of the ancient department of Fulda.

The 41st has merely reference to the preceding article.

The 42d conveys the city of Wetzlar in full sovereignty to the king of Prussia.

The 43d contains arrangements respecting the ancient circle of Westphalia.

The 44th and 45th contain a disposition relative to the grand duchy of Wurtzburg and the principality of Aschaffenburg, in favor of Bavaria, and the establishment of the prince primate.

By the 46th, it is declared that the city of Frankfort shall be a free city, and form part of the Germanic league.

The 47th grants indemnities to the grand duke of Hesse.

Then follow a variety of articles relative to the Germanic confederation—the regulation with respect to election—the mode of collecting votes—the residence of the diet of Frankfort—the formation of fundamental laws—the maintenance of peace in Germany—these extend to, and include the 64th article; there are then a variety of articles respecting the limits of the Netherlands, and the grand duchy of Luxemburg—the duchy of Bouillon, and the cessions to the house of Nassau, in Germany, and the union of the Belgic provinces.

At the 74th article commences the regulations relative to the affairs of Switzerland.

The 77th provides for the rights of the inhabitants of the principality of Berne; they are to enjoy the same political and civil rights they formerly possessed.

The 79th relates to the arrangements between France and Geneva.

The 80th refers to the cessions of the king of Sardinia to the canton of Geneva.

There is then in the 83d article, an arrangement relative to the funds placed in England.

The 85th describes the limits of the estates of the king of Sardinia.

The 87th gives the king of Sardinia the title of the king of Geneva.

The next material article is the 93d, which restores the ancient Austrian possessions, including all the territory which had been ceded by Austria by former treaties; and then there is an enumeration of the territories so restored.

The 96th provides for the navigation of the Po. There then follow a variety of arrangements which our limits do not allow us to state.

The 105th and following articles relate to the affairs of Portugal. The restitution of Olivenza and other restitutions on the part of the prince regent of Portugal. These arrangements are continued and detailed with a minuteness which we find it impossible to follow, on account of our circumscribed space.

By the 119th article, all the powers assembled at congress, as well as the princes and free cities who have concurred in the arrangements, are invited to accede to it.

The 20th article referring to this treaty being in the French language, provides that it shall not be a precedent for subsequent treaties or negotiations, being in a language different from what they formerly used to be.

The 21st article provides that the ratifications of the treaty shall be exchanged within six months, and by the court of Portugal in a year if possible. The treaty is to be deposited at Vienna, among the archives of the court and state of his imperial and apostolic majesty, in order that it may be referred to by any of the courts of Europe who may wish to consult the original text. It is dated Vienna, the 9th June, 1815, and then follow the signatures of the plenipotentiaries.

The above but faintly describes the cuttings of the "illustrious" carvers. The people in general will not be able to comprehend their extent until we get a new map of Europe, to compare with that we have at present—then shall we see the moderation of the "legitimists" and their respect for the sovereignty of nations.—Some supplementary articles may be expected, affecting France.

FROM LATE ENGLISH PAPERS.

GERMAN ACT OF CONFEDERATION.

Art. 1. The sovereign princes and free cities of Germany, including there majesties the emperor of Austria and the kings of Prussia, Denmark, and the Netherlands, namely the emperor of Austria and the king of Prussia, for those of their possessions which formerly belonged to the German empire, the king of Denmark for Holstein, the king of the Netherlands for the grand Duchy of Luxemburg, unite themselves into a perpetual league, which shall be called the German confederation, II: The object thereof is the maintenance of the internal and external security of Germany, and of the independence and inviolability of the different German states.

III. The members of the confederation have, as such, equal rights: they bind themselves, all equally to maintain the act of confederation.

IV. The affairs of the confederation shall be managed by a general assembly, in which all the members of the confederation shall be represented by their plenipotentiaries, who shall each have one vote either severally, or as representing more than one member as follows:

Austria 1, Prussia 1, Bavaria 1, Saxony 1, Hanover 1, Wurtemberg 1, Baden 1, Electorate of Hesse 1, Grand Duchy of Hesse 1, Denmark for Holstein, 1, the Netherlands for Luxemburg 1, the grand Duke and Ducal Saxon houses 1, Brunswick and Nassau, continue to enjoy the rights already extended to them.

1, Mecklenburg Schwerin and Mecklenburg Stralitz 1, Holstein, Oldenburg, Anstein, Reuss, Schaumburg, Lippe, and Waldeck 1, the free cities Frankfurt, Lubbeck, Bremen and Hamburg 1, total seven-teen votes.

V. Austria has the presidency in the diet of the confederation; every member of the league is empowered to make propositions, and bring them under discussion; and the presiding member is bound to submit such proposition for deliberation within a fixed period.

VI. When these propositions relate to the abolition or alteration of the fundamental laws of the confederation, or to regulations relating to the act of confederation in itself, then the diet forms itself into a full committee, when the different component members shall have the following votes proportioned to the extent of their territories:

Austria, Prussia, Saxony, Bavaria, Hanover, and Wurtemberg four votes each; Baden, Electorate of Hesse, Grand Duchy of Hesse, Helstein, and Lixemburg, 3 votes each; Brunswick, Mecklenburg-Schwerin and Nassau 2 votes each; Saxe Weimar, and a great number of minor German princes, with the free towns, 1 vote each; total 69 votes.

VII. Questions in the diet shall be decided by a simple majority of the votes on the ordinary occasions, the president to have the casting votes; but when in full committee, the question must be decided by a majority of at least three fourths.

VIII. The diet of the confederation has its sitting at Frankfurt on the Maine; its opening is fixed for the 1st of September, 1813.

IX. The first business of the diet, after its opening, will be the formation of the organic regulations of the confederation, in regard to its external, military, and internal relations.

X. Every member of the confederation engages to assist in protecting not only all Germany, but every separate state of the league against any attack, and reciprocally to guarantee to each other the whole of their possessions, included within the confederation.

After war has been once declared by the confederation, no member can enter into separate negotiations with the enemy nor conclude a separate armistice or peace.

Although the members possess the right of alliance of every kind, yet they bind themselves to enter into no treaties hostile to the security of the confederation or that of any confederate state.

The members of the league also bind themselves not to make war on each other under any pretext, nor to decide their differences by force, but to bring them under the consideration and decision of the diet.

Besides the preceding articles, there are a variety of others relating to the internal regulation of Germany, of which the following are the most interesting:—

XIII. In all the states of the confederation a constitutional assembly of the states general shall be established.

XVI. Diversity of Christian religious faith, in the states of the German confederation, can occasion no difference in respect to the enjoyment of civil and political rights.

The diet will take into consideration in what way the civil amelioration of the professors of the Jewish religion may best be effected; and how the enjoyment of all civil rights in return for the performance of all civil duties may be most effectually secured to them in the states of the Confederation; in the mean time the professors of this faith shall

a. The possession of landed property out of the state in which they reside, without being subjected to greater taxes or charges than those of the native subjects of such state.

b. The right of free emigration from one German Confederate state to another, which shall consent to receive them for subjects; and also the right of entering into the civil or military service of any such confederate state; both rights, however, to be enjoyed only in so far as no previous obligation to military service in their native country shall stand in the way.

c. The diet on its first meeting shall occupy itself with the formation of some uniform regulations relative to the freedom of the press, and the securing of the rights of authors and publishers against oppressors.

XIX. The members of the confederation also engage, on the first meeting of the diet, to take into consideration the state of commerce and intercourse between the different states of the confederation as well as that of navigation, on the principles adopted by the congress of Vienna.

The above act was concluded, and signed at Vienna, on the 8th of June, 1815.

BONAPARTE. The master of a vessel arrived at New-York, was informed by the captain of a British frigate in the English channel, just from Plymouth, that Bonaparte and one of the principal persons of his suite, had been landed from the Bellerophon and sent up to London, under a strong military escort—and is probably lodged in the tower, where some of the rooms had been elegantly fitted up.

Bonaparte's effects. Previous to Bonaparte's departure for Rochefort, he demanded permission to carry with him 2200 volumes of the library of Trianon, together with the superb Egyptian manuscripts of Denon, and the Greek iconography of M. Visconti. He was allowed to take them and attended in person to their packing; and was said to be particularly careful of those which treated on American subjects.

His effects were transported in six waggons; two of them said to be loaded with gold and silver specie, and plate. The Paris papers affirm that he created a million of annuities to raise the money for the expedition.

A CASE IN POINT. From the Democratic Press.—Frequent enquiry has been made, what should be done with Bonaparte? His surrender to one of the allies is supposed by some writers to put him at the mercy of the whole body. I have in recollection that lord Rawdon had ordered the execution of colonel Haines at Charleston for a breach of parole. The truth in that case was, that there was no breach of parole; yet colonel Haines was executed, notwithstanding the intercessions of a vast number of ladies and gentlemen.

Congress ordered, that if ever lord Rawdon, now earl Moira, governor general of India, should fall into their power, he should be given up to the mauichee for execution upon being identified.

Rawdon was captured in an English frigate by the fleet under the command of commodore de Grasse and brought by that fleet into the Chesapeake, at the time that a combined attack was about to be made upon lord Cornwallis, at York and Gloucester.

As soon as it was known at the lines that Raw-don captured, general Washington demanded of the French navy to deliver him up to him for execution. A delay took place of a few hours, in which time lord Rawdon was sent off for France, and the humanity of De Grasse saved his life, for Washington claimed the victim for a just retaliation.

Allied powers as France and America were at that period, yet France screened Rawdon from a public execution—now, shall then Britain give up Bonaparte to her allies.

An Old Revolutionary Soldier.

The state of France.—The London ministerial papers already grumble at Louis, because he has not yet hung up some of the jacobins and rebels. It does not certainly appear that any distinguished character had been even arrested as late as the 25th of July. These papers say that the ministry of the interior had been twice offered to Carnot and twice refused. Ney and Soult have gone to their country houses. Talleyrand is prime minister, and Fouche has one of the most important posts in the realm. It observes “the selection of the ministers is the triumph of jacobinism.”

The Prussians are busy in packing up the articles late in the French museum, that Bonaparte brought from their country as the spoils of war. The carrying off of these monuments of the arts was called barbarous—what shall we say of those who wantonly destroy them?

The Prussians, at Paris, would appear to be almost as gothic as the British at Washington and Alexandria. We have already noticed their contributions—but about the 10th of July they had prepared to blow up the magnificent bridge which Bonaparte had caused to be built, and called Jena, though the king has changed its name! Every thing was prepared for the purpose—they resisted all the influence of Wellington and others of the “most august,” but the presence of the emperor Alexander, at 11 at night, saved the structure. But the Prussians were more excusable for their attempt to destroy this bridge, than the British were to burn our capitol.

The London Courier of July 19, says—“We are happy to find that the emperor of Russia has named one of his officers to be governor of Lorraine—[Louis XVIII being king of France!] This is symptomatic, we trust, of the separation of that, as well as other provinces from France. We should be glad to see *Austria appoint a governor of Aisace.”

Three acts of justice are expected from the hands of the allied sovereigns; or the blood and treasures of their subjects will have flowed in vain.

1. The punishment of Bonaparte.

2. The payment by France of all the expences of the war, together with the surrender of all the works of art and science which she has pillaged from other countries; and 3dly. The diminution of her territorial powers to such a point as shall render it impracticable for her to carry into effect those designs which she has and always will have at heart, of attacking the independence and security of other nations.

Disbandment of free corps, &c. Louis, by the grace of God, &c. issued an ordinance to-day, of the following purport: the battalions of national guards d'elite raised in the several departments since the 20th March, 1815, shall be disbanded.

The conscripts of 1815, shall in like manner return to their homes, &c.

*This has been done!—baron de Hesse has been appointed—and Louis is king of France!

All the free corps shall be disbanded. All commanders, officers and soldiers, of these corps, shall retire to their homes.

DISARMING THE PEOPLE. In recommending to the mayors of the department of Iser, the strict execution of the decree of departmental commission which ordains the disarming of all the communes, M. Randon de Saint-Marcel, commissary-general of police, adds the following instruction:

“Fowling-pieces do not appear as comprised in the general disposition of the first article; nevertheless you will take them away from the inhabitants of your commune whom I shall particularly designate at the foot of the present.”—Journal de Paris.

The fortifications about Paris are already demolished. There is a report that 150,000 Russians are to remain in France to civilize its population.

There are good reasons to believe, from what we see in the British papers, that France will be partitioned. Alsace and Lorraine seem determined to be taken from her. It is probable, also, that they will be completely divest the country of all its military stores, arms, &c.

A letter from a distinguished American officer now in London, has the following pointed paragraph—

“The rumors from France are contradictory; one moment they are without an army, and then they are in great force on the Loire: but there is one thing certain, they are playing the devil in Paris by contribution, &c. &c. Such conduct will only exasperate the rest of the nation to hold out the longer, for Paris was given up under a convention, that the allies were not to enter it, yet they have done so, and quartered the soldiers in every house. What would any nation think of a king who would suffer a foreign general to lay contributions on the inhabitants of his capital, and he residing in it at the same time, which has been the case with Blucher at the head of the Prussians; this convinces me that the English had but a secondary hand in marching to Paris, and that the Prussians, not the British, as it was stated here, drove the French army before them through France.”

The latter opinion seems supported by a host of testimony, and the fact appears clear, that Wellington's army would have been annihilated but for the timely arrival of the Prussian force, on the evening of the 18th.

Contributions. The following may serve as a specimen of the proof of the fact that the allies made war only against Bonaparte!

“A contribution of FOUR MILLIONS has astonished the department of the Upper Rhine: it must be completely discharged by the end of this month (July.) Besides these payments, its commerce is assessed for 360,000 francs, under penalty of 4000 francs for every day of its postponement; Mulhouse for 100,000, and Colnear for 280,000 francs. Every inhabitant of Mont-Blanc must pay an extraordinary assessment of 60 centimes per franc of their contributions to defray the various purposes of the army, &c.”

The allied armies in France were estimated at 700,000 men, and more were yet entering. They are levying immense contributions in every part they had reached—treating it in every respect as a conquered country. And, indeed, so it is—Is it possible that Louis is its sovereign, in his capital, while foreigners are levying contributions upon it? Pshaw! Louis is the slave and creature of the allies, and not the king of France.

FREEDOM OF THE PRESS. From the Journal de Pa- ris of July 24.—A journal gives an imperfect list of the responsible editors of newspapers, who have just been appointed by his excellency the minister of police. They are Messrs. Couchery, of the Journal des Debats; Manuel* of the Journal de Paris; Cheron, of the Gazette de France; Mutin, of the Quotidienne; Anger, of the Journal General de France; Jay, of the Independant; Arnault, of the Aristarque; Peuchet* of the Journal du Commerce; Davigny, of the Journal des Campagnes, and the Narrateur; Pellence, of the Nain-Jaune, Nain-Vert, the Journal des Dames and the Censeur des Censeurs; in short, the most petty hand-bills must have an editor answerable for their contents.

There was a great deal more fighting in France after the battle of Waterloo than was expected—but the details are now uninteresting. For the subjugation of the country seems complete, and the "deliverers" are destroying the substance of France. Some fortified places, however, were yet besieged by the Austrians, about the 20th of July. An article from Geneva, dated July 16, says—"Many vehicles with wounded arrive at Basle. The passage of troops are repeated every day without intermission; 60,000 Austrians and 18,000 Russians are approaching, destined to reinforce the army of Alsace, reduced by frequent combats. The Rhine swelled by copious rains, has broken up the bridge of boats at Rhinweiler, an event that has thrown back nearly to one point the troops who are to cross the river.

Marshal Ney is considered by many in France to have played a traitor's part in the battle of Waterloo. We have published his account of that memorable affair—the following, from the Journal de Paris, has reference to it:

"A letter inserted in the Oracle of Bruxelles, contradicts some assertions in that which was addressed some time ago by marshal Ney to the duke of Otranto.—The marshal affirms in this letter that he was without money to commence the campaign.—The correspondent of the Oracle says, on the contrary, that a small pocket book found with the horse of marshal Ney at Mount St. John, mentions thirty-seven thousand francs received some days before by this general, for the extraordinary charges of war. The poor man!"

A Vienna paper informs, that the courts of Madrid and Naples have demanded some diamonds and other valuable effects of the wife of Murat, a prisoner at Trieste; and that the Austrian court has given orders to examine her abode, and make out an inventory of the articles therein.

The emperor Alexander has presented two swords, supposed to be the richest and the most splendid ever seen, to the duke of Wellington and prince Blucher.

The Moniteur contains a letter to the editor from general Alix, in which he says "the report of marshal Grouchy contains an error which affects me; and which I hasten to rectify: I was not killed at the attack of Wavre; I was not even there!"

A letter from Bordeaux has the following remark:—On the 8th, the Bourbon family, carried on the shields of strangers, have re-entered the metropolis.

The Spanish patriots.—We learn, in a London paper, that many Spaniards, illustrious for their exertions in support of their country, which having rescued, they were forced to abandon to save their lives, from the "legitimate" fool they put on the throne, are in London, in great want. It appears that those of the proscribed, who had the good luck to reach France, were liberally provided for by Bonaparte; the man that they so gallantly opposed.

*It is stated that these have refused the royal bounty, rejecting their appointments,

The Dublin Evening Post reproaches the duplicity of the allies, who declared at Vienna, that they only made war on Bonaparte and meant not to impose a ruler on France, but under the walls of Paris, their generals inform the deputies of the provisional government, "that all the sovereigns had engaged to replace Louis XVIII. on the throne of France."

Gold. There are many reasons to believe that Castlereagh contributed as much to the defeat of Napoleon at Waterloo by gold, as Wellington did by steel. It is thought that some in whom he most confided, were purchased; which is likely enough.

The Austrian force that entered France under Swartzenburg, was about 100,000 strong.

Among the wonderful things of the day, we learn by a London paper of July 24, that there was a person in that city who left France about a month before, who insists that he is the real dauphin of France, supposed to have died in the temple in the early part of the revolution. He requested an interview with the duchess d'Angouleme, but she refused it. Be the fact as it may, she had rather, perhaps, be the wife than the sister of a king.

Cuirassiers.—As the cuirassiers of the imperial guards are often mentioned in French bulletins, we presume the following brief description of their armour, size, and character, which we copy from a late London paper, will not be unacceptable to our readers.—N. Y. Com. Adv.

"The cuirassiers of the French imperial guards, are all arrayed in armour, the front cuirass in the form of a pigeon's breast, so as to effectually turn off a musket shot, though fired ever so near, owing to its being kept so bright; the back cuirass is made to fit the back; they weigh from nine to eleven lbs. each, according to the size of the man, and are stuffed inside with a pad; they fit on by a kind of fish-scaled clasp, and are put off and on in an instant; they have helmets the same as our horse guards, and straight long swords and pistols, but no carabines; and if there is a good horse to be found they are sure to have him. They are all chosen men, must be five feet seven French, (above six feet English) have served in three campaigns, twelve years in the service, and of good character."

A number of anecdotes are published in the London papers to shew that Bonaparte was very minutely informed of the condition and force of the British army near Waterloo, and that he calculated upon a complete victory, and immediately after expected to enter Brussels, where, they say preparations were actually made for his reception. They also publish the following proclamation which the Prussian hussars got wet from the press:

Proclamation to the Belgians and the inhabitants of the left Bank of the Rhine.

"The ephemeral successes of my enemies have detached you for a moment from my empire. In my exile upon a rock in the sea, I heard your complaints. The God of battles has decided the fate of your beautiful provinces; Napoleon is among you; you are worthy to be Frenchmen; rise in a mass, join my invincible phalanxes to exterminate the remainder of these barbarians, who are your enemies and mine; they fly with rage and despair in their hearts.

"At the imperial palace of Lacken, June 17, 1815.

"NAPOLEON.

"By the Emperor, the major-general of the army.

"Count BERTRAND."

British loss. Wellington (says the Albany Argus) states the total loss of British killed, wounded and missing, in the actions of the 16th, 17th and 18th June, at 8,458. We find the British force stated, before the actions, at 46,500 men, including the German legion; hence the loss was about 2 to every 11. The Hanoverians, Dutch, Belgians and Brunswickers which formed a part of Wellington's army, were stated at about 48,000. If, as is probable, the carnage was as great among the auxiliary troops as in the British lines, his lordship's total loss must have exceeded 47,000. What the loss of the Prussians and other allies was we have not seen stated.

Wisdom. The British transports which, to the number of 60, proceeded to Portugal for the purpose of conveying a Portuguese army to the Netherlands, to act under the duke of Wellington, returned to England; the Portuguese regency having refused to send their troops abroad to co-operate with the allies.

Prince d'Eckmuhl and the army.—In making known to the different corps of his army the address he had presented to the king through generals Haxo, Gerard and Valmy, marshal prince Eckmuhl (Davoust) has published the following order of the day:

From Head-quarters near Orleans, July 17, 1815.

It is for you, soldiers, to complete this submission by your obedience; hoist the white flag and cockade.

I require, I know it, a great sacrifice; we hold these colours after five-and-twenty years; but this sacrifice the interest of our country requires us to make.

Soldiers, I am incapable of giving you an order which should not be founded on these sentiments, or which should be foreign from honor.

Last year, in like circumstances, the government of our country having changed, I had defended Hamburg and Haarbarg to the last moment, in the name of Louis XVIII.; hearing then, as now, the interest of our country alone.

All my compatriots have applauded my conduct; a fine army has been preserved to France, not a soldier has deserted his ranks, aware that he serves his country whatever government it may have, and that an army cannot be a deliberative body.

Soldiers, adhere to the same conduct; defend our unfortunate country in the name of Louis XVIII.; that monarch and our countrymen will be grateful to us for it; we will make common cause with the brave Vendéans who have just given an affecting example in declaring that they will unite with us to combat the enemies of France; and you will besides have preserved to your country a numerous and brave army.

I expect of you the same spirit of discipline of which you have given proofs since your departure from Paris.

The marshal commanding in chief the armies of the Loire and Pyrenees.

Signed, prince d'Eckmuhl.

BERTHIER. Munich, June 8. The tragical end of prince Alexander Berthier, allied by marriage to our royal house, excites here a great sensation.—whatever pains some may have taken to attribute this event either to an accidental cause or to a transport of despair, the public persist in beholding it a special and terrible act of vengeance. This is the explanation which they give. During the last war against Austria, a book-seller of Erling, named Palm, had printed a pamphlet in which were represented the disasters attending the movements of great armies. Marshal Berthier caused him to be arrested, he refused to give his author, and was shot by virtue of a military sentence. His relations and friends have since travelled all over England, the north, and Russia, supplicating succor for the widow of Palm, and endeavoring by every means to diffuse an interest in his memory. Some of those individuals, disguised as Russian officers, or being really in the Russian service, penetrated into the castle where the prince was detained upon his parole of honor. They threatened, according to one account, to carry him off as prisoner. According to another report, they informed him that he was sentenced to be shot. In fine, it appears, that endeavoring to escape from their fury, the prince fled to the highest story of the house. It is uncertain whether the prince threw himself out of the window, or whether those who pursued him precipitated him. The superior authorities, Russian as well as German, have instituted enquiries, the result of which has not been given to the public. In the mean while, this melancholy catastrophe forms the subject of universal conversation.

Prince Berthier. The Vienna Court Gazette of the 17th inst. gives some particulars respecting the death of marshal prince Berthier. Upon hearing that Bonaparte had confiscated his property, he applied for passports at Bayreuth, Munich and Vienna, to go to France, which were declined, but were granted to his wife. The confiscation of his estates seemed to have a great effect upon his mind. When a division of the allied troops had just passed through Bamberg, he fell from the window of the palace, 60 or 70 feet high. On enquiry, it appeared that his death was imputable only to accident. He had complained for some time of a head ache. His wife's carriage was waiting at the door, but the dust raised by the cavalry detained them some time from going out. He went to an adjoining room to look out of the window, being high, he got on a chair, on which he is supposed to have lost his balance. He fell on a wall in front of the palace, and thence into the street, and was killed by the fall immediately. He was buried in the cathedral with all ceremony, and his funeral was attended by two Russian regiments, and several general officers. His property in France is stated at 80,000 francs per annum, besides money in the bank of England.

Madrid June 2. The royal decree of May 29th, concerning the restoration of the Jesuits, contains the following passage:—

"Previous to recalling into my kingdom the society of Jesus, I resolved to enquire into, and I have discovered, the falsity of the criminal charges alleged against it by its rivals and enemies, who are likewise those of Jesus Christ. The religion of the Incarnate Word is a fundamental law of the Spanish monarchy, the law followed by my glorious predecessors, who merited by their virtue the title of Catholic. I have satisfied myself, that the real enemies of the altar and throne are they, who endeavored to load with contempt, and dishonor by infamous calumnies the virtuous member of the society, and raise up against them so many persecutions."

Paris, July 18.—Yesterday a considerable sum was paid on account of the contribution imposed on Paris. It was the produce of a distribution of the burthen on different classes of citizens. The notaries, it is said, paid 226,000 francs; the law agents, 300,000; the merchants, 600,000; the bankers 400,000; the exchange agents, 500,000. Towards the reimbursement of the money thus advanced, they are to receive municipal bonds, payable on the amount of the extraordinary contributions to be imposed on the proprietors of the capital.

On the 6th inst. Grenoble was vigorously attacked by a column of 3000 Austrians and Piedmontaise, under the orders of gen. Siplengs. After an action of three hours duration an armistice was concluded which was to last to the 9th.

July 24.—The city of Orleans is assessed in a contribution of 5000,000 francs.

It is asserted that commissaries of the four great powers will be charged to watch Bonaparte during his whole life in whatever quarter of England he shall be detained, which is not yet determined.

It had been reported that the Austrians had carried Belfort by storm after five bloody assaults.—But it appears that Lecourbe and his gallant army still held the place on the 23d of July. Gen. L. had defended the ground inch by inch; but upon hearing the events at Waterloo and the abdication of Napoleon, he proposed an armistice to prince Colloredo, which was accepted; the French army continued to occupy an entrenched camp under the walls, until they should receive orders from the new government.

July 29.—The Hanseatic legion arrived at Brussels, has received orders from the duke of Wellington to continue its march for Paris.

A war contribution of 250,000 francs has been imposed on the district of Fontainebleau.

The persons belonging to Bonaparte's family, who had remained at Paris, were finally to leave the city, either last night or this morning.

London July 25.—Yesterday a very orderly procession of discharged sailors marched from below the bridge to the admiralty to request the attention of the lords commissioners to some points which may add to the comforts of their situation, now that the king's service will not require them. They complain that numbers of American and other foreign sailors are employed in our merchantmen. English employment, they say, should be given to Englishmen, who are willing to work, and they request that some regulation may be adopted to ensure the regular payment of their wages, as in the king's ships. They were in number from one to three hundred, and one of them with a clarinet performed the office of musician to the party, playing "God save the King," in which he was every now and then joined by their best singers.—Their best speakers were condescendingly admitted to an audience. They were kindly informed that proper attention should be paid to their reasonable requests, and the party went away as happy as any thing could possible have made them, except the capture of an enemy's ship after a well fought battle.

House of Commons, July 2.—The speaker having taken the chair at the usual hour, a little bustle was created by the sudden appearance of lord Cochrane. His lordship was proceeding towards the table for the purpose of taking the oaths and his seat on his re-election, unattended by any members when the speaker informed him, that according to the practice of the house, his lordship must be introduced by two members. Lord Cochrane shortly afterwards complied with this form, his lordship going to the table between sir H. Montgomery and Mr. Tead. Having taken the oaths, his lordship, agreeably to another form of the house, proceeded towards the speaker, whose custom it is to shake hands with every newly returned member; but on this occasion no shaking of hands took place, his lordship contenting himself with a bow.

Thursday, lord Cochrane gave notice that he would, on Tuesday next, move for the minutes and proceedings on his trial, for the purpose of instituting ulterior proceedings against the chief justice of the court of king's bench.

Yesterday, Thomas Abbot Green, esq. lately elected one of the sheriffs, paid his fine of £900. and 20 marks, to be excused serving in that office. The lord mayor has ordered summonses for a common hall on Tuesday next, for the election of two sheriffs in the room of John Idle, and T. A. Green, esqrs.

Five hundred houses have been destroyed by fire at Calcutta.

The French prisoners at Dartmoor, on the late change in France, struck the tri-coloured flag.

HORRORS OF THE GREAT BATTLES.

Extracts of letters. Brussels, June 25.—"We arrived here two days after the battle, and took the first moment to go upon the field. I do not think it possible for language to describe the horrors of the sight; thousands of men and horses lying on the ground in a state of putrefaction, and in every variety of shocking and mangled deformity. The peasantry (whose first object was stripping and plunder) were employed in burying and burning the bodies; but I am told that yet there are great numbers on the ground, and, of course, in a still more horrible state. It was at a farm which, from a singular coincidence, is called La Belle Alliance, that the conflict was most severe; its situation is close to the road leading from Waterloo to Namur, and about three English miles from the former place. There the slaughter was inconceivably great; and in a small wood adjoining, the scene was so frightful that I could not remain, although I had viewed with comparative composure the thousands that lay extended on the plains, the whole of which consisted of corn fields, and mostly of rye, which at this time is five feet high, or more, but in the circumference of some miles was not only levelled, but put on the appearance of a sandy plain covered with hills and heaps of the slain. You will form some idea of the total loss, when I tell you that two days ago, the returns of wounded in Brussels only were said to be 23,000, and ever since the roads have been lined with waggon loads of mangled sufferers, many of whom have been lying neglected or undiscovered in the standing corn. The head of the medical staff told me yesterday, that there are many more to arrive, whose wounds have not yet been dressed, and it is confidently said that the grand total of killed and wounded on both sides, amounts to more than 70,000.

London, July 20. A private letter from Mons, under date of the 14th of this month, contains the following particulars: "It is only four days since the burning of the dead bodies with which the field of the battle of Mont Saint Jean was strewed.—Several thousand carts were put in requisition for this operation in the department of Jemappe. After the lapse of ten, twelve and even fifteen days, there were found among the dead carcasses great numbers of the wounded, who, impelled by madness or hunger, had cat of the bodies of the men and horses that surrounded them. I say madness, because there were some of them that even then cried, in their dying agonies, vive l'empereur, as they were raised up by the persons engaged in the removal."

Of the attachment of his followers to Bonaparte, the following anecdotes are cited:—

"A favorite Mameluke, who was taken prisoner on the 18th, having heard of his master's decisive defeat, exclaimed, "then I shall never live to see his downfall!"—with these words he opened his knife and cut out his eyes. A French soldier, who had just suffered the amputation of an arm, actuated by a like spirit, requested that the limb should be given to him; when, taking it in his remaining hand, and brandishing it round his head, he exclaimed, vive l'empereur, vive Bonaparte!"

THE BATTLE MONUMENT. The committee of vigilance and safety of the city of Baltimore, have announced their plan of arrangement for a grand civil and military procession, to be formed on the 12th inst. to proceed to lay the corner stone of a monument to be erected to the memory of the brave men who fell in defence of this city on the 12th and 13th of September last. We shall publish a full account of it, when it takes place.

BRITISH FORCE IN CANADA. The follow paragraph from a London paper of July 17, may assist the discovery of an interesting fact—

London, July 17. 12,000 troops from Canada have arrived at Portsmouth, on board 52 transports.—These forming 14 battalions, will be soon followed by seven others, making 18,000 men.

Other transports had previously arrived. Que-what—what was the greatest British force in Canada during the war?

PLATTSBURG is fast recovering, and with handsome improvement, from the destruction of its buildings, caused in September last.

Lieutenant John Gamble, late of the Essex frigate, who came passenger in the Oliver Ellsworth, arrived at New-York, was captured at the Sandwich Islands on the 19th of June, 1814, by the British ship of war Cherub, of 26 guns, having been left at the Marqueses by captain Porter, in charge of three ships. After remaining there five months, making preparations to depart, a mutiny took place amongst his men, in which lieutenant G. was wounded.—The mutineers and prisoners of war succeeded in taking the ship Seringapatam out of the bay. Two days after lieutenant Gamble was attacked by the savages, and lost midshipman William Feltus, and 3 men, besides one dangerously wounded.

Lieutenant Gamble afterwards burnt the ship Greenwich, got out of the bay in the ship sir Andrew Hammond, and in a distressed state reached the Sandwich Islands, where he was captured by the Cherub; and after remaining on board that ship 7 months, was set ashore at Rio Janeiro, where he remained 5 months, and then embarked on board the Swedish ship Good Hope, for Havre; and on the 1st of August, in lat. 47, long. 18, was put on board the ship Oliver Ellsworth. Lieut. G. left at Rio, midshipman Clapp and 5 men.

St. Louis, July 29. The commissioners have finished treaties with all the Indians that assembled in a proper way at Portage des Sioux. It will probably be the last of August before Mr. G. Kennerly arrives with the Indians high upon the Missouri and Mississippi. No doubt, however, of the utmost expedition. Mr. K. is an active, enterprising gentleman, in whom the utmost confidence is to be placed.

Talk of the Big Elk, principal Maha chief, to governor Clark.

Father—I have always listened to your words, your counsels are yet fresh in my memory—I am your child; if my skin was white, I should be your oldest son.

Father—When we are at our villages, or on our lands in the prairies, if we die, we are sometimes buried and sometimes not. If they bury us, we are put in a Buffalo robe, perhaps an old robe, and are left aprey for the wolves and crows, and our bones are scattered over the plains. Who would not wish to die among you! that he may be buried with the honors of war, as you buried one of our red skin chiefs, who died at Portage des Sioux.

Father—I speak rather loud, if it is not agreeable to you tell me so, and I will speak lower.

My father—I have always given my young men good counsel, if you doubt it, enquire of the warriors present—they will tell you the truth.

INHUMAN VILLAINIES. It is probable, among the impressed men who have returned from Dartmoor, where an Algerine barbarity deposited them for exchange as regular prisoners of war—a procedure the most cruel and base I ever heard of, and which ought to stamp the British name with everlasting infamy, there are not less than 500 who had been enslaved upwards of ten years—many as much as seventeen, and some even longer! It would be quite safe to say that from eight to ten thousand of our people have perished in this horrible slavery, since the wretched business of impressment, or man-stealing, began. What is the extent of suffering by the Algerines compared with this? Look at it fairly.

We have lately noticed the two following cases, and select them from many others of the same character:

From the Boston Patriot. The following letter, detailing the particulars of the barbarous flogging of Joseph Slater, an American seaman, by the British Huns, because he refused to fight against his native country, has been handed us for publication. Mr. Beasley has undoubtedly communicated a copy of the letter to our government, and we cannot think they will suffer such a flagrant act of villainy to pass unnoticed. The magnanimous British, not being able to meet our soldiers on land, or seamen on the ocean, resort to the despicable and cowardly practice of flogging and shooting them when in their power, unarmed and defenceless—

Prison ship Irresistible, Chatham, September 12, 1814.

R. G. BEASLEY, ESQ.

Honored sir—We consider it a duty which we owe to our country and fellow citizens in general, to inform you, as our country's agent, of the barbarous treatment which Joseph Slater, an American prisoner of war, received on board the British national brig Censor, lieutenant R. W. Lucas, commander. It appears from the statement of Mr. Slater, that he had been acting boatswain of the brig, and returning from the Belt with a convoy bound to England, saw a schooner which they expected to be an American privateer, when Mr. Slater was ordered to pipe all hands to quarters, which he did, and then went aft, and informed lieutenant Lucas, that should the chase be an American, he would not fight her, and offered himself up as a prisoner of war, but could not be received as such, and was obliged to return to his duty, and continued to do duty until the 3d instant, when he was sent on board the Namur, lying at Sheerburgness, and examined before three captains and the first lieutenant of the Namur, and was returned on board the old brig (the old Censor) as a prisoner of war—when Mr. Lucas (the commander) ordered him both legs in irons, and kept him in that situation under the centinel's charge and on prisoner's allowance, until the 10th instant, and publicly whipped, by order of lieutenant Lucas, and was then sent to this ship as a prisoner of war. We examined Mr. Slater's back as soon as he came down into the prison, and found that he had been scandalously and inhumanly whipped, as all his wounds were fresh, and appeared to agree with his statement, that he had been flogged about two hours before we saw him.

He likewise shewed us his protection, certifying him to be a native citizen of the United States, and no doubt remains with us of this being such: we therefore pray you to make his case known to our government, and to the English board of admiralty, or to take any other method you may think prudent to obtain redress.

We are, with due respect, your very humble servants,

(Signed) GEORGE McLELLAN, President.

From the Providence Patriot. MR. SAMUEL HOPKINS, of Foster, and MR. HENRY STONE, of Scituate, in this state, have recently returned home, the first after an absence of 17 years, and the latter of 13 years. They were impressed into the naval service of Great Britain from American vessels, and as the rest of their countrymen who were in slavery did, at the commencement of hostilities, gave themselves up as prisoners of war; since which period, they have been immured in the dungeons of Dartmoor. Mr. Hopkins has a family, who had long since numbered him with the dead; a son, who has nearly attained the age of manhood, during the lingering years of his father's servitude in the "floating hells of Britain." Mr. Stone had repeatedly written to his father while in slavery, and the necessary documents were as often forwarded to procure his release, but in vain. Their sufferings have been almost beyond endurance; and their joy on finding themselves once more on the soil of liberty, nearly overpowered their faculties.

SIR GEORGE PREVOST, it is said in a Quebec paper, will come off with flying colors, as no one will probably appear to prosecute him—that he has been 'graciously received, &c.' As the prince regent has been 'graciously pleased' to order that certain regiments lately serving in Canada, may have the word "NIAGARA" inscribed on their colors, to perpetuate their glorious victories at Chippewa, Bridge-water and Erie, we would humbly recommend that the old knight might have "PLATTSBURG" inserted on the crest of his coat of arms, to serve in lieu of a motto like this—

The valiant knight, with fifteen thousand Englishmen,
To Plattsburg slowly went, and then—ran back again.

BLUE-LIGHTS AND RED-LIGHTS! It is stated in the New-York Commercial Advertiser, probably on the authority of sir Robert Hall, commissioner of the British navy in Canada, that an American came to him, and offered, for 200 dollars, to destroy the whole of our flotilla on Champlain! The offer is said to have been rejected with indignation; but "his majesty's" commissioner would better have served the cause of justice by seizing upon the miserable, pitiful wretch, so that if punishment could not be inflicted, his name and character might at least have become known to his countrymen.

"PATRIOTIC." It is pompously announced in the Boston papers, that "the Boston Hussars, under the command of captain Richard Sullivan, have volunteered their services as his excellency's escort on commencement day, which have been accepted."—This is not the company that volunteered to assist in dispossessing the British of a part of Massachusetts, during the late war.

CHRONICLE.

Treaty with Algiers.—We understand that despatches have been received from commodore Decatur, announcing the pleasing intelligence of his having, on the part of the United States, concluded a Treaty of Peace with the Dey of Algiers. With the conditions of the Treaty, of course we are unacquainted; but we learn, generally, that they are such as Commodore Decatur thought proper to dictate.

Nat. Int.]

WASHINGTON, Sept. 2.

Copy of a letter from commodore Decatur to the secretary of the navy, (received via Norfolk) dated

Off Gibraltar, June 15, 1815.

SIR—I have the honor to inform you of our arrival off this place on the 15th, after a passage of 25 days, having previously communicated with Cadiz and Tangiers. The Spitfire, Torch and Firefly, separated from the squadron during a gale of wind on the 26th ult. and the Ontario on the 31st.

I am happy to find they have, with the exception of the Firefly, all arrived; the latter vessel, I fear may have lost her spars, and have returned to the United States. From all the information I can collect, I feel assured, that the Algerines have returned into the Mediterranean. The vessels that had separated from us, are now joining, and I shall proceed in search of the enemy forthwith.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, &c.

STEPHEN DECATUR.

Extract of a letter from commodore Stephen Decatur to the secretary of the navy, (received via Norfolk,) dated

Off Carthage, June 19, 1815.

"I have the honor to inform you, that on the 17th inst. off Cape de Gatt, the squadron fell in with, and captured, an Algerine frigate of 46 guns, and between 4 and 500 men, commanded by Rais Hammida, who bore the title of admiral; she struck her flag after a running fight of 25 minutes.

"The admiral was killed at the commencement of the action. After the Guerriere (who from her favorable position, was enabled to bring the enemy to close action) had fired two broadsides, the enemy, with the exception of a few musketeers, ran below. The Guerriere had four men wounded by musket shot, which is the only injury done by the enemy in this affair.

"We have 406 prisoners including the wounded.—The prisoners state that about thirty were killed and thrown overboard.

"Their squadron is said to be cruising in our vicinity; five days ago they were off this place, unless I obtain some further intelligence of them by to-morrow, I shall proceed to the port of Algiers, in the hopes to intercept their return.—For the present, I have determined to send the prize into Carthage."

Copy of a letter from Commodore Decatur, to the Secretary of the Navy, dated

United States ship Guerriere, off Cape Palos,

June 20 1815.

SIR—I have the honor to inform you, that on the 19th inst. off Cape Palos, the squadron under my command, captured an Algerine brig of twenty-two guns, and one hundred and eighty men. After a chase of three hours, she ran into shoal water, where I did not think it advisable to follow with our large ships, but dispatched the Epervier, Spark, Torch and Spitfire, to whom she surrendered after a short resistance. Twenty three men were found dead on board. We received from her eighty prisoners, the residue of her crew having left her in boats. Many of them must have been killed by the fire of our vessels, and one of the boats was sunk. None of our vessels sustained any damage, nor was there a man killed or wounded. This brig is larger than the Epervier—was built in Algiers five years ago, by a Spanish constructor, the same who built the frigate captured on the 17th inst. and is perfectly sound.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, &c.
STEPHEN DECATUR.

HON. BENJAMIN W. CROWNSHIELD,
Secretary of the Navy.

Extract of a letter from a Lieutenant of the United States frigate Macedonian, on board prize frigate Mishouri, to a gentleman in Boston, dated CARTHAGENA, July 2, 1815.

"I arrived here on the 23d of June, in the late Algerine brig of war ESTERO of 22 guns and about 200 men, prize to our squadron under the command of commodore DECATUR.

"I presume, ere this, you have heard of our capturing an Algerine frigate off Cape de Gatt, on the 17th June. The MISHOURI, the prize frigate, from which I address you, is a 44 gun ship, and had a complement of upwards of 400 men, I think the stoutest I ever saw on board of any ship. She was the flag vessel, and commanded by an admiral, who was killed early in the action. The contest only lasted about 8 or 10 minutes. The number of her killed could not be ascertained, but she was literally cut to pieces in her spars and rigging. Our loss was trifling, only 4 killed, (3 by a gun bursting) and one by a musket ball from the enemy,—the wounded did not exceed 10.—I would enter into a descriptive detail as respects the character and appearance of these uncouth looking people were I not confident that your knowledge of them extended much further than my own, * and therefore it would be productive of neither information or amusement to you, yet I must add, that they are the most servile beings on earth."

Numerous arrivals. There arrived at Baltimore on Sunday—2 ships from Bremen, 1 do. from Nantz, 3 do. from Liverpool, 1 do. from Amsterdam, 1 brig from Bordeaux, 1 do. from Lisbon, 1 schooner from from St. Jago de Cuba, upwards of 20 brigs and schooners from Halifax, St. Andrews, and various American ports, and between 80 and 100 bay craft—laden with vast quantities of British, German, French and Dutch goods, &c. &c.

It is stated that Mr. Gallatin declines accepting his appointment as minister to France.

Dreadful gale. The British homeward bound West India fleet of between 2 and 300 sail, encountered a dreadful gale about the 8th of last month. It is supposed that one half of them have lost their masts or foundered! The convoy, the Warrior 74, with 2,000,000$ on board, it was thought had gone down! One of the fleet, a great ship, with a full cargo of sugar, found deserted at sea, has been towed into Salem, by a vessel of that port. The Warrior has since been spoken, dismasted.

A British ship from London, with 25,000 stand of arms, and a great supply of ammunition, &c. was lately spoken on her passage for and probably has arrived at Carthage. The arms and stores are avowedly for the patriots of New-Granada; a delightful country in the interior, where a republican government has long been fully established.

The frigate United States, commodore Shaw; Alert, store ship, lieutenant Stewart; and schooner Hornet, lieutenant Page, sailed on Saturday last from Boston for the Mediterranean.

The Algerine admiral killed by Decatur, it is said was a Scotchman of the name of Lyle.

The Java frigate, built at Baltimore, appears likely to prove, from the trial that has been made of her, one of the fastest ships that ever floated;

* The gentleman to whom the letter was addressed has been in Algiers.

and she is certainly among the most beautiful, as well as the strongest of her class.

Captain Cole, of the ship Savannah, arrived at New-York from Havre-de-Grace, is the bearer of despatches from the American consul to our government, and from Louis XVIII to the French minister resident in this country.

A Boston paper contradicts the English story of the arrival, at Liverpool, of the brig Panther, with 2,000,000 on board, which produced the fall of the price of dollars from 5s 6d sterl. to 4s 8d, and says that she had only $300,000 on board.

Our cities are all very healthy. Deaths in New-York for the week ending September 2—54; of whom 30 were under five years old, and 2 accidental.

An Englishman, lately attached to some office in Canada, but more recently employed as an agent at Boston to receive and export his majesty's gold, has disappeared with no small quantity of it. This may be considered as an attempt to blunt the edge of lord Castlereagh's broad-sword.

FOURTEENTH CONGRESS.—The following comparative statement of the strength of parties in the last and present congress, is copied from the Norfolk Herald, and we believe is correct. It may be well to remark, that the most of the elections took place at the very time when the war pressed the most heavily on the people, and that many republican members were certainly lost by the absence of voters, voluntarily under arms in defence of their country.

SPLendid work. Humboldt and Bonpland's work on South America, has been received at the Baltimore Library. It makes several folio volumes, most beautifully printed and superbly ornamented with maps and plates, colored in the highest style. It was published at Paris, and will cost nearly 1,000 dollars!

Guadaloupe did not surrender at discretion and non-resisting. The French force consisted of about 700 troops of the line and the militia of the island, the British of 6000 regular troops. The latter proceeded to the west end of the island, near Bassa terre, the heights of which they carried by storm through superior numbers, after great loss! The 64th British regiment was nearly destroyed. Point-Petre yet held out on the 10th of August, but has been pressed into submission by the weight of the British.

Further. By an arrival at Baltimore, on Thursday last from Guadeloupe we have the following intelligence: On getting possession of the island, the British seized 12 or 14 American vessels, which they were pleased to suspect of having French property on board—and ordered off several others, without cargoes. They captured the schooner Express, of Baltimore, without deigning to assign any reason, and kept her captain on board as a prisoner! Hereafter, it is the will of the British that we shall not trade to Guadeloupe! Herein is amity!

British deserters. Desertions are frequent from the British army on the frontier. Seven of their soldiers arrived here yesterday morning. They state that 16 started, but were discovered and fired upon after leaving the Canada shore, when four of the number were killed, and the remaining five taken. — Buffalo Journal.

The 80 gun ship, belonging to Spain, which lately blew up before the Island of Marguerita, off the Spanish Maine, had 1,000 soldiers on board and a great quantity of specie, for the purpose of paying off the Spanish troops in that quarter. Every thing was lost, and every soul perished—the catastrophe had a very sensible effect at Cadiz, when the news reached that city. [This ship belonged to the “legitimate” king of Spain; just before her annihilation, the officers and men on board of her had “delivered” nearly all the people of Marguerita of their lives—having “legitimately” murdered many of the women and children of that island. God is just.]

Ceylon and the “LEGITIMATES.”

The kingdom of Ceylon is probably more “venerable” for its ancient institution than any in Europe. It is a delightful island in the East Indies, esteemed by its people as the “terrestrial paradise,” populous and wealthy. It produces an abundance of most things desired, and is 250 miles long and 200 broad—its inhabitants prided themselves on maintaining their ancient laws and customs. The “legitimate” king of Portugal first attempted to put down the legitimate king of Ceylon, and he invited the “legitimate” Dutch to drive them off. They, having got a foot-hold, maintained a “legitimate” possession, in spite of all the effort of the Ceylonese “patriots” and their legitimate princes, until the dearly liberty-loving English beat the Dutch, and assumed “legitimate” possession of the greater part of the island. Since then, it seems by the article below, that they have even laid unholy hands upon the crown and throne of the ancient and venerable legitimate king of Ceylon! What a rascal Bonaparte was for doing less than this in Spain. But Bonaparte being himself “illegitimate,” had not, periphas, as much right to do a villainy as the royal house of the Guelfs. This makes a great difference in every thing! His “confederation of the Rhine,” for instance, was abominable—but a confederation organized at Vienna, in its most essential principles like his, is—angelic. O foul and abominable hypocrisy—it is “rank, and smells to heaven!”

A vessel recently arrived at an eastern port spoke, July 27, the British frigate Niger, from the East Indies, 7 weeks, bound to England, informed that he had on board the crown and throne of the king of Ceylon, which place was in possession of the British, having been captured after a hard fought action, in which the British lost two general officers and a number of men,—the crown and throne were valued at eight millions,—they had likewise on board a great number of wild beasts,—he said that American privateers had been very numerous in the East Indies.

An Alligator. measuring three and an half feet, was shot in a swamp about three quarters of a mile from Brushwick ferry, (L. I.) on Saturday afternoon last, by Mr. J. T. Brownwre. While in the act of levelling his piece at a flock of snipes, he discovered the alligator within a few yards of the spot where he stood, making towards him; when he instantly lodged the contents of the piece in its throat and killed it.

Frost. There was so severe a frost at Quebec the 7th of August last, as to destroy the leaves of cucumber plants, pumpkins, beans, &c. It did a great deal of damage.

The Franklin.—From a Philadelphia paper.—It has been objected to the construction of the national ship Independence of 74 guns, built at Boston, that her lower deck ports were not sufficiently high from the water; and as the Franklin of 74 guns built by Messrs. S. Humphreys and C. Penrose of this city, and launched from the navy-yard, was supposed to be on the same model, apprehensions of a similar defect in that ship have been entertained. These apprehensions are relieved by the subjoined comparison between the Independence and the Franklin.

			Feet.	Inch.

The Independence had on board, when launched, thirty-five tons ballast, which could not have settled her more than two inches. Her bowsprit was not in.

The Franklin had no ballast on board, but her bowsprit was in.

SOMNAMBULATION; from the N. Y. Columbian.—On Monday night, a gentleman, who lodged in a boarding-house in Pearl-street, arose in his sleep, leaped from the third-story window, and walked some distance, without waking—until he was aroused from his unconscious state by a watchman. What is wonderful, he is not sensible of having sustained the least injury in the dangerous descent. Last night, at the same hour precisely, he made an attempt to repeat the leap, but was prevented by his fellow-lodgers, just as he had raised the sash for the purpose. Of the authenticity of this statement there is or can be no doubt.

Married, recently—at Knoxville, Tenn. major-general E. P. Gaines to Miss Blount.

Died, August 17, at Providence, R. I. general William Allen, father of the late captain Allen, of the U. S. navy, aged 64.

Also, at Hartford, on the 21st, suddenly, Chauncey Goodrich, esq. lieutenant-governor of the state of Connecticut.

Also, on the 30th July, in Woodland county, Ky. captain Francis Peart. Having no children, he left his estate, valued at between 60 and 100,000 dollars, for the establishment of a free school, to bear his name.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

No. 3 of Vol. IX.] BALTIMORE, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 16, 1815. [WHOLE NO. 211.]

Hæc olim meminisse juvabit.—VIRGIL.

PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, NO. 29, SOUTH CALVERT-STREET, AT $5 PER ANNUM.

The title page and index for the last volume will be presented next week; and the supplement for that volume will be finished by Tuesday next, and forwarded as ordered.

The analytical review of a pamphlet that has recently appeared in England, entitled, "Secret Memoirs of the Cochrane's," &c. which is commenced in the present number, will not fail to interest our readers. The very respectable gentleman who communicated the article will be pleased to accept our thanks.

We have a much more particular account of the proceedings of the congress of Vienna than that published in our last, which shall be inserted. The editor has the pleasure to state, that he has received a letter from an enlightened friend at a distance from Baltimore, who undertook to prepare a set of what may be called war tables, in which the time, place and manner of every battle that took place in the late war, whether on land or water, is proposed to be stated; with a list of all the forces engaged and an account of the killed and wounded, on both sides, as far as they can be ascertained, to be accompanied by references, to the WEEKLY REGISTER for official accounts and details. The task is one of great labor, but the gentleman says he expects soon to complete it. It is not easy to estimate the value that ought to be placed on such things.

These tables will not interfere with another set that the editor is himself preparing to shew the general effect of the war on the ocean.

By the President of the United States of America,
A PROCLAMATION. Whereas, information has been received, that sundry persons, citizens of the United States, or residents within the same, and especially within the state of Louisiana, are conspiring together, to begin and set on foot, provide and prepare, the means for a military expedition or enterprize against the dominions of Spain, with which the United States are happily at peace; that for this purpose they are collecting arms, military stores, provisions, vessels and other means; are deceiving and seducing honest and well-meaning citizens to engage in their unlawful enterprizes; are organizing, officering and arming themselves for the same, contrary to the laws in such cases made and provided: I have therefore thought fit to issue this my proclamation, warning and enjoining all faithful citizens who have been led, without due knowledge or consideration, to participate in the said unlawful enterprizes, to withdraw from the same without delay; and commanding all persons whatsoever, engaged or concerned in the same, to cease all further proceedings therein, as they will answer the contrary at their peril. And I hereby enjoin and require, all officers, civil and military, of the United States, or any of the states or territories, all judges, justices, and other officers of the peace, all military officers of the army or navy of the United States, and officers of the militia, to be vigilant, each within his respective department, and according to his functions, in searching out and bringing to punishment, all persons engaged or concerned in such enterprizes, in seizing and detaining, subject to the disposition of the law, all arms, military stores, vessels, or other means provided or providing for the same; and, in general, in preventing the carrying on such expedition or enterprize, by all the lawful means within their power: And I require all good and faithful citizens and others, within the United States, to be aiding and assisting herein; and especially in the discovery, apprehension and bringing to justice, of all such offenders; in preventing the execution of their unlawful combinations and designs, and in giving information against them to the proper authorities.

In testimony whereof, I have caused the seal of the United States of America to be affixed to these presents, and signed the same with my hand. Done at the city of Washington, the first day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fifteen, and of the independence of the said United States of America the fortieth.

JAMES MADISON.

By the president,
JAMES MONROE, secretary of state.

The preceding proclamation probably originated in observing the following address, published in the newspapers:

"New Orleans.

"Sir—The favorable moment has at length arrived for making a successful attempt in favor of the patriots of New Spain. The enterprize offers an easy road to distinction, and promises a glorious reward for merit. The place of rendezvous is Belle Isle, near the mouth of Cajalia. About 500 chosen men, amongst whom are some late commissioned officers of the United States' army, will accompany me from that place to Matagorda, where we land; thence to Labahia, is thirty five miles. At Labahia, on the river San Antonio, about forty miles from the sea coast, and eighty miles from San Antonio, I will wait for reinforcements from Nachitoches, &c. Labahia will fall an easy sacrifice! it is badly defended, and its weakness is well known.

"Subaki, the proscribed patriot, a native of the province of Yacatan, and delegate from thence to the Cortes of Spain, accompanies me. We have arms and ammunition; 1000 men already engaged, and can calculate largely on aid from Tennessee and Kentucky. The country through which we pass, and of seat our operations, abounds in cattle and sheep, and nothing will be wanting to insure complete success. Our cause embraces the best interest of humanity—the general enlargement of an oppressed people, and all the blessings attendant upon unrestrained commerce and industry, this too, accompanied by a prospect of incalculable advantage to the United States.

"HENRY PERRY."

The moment this address from Mr. Perry appeared, one hundred pens were dipped into "legitimate" gall to assail the executive of the United States for encouraging "a band of desperadoes" in an attempt to overturn the "sacred" authority of the fool of Spain over the rich provinces of Mexico; but they were hardly drawn forth, and had not yet reached the paper, before the proclamation met them, and spoiled, utterly spoiled and lost forever, all the fine things that might be said about the divine right of kings, &c.

There is no man of sense in the United States, that is really attached to a free government, or who looks at the interest of his country in a commercial or political point of view, that does not sigh for the independence of Mexico; and exult in the hope that that fine country may, in the possession of a liberal government, attain that high rank in the world to which its vast resources and peculiar advantages entitle it. Such are, no doubt, the wishes of every member of the executive of the United States, in their individual capacities; but in their public character they have made haste to shew that rigid impartiality and just spirit of neutrality which has ever distinguished our government. Notwithstanding the high precedent established by the "illustrious congress of Vienna," we yet believe that no nation has a right to interfere with the internal government of another people, and it is to be hoped we shall always act up to it. But individuals may do as they please, in respect to this matter. And for doing this, they can produce the very highest "ig-nomine" authority. England, every body knows, is not only the standard of the "law and the gospel," but also the dear, very dear ally of Spain—yet ships from England, for several years past, have publicly cleared out for ports of the revolted Spanish provinces in America, laden with arms and military stores. It was only last week we noticed the arrival at Carthagena of a British ship from London, with 25,000 stand of arms for the patriots of New Grenada.

It is worthy of remark, and we make the observation to shew the servility of our English jacobins, who take upon themselves a character as if all the religion and liberty of the world depended upon them!! that, while they eagerly seize the pen to republicanize a republican American who takes any part in assisting the patriots of Mexico, they are as mute as fishes if a royal Englishman does the same thing. But this is easily accounted for—if England says, white is black—why, it is black: for England cannot do wrong.

University of Maryland.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE WEEKLY REGISTER.

SIR,—As I presume your miscellany is more generally diffused than any work of its kind in our country, permit me to occupy a page, with a view of making known an institution whose infancy bears no comparison with its extensive claim to public patronage.

Among the numerous improvements that do honor to the public spirit of your flourishing city, there is none better calculated to extend its reputation than the University of Maryland. The establishment of this seminary would seem to form an exception to a general principle, that commercial states are unfriendly to the cultivation of the sciences. I speak only of the Medical Departments of the new school, as I have had no opportunity of becoming acquainted with the professors of the arts and sciences, some of whose chairs (I believe) are not yet organized. Whether we consider this subject in an ornamental or useful light, it becomes a subject of interest.—The splendid edifice which constitutes the Medical College, as the centre from which the other departments are to diverge, stands on Lombard-street extended, in the western end of the city. It is constructed on the plan of the [old] Pantheon at Rome. The front faces on the Washington road, commanding an extensive prospect down the Patapsco and Chesapeake. The grandeur of the exterior of the building does not excel the internal convenience of the apartments. The anatomical theatre with its necessary appendages, are as extensive and appropriate as those of any of the European schools. The lecturing room alone is capable of containing twelve hundred persons with convenience. The Chemical Hall, immediately below, is but little inferior; it will accommodate about a thousand, a part of its area being taken off by the laboratory and necessary apparatus. The apparatus is complete, accommodated to the taste and views of the learned and eloquent professor. Hitherto the professors of the Theory and Practice, Institutes of Physic, Surgery, Materia Medica and Obstetrics, have been compelled to occupy the anatomical theatre as a lecturing room; but they are now accommodated with a new room derived from an alteration in the library in the front of the building. The improvement, suggested and completed since the last session, adds greatly to the comfort of the classes, as it is sufficiently large and is easily warmed. The library, though not the most extensive of the kind, is competent to most of the useful purposes of the medical pupil. While it contains many of the most useful works, it presents the curious enquirer with some of the rarest of both ancient and modern times: a few of which (I believe) are not to be found in any other collection in our country.

The situation of Baltimore near the centre of the union, and its convenience to the western country, as well as its easy access by water, designate it as the most eligible spot for the establishment of a great emporium of science.

But it will be asked, what will all these arrangements and advantages accomplish, unless the chairs be filled with corresponding talents? To this most material consideration we invite the attention of all who claim an interest in the general diffusion of medical science. This institution, which promises to rank with the most eminent, originated in the zeal and conscious worth of a few individuals whom chance had cast together, kindred spirits whose sympathetic feelings produced an electric attraction which the laws of nature render irresistible. It is from such accidental coincidences that such institutions always arise; they cannot be forced by the strong arm of power; nor even the delusive incantation of money. Genius may be repressed for a time by the want of pecuniary assistance, but it will finally triumph over the most imposing obstacles. For two years, the present incumbent of the anatomical chair lectured alone to a private class, and on the third winter the professor of the theory and practice seconded his efforts by delivering a course to the students of medicine residing in the city. The other component parts of the present Medical Faculty of the University immediately fell into the views of the two first, and were soon constituted a body corporate by a law of the state. Since this period, so auspicious to the institution, the degree of Doctor of Physic has been annually conferred upon a number of young gentlemen, as distinguished for their acquirements as their numbers were unexpected. The number of pupils has nearly doubled every year, and seems to increase in the ratio of the numbers who have it in their power to compare the merits of the University with those of other institutions. It is to be admitted, that the professors in the new school have dissented in many important doctrines from the opinions taught in other schools, but their tenets are candidly stated, ably defended, and eloquently enforced. I have listened with delight to most of the public lecturers both in Europe and America, and can declare with truth that I have witnessed as much real science, and as eloquently displayed as in the best of the ancient schools. Does it not become every description of citizens to cherish and support such an institution, one which is so admirably calculated to serve the best interests of humanity? What human pursuit can be prosecuted without health? Neither life, liberty nor property can be enjoyed without it. By what criterion, but the laws of such an institution, can the mass of mankind decide on the merits of the candidates for public favor? By what other power can the people be protected against the arts and profligacy of empiricism? If my time and the apprehension of encroaching upon your journal would permit, I could descend to some minutiae which would place this subject in a more conspicuous light; but I believe the attention of physicians concerned in directing a medical education throughout the United States, is sufficiently awakened, and I will therefore only state the names of the respective professors and the time at which the courses commence.

Mr. Harper's Letter

The following has recently been published in the Baltimore papers, and has excited an uncommon sensation. We give it for reference without remark, except to say that its authenticity is not questioned. It is copied from the "Baltimore Patriot."

"Baltimore, October 10th, 1814.

"I congratulate you, most sincerely, my dear sir, on the good news contained in your letter, which is still more gratifying from the knowledge that we have done so well in the other counties. You will have seen the returns from them before this reaches you. We have two-thirds of the house of delegates, and a majority of more than twenty on joint ballot. Locus Deo.

"The object of our commissioners, in sending home the Adams, I have no doubt is to obtain new instructions. From the regent's proclamation, recalling British subjects, his speech to parliament, and the address of the house of commons to him, I think it clear that the British government have taken their stand on this ground; that as we began the war to drive them from their doctrine of perpetual allegiance, and their RIGHT of impressment, they must have those points settled before they lay down their arms, and will not be content with our merely waiving our CLAIMS. To this effect I presume their commissioners were instructed. Ours had no instructions to do more than waive those claims.—Even to that extent ours were not authorised to go, to [till] our government was informed, by the arrival of the French frigate "Olivier," of the de-thronement of Bonaparte. Till then, they had no intention to make peace, but then they saw that the game was over, and accordingly by the return of that vessel sent instructions to the commissioners to waive the whole claim about impressment, in hope that they might get off on those terms. They have learnt by this arrival, I believe, that more is necessary, and they must do it. It will be a bitter pill for Mr. Madison to acknowledge the British RIGHT of IMPRESSMENT, and their doctrine of perpetual allegiance; BUT HE MUST SWALLOW IT. He will squall [squall] and kick, and make very faces, BUT DOWN IT MUST GO. The thing IS RIGHT IN ITSELF, and though disagreeable to him, not in the least dishonorable to the nation! The British doctrine on the subject of impressment and allegiance is CLEAR and UNDENIABLE, nor would it ever have been denied by our government had they not been seeking a pretext for quarrel with Great Britain. To compel them now to "eat their words," is an act of RETRIBUTIVE JUSTICE at which ALL MEN OF SENSE AND HONOR MUST REJOICE.

"I am, My Dear Sir,

Very truly

Your friend & servt.

ROB: G. HARPER.

Geo: Baer, Esq."

We are indebted to the politeness of a friend for a sheet of a new work now in the press, entitled "A picture of Cincinnati." The following extracts will interest our readers:

"Manufactures.—As this town is older than the surrounding country, it has at no time had a surplus of laboring population or of capital. The former have been required to assist in clearing and improving the wilderness; the latter has been invested in lands, which from their low price and certain rise, have held out to capitalists a powerful inducement. The conditions which are said to constitute the basis of manufacturing establishments, have not, therefore, existed in the same degree as if the town had been younger than the adjoining country. Notwithstanding this, some progress has been made, as will appear from the following sketch, which embraces the manufactures most worthy of notice.

Cincinnati has no iron foundry; but is well supplied with blacksmiths, who fabricate in a neat and substantial manner, every article which those tradesmen usually make, and many others which belong to the whitesmith. Several shops are devoted to the manufacture of cut and wrought nails, which are made in sufficient quantities for the town and adjacent settlements. Stills, teakettles and other vessels of copper, with a great variety of tin ware, are made in abundance. Rifles, fowling pieces, pistols, dirks and gun locks of every kind are manufactured. It is six years since a manufactory of cotton and woolen machinery was established, in which time 23 cotton spinning mules and throstles, carrying 3,300 spindles; 71 roving and drawing heads; 14 cotton and 91 wool carding machines; besides wool spinning machinery to the amount of 130 spindles; twisting machines and cotton gins, have been made. Plated saddlery and carriage mounting of all kinds, many different articles of jewelry, and silver ware of every sort—after the most fashionable models and handsomely enlaced, are manufactured. Swords, dirks, &c. are mounted in any form, and either plated or gilt. Clocks of every kind are made, and watches repaired.

Stills, chimney pieces, monuments, and in short all the varieties of stone cutting, are executed with neatness and taste. Common pottery, of a good quality, is made in sufficient quantity for home consumption. A manufactory of green window glass and hollow ware, is about to go into operation; and will be followed by another of white flint glass the ensuing summer. Clean sand, of a beautiful white color, has been found in abundance near the mouth of the Scioto; but no clay proper for crucibles has been discovered as yet on the Ohio, and that article has been brought from the state of Delaware.

The principle manufactures in wood are the following:—sideboards, secretaries, bureaus, and other articles of cabinet furniture; all of which may be had of a superior quality, made either of our beautiful cherry and walnut, or of mahogany freighted up the Mississippi. Fancy chairs and settees, elegantly gilt and varnished. Waggons, carts and drays; coaches, phaetons, gigs and other pleasure carriages, trimmed and ornamented. Plane stocks, weaver's reeds, and the different productions of the lathe, comprehending wheels, chairs, screws, &c. The various kinds of cooper's work, for the execution of which a machine has been erected and is now in full operation. The author of this invention is William Bailly, of Kentucky, who in 1811 obtained a patent. The power is given by one or two horses, which with a man and a boy can dress and joint, in a superior manner, the staves necessary for one hundred barrels, hogsheds or pipes in twelve hours. It can also be employed in shaving and jointing shingles, with equal advantage. The proprietors of the establishment in this place are making arrangements for the exportation of dressed staves to New-Orleans.

To the productions in wood may be added, the STEAM SAW MILL, erected on the river bank, below, but adjoining the town. The principal building is a strong frame, 70 by 56 feet, and three stories high. The engine drives four saws in separate gates, acting at the rate of 80 times in a minute, making the product of each saw about 200 feet of boards an hour. The carriages run upon cast racks, are propelled by the improved short hand and gigged backwards by bevel wheels, in the manner of the best mills. The logs to be sawed are chiefly brought in rafts to the beach, and drawn up the bank and into the mill by power from the engine. Other branches of business will be carried on in this establishment. The engine is estimated at 20 horse power, and of Evans' patent, except the condenser, which the proprietors have abandoned, as being attended with a degree of trouble and expense altogether disproportionate to its advantage. In place of this, they pour on the waste steam a current of cold water, which becoming instantly heated, is employed to replenish the boilers. The steam mill company, and Cincinnati manufacturing company, have adopted the same alteration, with great success.

There are four cotton spinning establishments, most of them small. The whole contain upwards of 1200 spindles, which are moved by horses. Wool carding is performed in several places; and an extensive woollen manufactory, designed and calculated to yield 60 yards of broad cloth per day, will be in operation the ensuing winter. It is owned by the Cincinnati Manufacturing Company. The machinery is driven by an engine of 20 horse power. The products of the loom have not been great; but several handsome pieces of carpeting, diaper, plaid, denim and other cotton fabrics, deserve to be mentioned. Cables, the various kinds of small cordage and span yarn, are made in two extensive ropewalks. The latter has for some years been an article of exportation. Wool hats are not manufactured here; but fur hats, of a good quality, are made in such quantities as to give a surplus for exportation to the Mississippi, where they are exchanged for peltry. The tanning and carrying of leather is carried on at six tan-yards in this place and its vicinity, and the manufacture of shoes, boots and saddlery, is extensive. Skin-dressing in allum is executed with neatness. Trunks covered with deer skin and oil cloth, leather gloves, and a variety of brushes, are made, of a good quality. Blank books, and all kinds of common and extra binding, are executed with neatness.

The Cincinnati Manufacturing Company have embraced in their plan, manufactories of white and red lead, of such extent as will yield six or seven tons per week. The latter is not yet completed—but the former, which is the third that has been erected between the Mississippi and the mountains, is in operation, and produces white lead of an excellent quality. It must indeed be superior to that brought from the Atlantic states, as it has no mixture of whiting, with which the imported white lead is always alloyed.* Arrangements for a sugar-refinery were made early in the present year; the buildings have been commenced, and the establishment will be in operation in a few weeks. Tobacco and snuff are manufactured in four different shops. Pot and pearl ash, soap of various kinds, and candles, are made in such quantities as to give a large surplus for exportation.

The rectification of spirit and distillation of cordials, are prosecuted to such a degree as to give an ample supply of the latter for domestic use. But these establishments, both in extent and utility, are eclipsed by our breweries. The first was erected on the river bank in the lower part of the town, four years ago, and uses the river water; the other was established since, on a smaller scale, and derives its water from wells and cisterns. The two are calculated to consume, annually, 30,000 bushels of barley. Their products are beer, porter and ale, of a quality at least equal to that of the Atlantic states. Large quantities have been exported to the Mississippi, even as far as to New Orleans, the climate of which they are found to bear very well.

The manufacture of flour, at the steam-mill, will be carried on to a great extent. The machinery is all on the plan of Oliver Evans, and driven by an engine of 70 horse power. Four pair of six feet burr stones will be run. Two pair have been in motion for several months, and produce about 60 bbls. of flour per day; the whole when in operation will, it is expected, afford 700 bbls. a week. The flour is generally of a superior quality.

In the year 1814, a mustard manufactory was erected above the town, but has not yet got into such extensive operation as to supercede the importation of that article.

In the fine arts we have not any thing to boast—but it is worthy of being mentioned, that all kinds of labelling, sign and ornamental painting, together with engraving on copper of official and other seals, cards of address and vignettes, is executed with taste and elegance.

Bounty Lands.

WAR DEPARTMENT. To facilitate the business of obtaining warrants for military bounty land under the acts of the 24th December, 1811, of the 11th January, 1812, and of the 10th December, 1814, all persons interested are invited to attend to the following INFORMATION:

1st. Every person whose services entitle him to a land warrant, and who personally applies for it, will be held to produce at the War Department his original discharge, which ought to express the date of enlistment, the term for which the person was enlisted, that he has faithfully served the United States during that term, and he is honorably discharged. The phraseology of discharges of disability necessarily differs from ordinary discharges; but in those the term "honorably discharged" is deemed tantamount to the certificate of the faithful service required by law.

2d. In cases where the original claimant shall not personally apply for his land warrant, his original discharge must be transmitted to the War Department, accompanied by a power of attorney, duly executed, of the following form:—viz.

KNOW ALL MEN BY THESE PRESENTS, That I, _____, late a _____ in captain _____ company, in the regiment of _____ who was enlisted the _____ day of _____ one thousand eight hundred and _____ to serve* _____ and honorably discharged from the army of the United States, on the _____ day of _____ one thousand eight hundred _____ as will more fully appear by my original discharge hereunto annexed, HAVE, and by these presents DO, nominate, constitute and appoint _____ my true and lawful attorney for me and in my name, and in my behalf, to procure and receive from such officer, person or persons, as shall be legally authorised to grant the same, a warrant for the quantity of land to which I am entitled for the services rendered by me as a _____ in the army of the United States, during the late war, pursuant to the law of the United States in such case made and provided. And I do further hereby empower the said _____ to do and to perform all such acts and things, and to give such a receipt or receipts, or execute such instrument or instruments in writing as shall be required, in as full and ample a manner as I could myself do were I personally present. And I do further empower him to constitute and appoint an attorney or attorneys under him for the said purposes, and also at pleasure to revoke the same. And do further hereby ratify and confirm whatever my said attorney or his substitute shall lawfully do in the premises.

N. B. In those instances where the Power of Attorney in question is executed before a Notary Public, and, of course, attested by his official seal and signature, the above Certificate of a county clerk on each Instrument will be dispensed with: but in such a case it will be required that one separate official Certificate from the Municipal or state Authority shall attest the quality and signature of such notary, which Single Certificate shall be admitted as the sanction of all such Notarial acts that accompany it.

N. B. All Substitutions of such a Power must be made before a Notary Public, in legal form.

3d. In cases where the original claimant is dead, and an heir applies in his Right, he or she will be held to ascertain by legal proof that the person in whose Right the application shall be so made, did enlist in such or such a Company or Corps, on such a day, and for such a term; and that he was slain by the enemy, or did otherwise die while in the service of the United States, at such a time and place.

Next, the actual Claimant will be held to adduce legal Certificates from competent authority to ascertain that he or she thus claiming a land warrant, is a legitimate Heir, at Law and of lawful age: in which case, although other Heirs may exist, yet the warrant will be issued in the name of the heir so proving, adding thereto the words—"and the other Heirs at Law of—&c. &c."

A Land warrant will not be issued to an Executor, nor to an Administrator.—The government of the United States, has not authorised any person to act as an agent for the purpose of transacting any part of the business relative to the obtaining military land warrants; which will, as usual, be issued gratis at the War Department: nor does it recognize any pretended land office for such purposes, nor any other Agency of that nature, in any state of the American Union.

Roman Statistics.

FROM THE IRISH MAGAZINE FOR JULY.—A statistical numeration of the armies and population of ancient Rome, collected from Livy, Dionysius, Plutarch, and Eusebius, &c.

Rome in its infant state, before an aspiring ambition had made conquest a national pursuit, was surrounded by numerous nations, each enjoying its own form of independent government, until the more fortunate arms of the new state gradually subverted them as the infancy of political existence, which proves, that nations by balancing power against the spirit of conquest, had not yet taught small communities to unite: they fought separately, and were conquered separately.

Rome began with a monarchy, but the people getting disgusted with a form of government which is more pregnant with crimes, and more expensive than any other yet known, rejected the kingly oppressors, four of them were assassinated and expelled which concluded this form of government, and Rome might have existed to this day, in all its power and grandeur had not her vices thrown her back again into the hands of masters, who under he name of emperors, exercised all the tyranny of kings, without using the odious distinction.

The rapid increase she made in population, may be seen by the following statistical view of each of the several musters of fighting men from the foundation of the city, to the usurpation of Sylla.

Year of the city.	Before Christ.	Fighting-men number.	Year of the city.	Before Christ.	Fighting-men number.
1	753	3,300	512	242	260,000
37	716	47,000	533	221	270,213

294	460	132,409	584	170	312,810
361	393	152,580	589	165	337,452
410	344	160,000	594	160	328,314
435	319	250,000	599	155	324,000
460	294	262,005	606	148	322,000

478	276	271,224	622	132	313,822
469	265	292,224	628	126	390,736
502	252	297,797	638	116	364,336
506	248	251,222	667	87	463,000

From the above statistical account it is evident that the population multiplied very fast under the kings, occasioned by the various arts used to entice the citizens of the surrounding states to settle among them. That under the beginning of the aristocracy at 265 the augmentation was prodigious, after the establishment of equal liberty and equal laws in the commonwealth. From 410 of the city to 435 it is evident by the general survey (Liv. ix. ch. 19, and x, 47,) that there was in 25 years an increase of 90,000 warriors. This enormous increase happened under the government, when it became popular, when liberty and equality removed the obstacles, which controlled the conquering genius of the people, by penal and prohibitory statutes, enacted against the plebeians (for so the people were stigmatized by the aristocratic ascendancy of Rome) whereby they were prevented from acquiring property—consequence, rank, or state honors. But as censors and tribunes were established, thereby the morals were admirably maintained, and the vigor of the law supported and preserved for a long time: for as good laws make good men, so good men defend good laws, whereby they are both a mutual defence to each other.

Thus, we see the councils of popular assemblies more bold, more magnanimous, and wiser than the paralyzed efforts of aristocratic senates, and ill guided princes. To what other cause can we attribute the ambitious, nay gigantic designs of the petty governments of Athens and Lacedæmon, states not as large as Munster, and other petty republican states, but to the noble avarice, not of wealth, but of glory and fame for their country and selves, united by the virtues and emulation of their particular magistrates and commanders, where the supreme dignities are successively attainable in annual rotation, as the never failing reward of individual ability and desert.

The Bourbons.

The names of some of the Bourbon family so frequently recurs in the papers, that a short notice of them respectively, appears desirable.

When Louis XVI. ascended the throne in 1774, there were in France 5 families of the royal blood, viz:—1. reigning family. 2. family of Orleans. 3. of Conde, 4. of Conti. 5. of Penthièvre (the last a legitimated family, viz: its parent stock born out of wedlock, but acknowledged.)

There were, besides, in Europe, 3 families descended from the house of Bourbon, viz—one in Spain, one in Naples and one in Parma.

Louis Stanislaus Xavier, now Louis the 18th, was born Nov. 17, 1755.

Charles Philip, count D'Artois, 3d brother to Louis XVI, was born Oct. 9, 1775.

The duke D'Angouleme, eldest son to count D'Artois, was born Aug. 6th, 1775.

Maria Theresa Charlotte, Duchess of Angouleme, (Daughter of Louis XVI, and first cousin to her husband) was born Dec. 19, 1778. N. B. By the salic law, women did not inherit the crown of France. The lilies do not spin, was the adage.

The Duke of Berri, second son to the count D'Artois, was born Jan. 24, 1778.

Philip, duke of Orleans, son of the noted Egalité, was born Oct. 6. He afterwards came to the U. States, through which he travelled with his two brothers, one of whom is since dead. Philip taught French in Canada—he was once a republican; he since became reconciled to Louis XVIII. having, of course, abjured former principles.

The mother of Philip D'Orleans is a daughter of the virtuous duke of Penthièvre. If her husband's life was a tissue of infamy, her own is a bright pattern of whatever is amiable or attractive in the female character. She is on earth a suffering angel. Bonaparte is said to have lately settled on her a large pension. Her misfortunes did not come from him. Let this little digression be excused. We have seen her so often at Anet, Vernon and other places, visiting the abodes of indigence and sickness, encouraging industry, disseminating piety and virtue, in all which she was accompanied and aided by her venerable father, that we cannot forbear adding our distant blessing to those, which, we doubt not, she still continues to receive.—Her other children, not being conspicuous at present, are not mentioned here.

The branch of Conde has been remarkable for courage and gallantry. The prince of Conde long headed the Emigrants. The high qualities and the melancholy fate of the duke D'Enghien, are well known.

The Bourbons are reproached with degeneracy. Religious ideas and a factious dignity prevented their intermarrying with protestant families of royal rank abroad, or in noble families of the kingdom. Their connubial connexions were confined to the catholic houses of Austria, Savoy, Spain, Bavaria, and Bourbon. Natural history requires no more to account for that degeneracy. Moral causes, still more efficient, might be adduced to aid the explanation.—We leave the task to others. Strange, yet necessary decline of dynasties! Inevitable effects of luxury, inertness, torpor, and hereditary power! Look at the house of Medicis—at the family of the Stuarts—at the last malchiers at Vienna, in the insignificant Charles VI! This alone ought to be sufficient to cure mankind of the mania of hereditary rulers.—Richmond Compiler.

To the inhabitants of the ceded parts of the kingdom of Saxony

By the treaty of peace concluded on the 18th of this month, and ratified on the 21st, between me and the courts of Austria, Russia and Prussia, I have consented to the cession of that part of my hereditary states, of which the congress at Vienna had disposed, which had, at the same time, added the clause, that the rest of my hereditary states, would not be restored, till I had consented to the cessions demanded.

During my long government, I have been guided in all my operations solely by my solicitude for the good of the subjects who were entrusted to me. The issue of all human enterprizes is in the hand of God. All my efforts to avert so painful a sacrifice have been in vain. I must part from you; and the bonds which your fidelity and your attachment to my person rendered so dear to me—the bonds which have formed for ages the happiness of my house, and of your ancestors, must be broken. Conformably to the promise made to the allied powers, I release you, Subjects and Soldiers of the provinces separated from my kingdom, from your oath to me and my house; and I recommend you to be faithful and obedient to your new sovereign.

My gratitude for your fidelity, my love, and my ardent wishes for your welfare, will always attend you. (Signed) FREDERICK AUGUSTUS.

Luxemburgh, May 22.

PROCLAMATION. "We, Ferdinand IV. by the grace of God, king of the Two Sicilies and of Jerusalem, Infant of Spain, duke of Parma, Placenza, Castro, &c. grand hereditary prince of Tuscany, &c. &c."

"Neapolitans!—The time is arrived when I return to my throne of Naples! all combines to favor my steps. Your unanimous wishes calls me back.

"The general assent of the high allied powers does justice to my claims. The constant and powerful assistance of my allies animates and preserves me. I come at the head of an army, not like conquerors, to deceive and incite to revolt unsuspecting nations, or like adventurers to obtain by force and fraud what a state of peace cannot procure them.

"I return to the bosom of my family. I come to bring peace and consolation. I come to restore the ancient purity [of what is not said] and to efface from the minds all the sufferings they have undergone. No; it is not your destination to carry the torch of discord among those who are not your enemies. You are not destined to be degraded by that species of glory which results from terror and devastation. The history of your ancestors is very glorious for you. Descendants of the Bruzi, the Campani, and the Sanniti, you must make the foreign disturbers of your civil happiness and your tranquility tremble, but not be the instruments of their ambition, or the victims of their deceit. Your sons shall not perish in the icy plains of the north—your livelihood the fruit of your exertions, the production of your happy soil, shall be enjoyed by yourselves alone.

"Neapolitans, return into my arms; I was born among you, I know and esteem your manners, your character and your customs. I wish nothing more than to give the clearest proofs of my paternal love, and to be able to make the new period of my government the happy epoch of the welfare and real happiness of our country. A single day shall efface the sad recollections, the sufferings of many years.

"The most sacred and individual pledges of moderation, mildness, mutual confidence, and a perfect union, shall guarantee your repose.

"Neapolitans!—Support by your aid our enterprise, the object of which is so great, so just, so beneficial, and which forms a part of the common cause of Europe, which so valiantly defends it with an immense force, and by the union of civilized nations.

"I promise you, that without any exception, no account shall be demanded, no notice taken of those who during my life, as well as during my former absence, have failed in the duty of fidelity to me. An impenetrable and eternal veil shall cover all the actions that have taken place. All opinions that have been expressed during this period, I promise, on this head, in the most solemn manner, and upon my royal word, the most complete, the most exact, the most general and eternal amnesty and oblivion.

"I promise to all Neapolitans and Sicilians who serve in the army, by land or by sea, that they shall retain their pay, their rank, and the military honors which they at present enjoy.

"May God, the witness of the sincerity and firmness of my sentiment, crown the result with his blessing."

FERDINAND.

Palermo, May 6, 1815.

SWITZERLAND, May 26.

Note delivered to the diet by the ministers of the four great Powers, which was read in the sitting of the 12th May.

"From the moment that Bonaparte returned to France, all Switzerland resolved by an unanimous and energetic determination to take up arms to defend its frontiers, and to keep off those disorders of all kinds with which Europe is menaced by the return of this Usurper.

"This measure, which fully displayed the energy of the diet, and the wisdom of its deliberations, was perfectly in harmony with the sentiments of all Europe, which openly applauded the conduct of a people, who, though nearest to the danger, was seen to pronounce without hesitation, on the events of which France is the theatre, and boldly profess sentiments so honorable, by repelling the proposals made by the pretended government of that country to all the states, and which were every where rejected with indignation.

"In this unexpected and unparalleled crisis, the Helvetic confederacy, guided by its ancient integrity, has joined of itself the system of Europe, and embraced the cause of social order and of the safety of nations. It has felt the conviction that so long as the volcano, rekindled in France, should threaten to influence and convulse the world, the inestimable advantages which the high allied powers take a pleasure in seeing enjoyed by Switzerland, its welfare, its independence, its neutrality, would be always exposed to the encroachments of that illegal and destroying power which no moral restraint is able to check.

"United by the same wish, of annihilating this power, the sovereigns assembled at the congress of Vienna have proclaimed their principles in the treaty of the 25th of March, as well as the engagements they contracted to maintain them.

"All the other states of Europe have been invited to accede to it, and they have readily answered this invitation. Thus, the moment is arrived, when the august sovereigns, whose orders the undersigned are commissioned to execute here, expect that the diet, on receipt of the present official communications, will, by a formal and authentic declaration adopt the same principles, and in concert with the undersigned resolve on the measures which may become necessary to oppose the common danger.

"But at the same time that the powers expect without any doubt, that Switzerland, agreed with them on the principal object, will make no difficulty in declaring that it is armed to attain it, and that it will place itself in the same line of policy, they are very far from proposing to it to display any other force than such as is proportioned to the resources and the usages of its people. They respect the military system of a nation which, remote from all ambition, puts forces on foot only to defend its liberty and its independence; they know the value which Switzerland attaches to the principle of neutrality; it is not to infringe upon it, but solely to accelerate the period when this principle may be applied in an advantageous and permanent manner that they propose to the confederation, to assume an energetic attitude, and adopt vigorous measures commensurate to the extraordinary circumstances of the times, but without forming a precedent for the future.

"It is conformably with these principles that the undersigned have received from their respective courts, the necessary instructions to regulate by a convention which cannot but be agreeable to Switzerland, the footing upon which its adhesion is to subsist to the sacred cause which it has already embraced. They have therefore, the honor to invite the diet without delay to name plenipotentiaries to enter into a negotiation with them upon this subject.

"The allied monarchs impose upon themselves, the greatest sacrifices; nevertheless they require from Switzerland, only those from which it cannot possibly withdraw itself in a crisis in which its dearest interests are at stake, and to alleviate the burden of putting on foot the forces necessary for the vigorous defence of their frontiers, as well as to insure its success, they propose to keep at the disposal of Switzerland all the assistance which the general operations of the war shall permit them to dedicate to this object.

"The monarchs desire in this manner among this nation (the object of their particular regard and esteem) those sentiments of attachment, confidence and gratitude, to which they believe themselves so justly entitled, sentiments which they would have at heart still to increase and strengthen at the time of a general peace, by paying particular attention to the interests and safety of Switzerland.

"The undersigned renew to his excellency the president, and to Messrs. the deputies to the diet, the assurance of their distinguished consideration.

Zurich, May 6, 1815.

STRATFORD CANNING, KRUDENER, SCHRAUT, CHAMBERLAIN."

Answer of the diet

"At the moment when a new political convulsion shewed itself in France, Switzerland, struck with the dangers of its situation, took with vigor and celerity the measures of safety which the importance of the circumstances required. The diet has made known by proclamation the object of these armaments; it has avoided all connection with the man who has taken the reins of the French government, and has refused to recognise him.

"The ministers of the allied powers justly infer from this conduct, that Switzerland, united in interest and intentions with the other states, must oppose with all its might a power which threatens the peace, the tranquillity, the independence, and the rights of all nations. Such are, in fact, the resolutions of the diet.

"The British, Austrian, Russian and Prussian ministers.

"The relations which it maintains with high allied powers, and even with them alone, leave no doubt respecting its disposition or its designs; it will abide by them with that constancy and fidelity which have been at all times honorable features in the Swiss character.

"Twenty two little republics, united among themselves for their security and the assertion of their independence, must seek their national strength in the principle of their confederation.—This is what is prescribed by the nature of things, by the geographical situation, the constitution and the character of the Swiss people.

"A consequence of this principle is its neutrality recognised in its favor, as the basis of its future relations with all states. It equally results from this principle, that in the great contest which is on the eve of commencing, the part of Switzerland must naturally consist in the vigorous defence of its frontiers.—By remaining on this line, it does not enstrange itself from the cause of other powers; on the contrary, it embraces it the more sincerely, and serves it with the more advantage, as this cause becomes immediately its own. Considered in itself, the defence of a frontier 50 leagues in extent, which serves as a point d'appui to the movement of two armies, is a co-operation not only very effectual, but even of the highest importance. Thirty thousand men and more have been put on foot for this purpose. Resolved to maintain this development of force, Switzerland thinks on its side that it may expect from the kindness of the powers that their armies will respect its territory, till it shall itself call for their aid.—Assurances on this head are absolutely necessary to tranquilize the people, and to induce them to bear with courage so great a burden.

The diet believes, that it has answered, by these explanations, the expectations of their excellencies the ministers, at the same time that it shews its confidence in the justice and magnanimity of the monarchs who have but lately taken such an interest in the fate of this country, and thus acquire fresh claims to its gratitude.

"If there is now any thing to be done according to the principles above explained, in order to fix in a more precise manner the political relations of the confederation of the allied powers, during the continuance of the present war, and at the same time to agree on the conditions of its system of defence, the diet is ready to hear these overtures; it has commissioned Messrs. the burgomaster Wyss, the avoyer Merlimen, and the burgomaster Weiland, to enter into a negotiation with Messrs. the ministers, upon these two points, which are essentially inseparable. But in every case the right is reserved to the cantons to take a definite resolution on this head, and to give these arrangements legal validity by constitutionally confirming them."

Zurich, May 12, 1815.

Paris dates, July 29, by an arrival at New York from Havre de Grace—

There was a strong report at Havre de Grace, that the French armies having shewn some symptoms of hostility, 20,000 Prussians had been detached to prevent a junction of two of the French divisions (probably that which retired from Paris and the army under Suchet)—who were attacked by the French and "almost annihilated," and that 800 waggon had been put in requisition to bring off the wounded. It is added that the account was not permitted to appear in the Paris papers.

The duke of Orleans arrived at Paris from his country seat near London, on the 23th July, and was received "graciously" by the king. The duke of Eckmühl had not yet arrived in Paris, as was reported. He was still with the army, which is concentrating in Berry and Auvergne. Many parts of France appear to be in great agitation. The corps of Eccelmans is in Rion, with a fine park of artillery. Lucien Bonaparte has been arrested at Turin. Carnot has retired to Switzerland. There is a report of the arrival of the empresses of Russia and Austria at Paris.

Independence and sovereignty of France! It appears that a large part of the allied armies in France are going into cantonments. It is said that the emperor of Russia and the king of Prussia have hired boxes for three months in the Paris theatres. The white flag, the national flag of France, is to have for its staff Russian and Prussian bayonets. This is "legitimate" liberty.

Paris is divided into 12 parts or arrondissements; 6 have Prussian commandants and 6 English.

Punishment of France. Example, says the London Sun, is the object of punishment. Yes, France must be an example, not only to herself, but to the world. We have but one enemy, our own magnanimity. The first object is to place France in her pre-revolutionary condition. She must give up some of her original possessions; "her triumphal columns and arches" must be destroyed; the boastful names by which she commemorated victories must be effaced, and the foreign titles which she gave to her successful leaders, must be relinquished. France must yet submit further: she must give up her northern fortresses; she must dismantle her frontiers; she must disorganize her soldiery; she must maintain within her territory a sufficient number of the allied troops; she must put down the whole tribe of her jacobins and Bonapartists; she must divest them of their plunder and dismiss them from her councils. We desire to punish her, not in retaliation or revenge, [oh! no; England is too christian for that;] but in justice and necessity."

Another paper observes:

The following adherents of Bonaparte, and who, jointly with their master, caused all the recent bloodshed at Waterloo, are probably now strutting about unmolested in Paris; they are worth at least a million sterling each, viz. Massena, Savary, Rapp, Brune, Soult, Suchet, Ney, Davoust, Cambaceres, Roderer, Decres, Fouché, Montalivet, Chaptal, Dubois, (ex-prefect of police) Guadin, Champagny, Maret, Caulincourt, and the soi-disant queen of Holland. How many widows and orphans could be fed and clothed from the confiscation of their ill-gotten wealth.

"I have not the least objection to the reduction of the property of these men; but it is right always to begin the work of reformation at home.—Let the British try what might be done in this way in their own country—let them confiscate the property of their bishops and other placemen and pensioners—and try their effect of the wealth to relieve their own millions of paupers. This seems most natural.

A letter from Bordeaux, says—"It is said that the treaty of Paris has been renewed between Louis XVIII and the allied monarchs, with the addition that the former is to maintain 100,000 of their troops in France for 5 years, at the expense of 500,000,000 of francs. If the French people descend to such humiliating terms, the country may be tranquil by force of arms for several years.

From a late English paper. A letter from Paris of the 12th inst. mentions that the duke of Wellington had taken an active part to protect not only the national edifices, but to prevent every kind of extortion.

A letter of the 14th, states the following particulars:—"marshal Blucher, finding his demand in the way of contribution to the amount of 100 millions of francs disregarded, caused a letter to be addressed to Lafitte, M. Tourton, M. Rougemont, M. de la Serre, M. Shirer, and M. Koch, stating that the contribution required must be forthcoming; that they, as opulent bankers, with the credit they possessed were competent to produce it; and that unless 33 millions of francs the first instalment or one third of the amount were discharged within 24 hours, they would be arrested and retained as hostages for the whole sum. It was, we understand, further intimated to these gentlemen, &c. that if any disposition was shown to avoid the contribution or procrastinate the liquidation of it, they should be conveyed to Prussia and secured in the fortress of Spandau. In this dilemma the bankers of Paris, with other inhabitants had addressed themselves to the emperor Alexander and the king of Prussia, appealing to their generosity and referring to the military convention under which Paris was surrendered.

English Gipsies. We have the following notice of a hunt after this singular people, in the London Traveller of July 24:

Gipsy Hunt. On Sunday the police officers attacked the Gipsy encampment at Norwood, from which they made a precipitate retreat; they however captured three coach loads, together with their queen and princes Thomas and John! The officers were attacked by a rallying party of about 40, in an attempt at rescue, in which they failed. They were committed as vagrants.

Paris, July 29. The papers announce that peace was signed yesterday or the day before. We cannot yet confirm this pleasing news.

It has also been announced that the Vendéens have joined the army of the Loire. This news is positively denied by a declaration of the Vendean chiefs, dated at Beauprend, the 19th instant.

Marshal Brune has, it is said, retired to Toulon, where he awaits the orders of the king.

The king has issued a decree on the 21st instant, ordering the arrest and delivery to the councils of war, to be judged according to military law, of all general officers and other military commanders of departments and cities who have repressed or shall repress, by violence or force of arms, the expressions of the fidelity of the people towards his majesty.

Alençon, July 25.—A party of 400 Prussian cavalry have entered here, and demanded forthwith the sum of 400,000 francs.

Soissons, July 27.—For some days past the Russian videttes have advanced very near to this city. Our garrison is about 2000 men. The white flag is constantly flying on public edifices. It appears that our commander has determined not to yield the place to the allies but to the last extremity.

Nevers, July 21.—Our city is occupied by the Austrians. We are overwhelmed by requisitions of all kinds.

Blois, July 23.—Our city and all its environs, have been disarmed by the Prussian corps.

Toulon, July 24.—This morning, all the military and civil officers of the marine, at this port, have addressed a respectful submission to the king. The white flag has been hoisted, and the English squad ron which was in sight of the port, saluted the flag as soon as they saw it flying on the forts and fortresses.

MANIFESTO OF THE EMPEROR OF RUSSIA.

St. Petersburg, June 17.—The following is the manifesto published by his imperial majesty from Vienna:—

"The sense of religion, that rich source of national strength which has prevailed in Russia since the oldest times, vanquished, in the face of the whole world, and for the deliverance of Europe, the destructive infidelity—the mischief-working corruption of morals—the sad deviation from the right path to which the human understanding is subject.

"This never-to-be-forgotten conquest and triumph, to which history furnished no parallel, must in justice, be ascribed to the generous sacrifices and heroic deeds by which the faithful sons of our country have testified their love and devotion. It united all European nations in indissoluble bonds, and harmonized all their views and prejudices, which till then had been at variance, by directing them to the only useful object, a desired and durable peace, which might be firmly established in the legal advantages granted to each power, and on internal institutions protecting the welfare and independence of nations.

"With heartfelt joy we announce to our beloved subjects, that all conventions tending to the good of the state have been concluded in conformity with this principle, and the object which we propose.

"It is not vain covetousness which has induced us to seek an extension of our frontiers—such a feeling would have been unnatural in one who had taken arms to defend the country, but not to make conquests. The unconquerable strength of the Russian empire, founded upon religion, loyalty, and prosperity, cannot be increased by external acquisitions. The union of the far greater part of the late duchy of Warsaw under one sceptre, has proved to be absolutely necessary for the establishment of a general balance of power and of order in Europe. By this measure, the safety of our frontiers is insured—a firm barrier is erected against interruption of peace and hostile attempts, and the bonds of fraternity formed between nations, united together by one common origin.

"For this reason we have thought proper to fix the fate of this country, and re-establish the internal administration upon principles suitable to the language and customs of the inhabitants, and adapted to their local situation. Following the precepts of the Christian religion, whose dominion extends over so many nations, yet maintains at the same time their distinguishing qualities and customs—we cherish the wish while we prepare this welfare of our new subject, to inspire their hearts with sentiments of attachment to our throne, and thus to efface for ever the traces of past misfortunes, which were caused by fatal disunion, and the long struggle.

But at the moment when we thought of returning to our happy country, and of enjoying the peace earned by such painful labors, a new war is kindled, preordained by the impendable councils of the Almighty. His kind Providence, which rules over us, which changes even evil into good, permitted the rebellious spirit that was concealed in France, to burst forth, just at the time when the sovereigns and people, in a state of powerful preparation, were watchful that by their united power, wickedness may be wholly extirpated, the harvest cleared from the weeds, and the precious fruit of inviolable peace flourish among the powers, who observe the laws of the Christian faith and truth.

"Russia also, elevated by religion, is called upon to take arms; and attentive to this call, again enters the career of glory. The perfidious plan of Napoleon Bonaparte—the treachery which has favored his audacious enterprise—the rapidity of his pernicious progress, aiming at the overthrow of society, of religion, and of law; all these reasons forbid the authorities established by the Rulers of Empires to recognise, in the midst of general order, a government which is founded on breach of faith and violence. For this reason, all the powers again form an indissoluble union, in order to annihilate the tyrannic power which has made itself master of France, and thereby to prevent fresh miseries. Not only the engagements of friendship, but also the honor of the Empire call upon us to defend the rightful cause; it cannot be foreign to Russia, which from time immemorial, has combated for religion and fidelity. In obedience to this sacred voice, we go with the help of the most High, to new deeds. The fruit of such great and glorious victories will not be lost.

"Resolved to share every danger and privation with our victorious army, we place our firm confidence in the Lord of Hosts, in the protector of the Just. It is, indeed, painful to our heart to prolong our absence from the country, but we firmly trust in the divine favour, which every where protects us, that this absence will be of short duration.

"The attachment and devotion of all the authorities in the Empire, animated by only one feeling and the valor of our troops, will crown the work which we have before us with the desired success. All the European powers will act in concert with us.

"In the days of danger and glory, when the raging enemy, who had penetrated over our frontiers, thought in his insatiation to strike a deadly blow against Russia—when Europe, subject to his yoke, rose against us—we invoked the Almighty, and implored him to turn his eye on the church in mourning, to deliver his inheritance, and endow us with strength to triumph over wickedness and deceit, to protect the independence of nations and their rulers. The Most High heard the voice of our prayers, his right hand guided Russia in the career of glory; no, we will not deviate from it, and his gracious care for us will be completed."

War Events:

On matters belonging to the late war with G. B. Adjutant and Inspector General's office, Sept. 7, 1815.

GENERAL ORDER.—The several laws and articles of war relative to brevet rank, having been duly considered by the president of the United States, he is pleased to direct, for the future government of the army, that commissions in the staff shall confer neither rank or emolument to officers of the line who hold brevets by virtue of appointments in the general staff of the army, which are superseded by the act of March 3, 1815. By order,

D. PARKER, Adj. and Ins. gen.

We learn from the south, (says the National Intelligencer) that 600 troops are about to march from Fort Hawkins to attend the commissioners in running the boundary line of the Creek nation, which, it is believed, will consume several months. The Georgia Journal states, that this large force is required by the threatened opposition of the hostile Indians, who have taken refuge in Florida. Those Indians who are considered friendly, are not well satisfied with losing the large portion of territory which they ceded by the treaty; but from them, though they murmur, no molestation is apprehended.

MESSRS. GALLATIN AND CLAY partook of a splendid public dinner, at Tammany Hall, New-York, on the 5th instant, Judge Livingston presided; the company was of the first respectability. Among the invited guests were A. J. Dallas, secretary of the treasury, Rufus King, Esq. the mayor of the city, general Macomb and general Swift.

Among others the following toasts were drank:

The United States—May the chain of our union never be broken—it has been brightened, not weakened, by collision.

Peace makers whose country awards them the laurel when they present her the olive.

The memory of the late James A. Bayard—The country which entombs his ashes, laments his death, and will ever remember his services.

The American Sine-qua-non—The rights of our country. The Liberty and Independence—We have character, peace, commerce, wealth, status and independence.

Foreign nations—Enemies in war, in peace friends; may our attachment to peace never be mistaken for an undue dread of war.

The American Eagle—In her desire to retain the Olive Branch, may she never lose her arrows.

Commerce—We desire from it the enjoyments of peace, and it affords us the sinews of war.

The Wealth of Nations—Liberty.

The Principles of Washington—Honor, faith, union and independence.

The 18 Stars—A bright constellation in the western hemisphere, propitious to freedom, blasting to tyranny.

The Tree of Liberty—Indigenous in our country, may it flourish wherever transplanted, and brave every political tempest.

Our gallant Tars—They have made their country proud of its flag and of them.

The army of the United States—Its courage was never subdued, and when disciplined it conquered.

Our Militia and Volunteers—They proved that a free country will never want gallant defenders.

By Mr. Gallatin—The city of New-York.

By Mr. Clay—The 8th of January, 1815.

After the guests had retired,

By the President—Our distinguished guests, Albert Gallatin and Henry Clay.

By the President, Judge Livingston—The late war, may it make the belligerents better friends.

By the hon. Mr. Dallas—The lesson of the war, preparation in peace.

By the hon. Mr. King—The public credit, sustained by equal taxes, and a uniform currency.

By Mr. Fairlie—Commodore Decatur, and our negotiators in the Mediterranean.

"THE PEACE PARTY."—The following paragraph is extracted from a Portsmouth (Eng.) paper, which, noticing the arrival there of the troops from Canada, has a number of remarks on the state of the country, &c.—it is an infamous record of those who affected to love peace so well as to do all they could to assist the British in winning it, by the subjugation of the United States—

"(When the army arrived in Canada, from being a remarkable cheap country, every article of the first necessity became remarkably dear, in some places not to be had; there was only sufficient for the inhabitants themselves; the quantity consumed by the new comers created a scarcity, and but for the Americans, who furnished supplies of fresh beef and flour, the army could not have been supported.)"

A SAILOR'S NOTION.—It is stated that a few days since a vessel entering the Hook (New-York) and not coming too as ordered by a British frigate, was fired into! The wind dying away, she was afterwards boarded from "his majesty's" ship and overhauled. The boarding officer said they were ordered to let no vessel pass without examination. On which a sailor observed; "he guessed the order would not be enforced if the Guerriere happened to come that way."

Celebration at Stonington.—Thursday, the 10th of July, being the anniversary of the day on which the inhabitants so gallantly beat off a British brig of war, was appointed as a day of thanksgiving and prayer. A procession was formed at the battery, (where floated the colors that were a year ago so nobly defended) and, with the rev. Mr. Hart proceeded with proper music, to the meeting-house. It was unusually crowded. The discourse was concise, nervous and feeling; and reflects the greatest honor on Mr. Hart. When the service and ceremony of the church were finished, the assembly again formed procession, and moved to the battery, where Mr. Hart pronounced a short prayer.

Animated by the impressions which the time and place could not but revive, the people in their fervor gave three cheers, and each retired to his respective abode.

On Friday evening a grand anniversary ball was given; the assembly being both numerous and brilliant.

N. Y. Col.

HONOURS.—Among those on whom the prince regent of England has recently conferred the insignia of the "most honorable order of the Bath," are sir Philip P. B. Broke, and the foul villain Cockburn. The first in reward for the capture of the Chesapeake, and the second for—robbing hen roosts and church yard vaults.

IMMENSE COMPLIMENT! If the following, from the London Globe, is not too stupid for the purpose, it contains the highest compliment that has yet been paid to the American navy. Eight or ten naval battles were fought with pretty nearly an equality of force, in all which we beat the English—but the accidental capture of the Chesapeake is compared with the battle of Waterloo!

"Remarkable Similarity in two Recent Achievements.

WELLINGTON at Waterloo; BROKE at Boston Light-house.

BOTH

preferred waiting the attack to becoming the assailant:

WELLINGTON, when he saw confusion in the enemy's retreat;

BROKE, when the enemy flinched from his guns, rushed on like a lion from his den;

(the former in 3 hours, the latter in 3 minutes) drove all before them.

The result,

SIGNAL AND DECISIVE VICTORY.

Skill and bravery so consummate, while it adds lustre to the military and naval glory of the United Kingdom, cannot fail to obtain, through

Divine Providence,

the legitimate end of War—safe and honorable Peace."

ONE GENTLEMAN, even in the "Bulwark." From the London Courier of July 21.—About the beginning of July, 1814, a small vessel was captured by the boats of his majesty's ship Bulwark, on the coast of America; a gentleman of the name of BULLARD was a passenger, and detained a few days on board the Bulwark. After he was sent to Halifax, it was discovered that the lieutenant's boy, in whose cabin he had occasionally been, had stolen some money from him. As no account could be got of Mr. Bullard at Halifax, if he will send proper documents to prove he is the person, to Messrs. Cooke, Halford & Son, No. 41, Norfolk-street, Strand, London, the money will be restored.

CHRONICLE.

PEACE WITH ALGIERS—Decatur h: "certainly made peace with Algiers—the terms are yet unknown, but we understand they were such as he pleased to dictate, and we are satisfied for the present. Report says that he had captured two Algerine frigates, two sloops of war, and smaller vessels; that he had made a treaty by which no tribute is to be given; adding that he had notified the Americans at Cadiz, &c. that they might navigate the Mediterranean in safety.

The vessels taken from the Algerines were to be given back, but were afterwards seized by the Spaniards.

The American prisoners in Algiers were released without ransom, and capt. Smith, of Salem, was paid $15,000 for his detention. The Independence, com. Bainbridge, had passed Gibraltar, and Decatur, with his squadron proceeded to Tripoli.

From the Lexington Gazette of August 23. A gentleman who has just arrived from St Louis, informs that a TREATY OF PEACE has been negotiated with the hostile tribes of Indians in that quarter, and that depredations on the frontiers had ceased. Col. Miller's regiment was ordered to Detroit, and is to be replaced by the one commanded by colonel Nicholas.

The U. S. frigate Java, capt. Perry, has arrived at New York, from the Chesapeake.

The white flag was re-hoisted on board the French frigate Hermione, at New-York, a few days since, under a royal salute; which was returned by the forts in the harbor.

A great number of vessels, especially British, have been recently wrecked on the American coasts; and many lives have been lost.

Joseph Bonaparte, ex-king of Spain, arrived in Baltimore on Thursday last on his way to the southward from New York, where it appears he had landed some days since from a brig bound to Charleston S. C. The particulars of his escape are not stated, but there is no doubt of the fact that he was in Baltimore on Thursday last and left it the same day for Washington city. It is reported he is about to purchase an estate in New Jersey, and that he is rich.

Custom-house receipts. The duties on imported goods entered at the custom-house in New York, in the months of April, May and June, amount to nearly four millions of dollars.—The following statement for these months, is authentic; the accounts for July is not yet made up:

April	500,000
May	1,300,000
June	2,139,000
Total	3,939,000

It is probable that the duties on goods received in July will exceed those of June, and those of August and September be greater than either. An immense business is doing in New York. It is said to be as busy as the busiest part of London. This will probably, and very soon be, one of the greatest cities in the world.

Vermont election. It is probable, from the returns of votes that have reached us, that the republican ticket for governor, &c. has prevailed in Vermont by an unprecedented majority.—Mr. Chittenden, the present governor, giving place to Mr. Galusha, rep. The return of 35 towns, gives a republican nett gain of 503 votes.

Water-melons. 120 water-melons, raised in New-Jersey, by a Mr. Browning, were recently offered for sale in the Philadelphia market, the average weight of which was supposed to be nearly 50 lbs. The largest weighed 56 lbs.

Buffalo, September 5. The British government armed schooner Tecumseh, was dismasted by a gale on Saturday last, in sight of this port. She had about 100 men on board, but we understand no lives were lost. She returned to fort Erie the same day under jury masts, and proceeded to the navy yard at Chippewa, where she is repairing.

INLAND NAVIGATION. Seneca Locks.—We have the satisfaction to state (says the Geneva Gazette) that on the 23d August, the first boat (about 70 feet in length) went through the two upper locks on the Seneca falls, loaded with upwards of one hundred persons, in presence of a great number of spectators, collected from different parts of the country. The boat, having entered the guard lock, went through the new canal, nearly 3-4ths of a mile in length, and descended the two locks in 25 minutes—then turned about in the Seneca river and re-ascended the locks in 9 minutes—all which no doubt will be accomplished hereafter in much less time, considering that every thing was new, and managed by hands unacquainted with lock navigation concerns, the architect, Mr. Marshal Lewis, excepted, whose faithful exertions deserve the highest praise. The workmanship of these locks, as it respects solidity and neatness, is probably not exceeded by any heretofore constructed. The locks, canals and dams, as far down as colonel Mynder's old mills, will, no doubt, be completed before winter; and the remainder, near and below the colonel's new mill, will in all probability pass inspection by the middle of next season. The completion of these locks, will be important, not only as it respects the advantages which this village will derive from it, but in particular, the convenience of transportation for the immense country west of this.

New-York, September 11. The steam frigate "Fulton the First," got under way in the East river this morning, at low water, and moved majestically into the bay. When north of Castle Williams, the Fulton fired a national salute, which was returned from fort Columbus, on Governor's island. The spectacle gave great delight to hundreds assembled on the Battery. As soon as the smoke had cleared away, the steam frigate was seen ploughing her way with steadiness and speed. The wind being ahead and no tide in her favor, the trial made to-day must remove the doubts that hitherto lingered in the breasts of a few. [It is stated that during the whole time she was under way, she made at the rate of 5 1-2 knots per hour!]

Plattsburg, August 6. The new steam-boat has commenced running from Whitehall to St. John's, on Lake Champlain. We understand this boat is fitted up in a style not inferior to those on the North River.

Decisions in the Court of King's Bench, London.—

SMALL POX. Two convictions lately occurred in this court for spreading the infection of small-pox. The first is that of Sophia Vantandillo, charged in the indictment with carrying her infant son into the streets, &c. in an infectious stage of the small-pox. She concealed the fact from her neighbors—"Near her house was a children's school, and eleven persons caught the disease, of whom eight died—one a girl of 18." The court sentenced her to 3 months imprisonment in the king's bench.

2d case. J. Burnett was tried and convicted, on the 7th June, for exposing several children in the streets, in the infectious stage of the small-pox.—He was sentenced to six months imprisonment. The court said, "that if a person choose to inoculate for the small-pox, it must be done in a mode not dangerous to others. The person, when in a stage of infection, must not be carried into the haunts of men."

To H. Niles.

SIR—I take the liberty to forward you for publication the enclosed manuscript, containing a full and complete detail of all the extraordinary narrations recorded in the no less extraordinary pamphlet whose title stands at the head of the piece. It was the principal source of amusement to the author during a recent voyage from England to America, and he hopes it may not prove less amusing to your numerous readers.

SECRET MEMOIRS OF THE HONORABLE ANDREW COCHRANE JOHNSTONE, OF THE HONORABLE VICE-ADMIRAL SIR ALEXANDER COCHRANE, K. B. AND OF SIR THOMAS JOHN COCHRANE, A CAPTAIN IN THE ROYAL NAVY; WITH AN ACCOUNT OF THE CIRCUMSTANCES WHICH LED TO THE DISCOVERY OF THE CONSPIRACY OF LORD COCHRANE AND OTHERS TO DEFAUD THE STOCK EXCHANGE.—BY A. MACKENROT.—LONDON; PRINTED BY AND FOR THE AUTHOR, FALM-MALL; AND PUBLISHED BY C. CHAPPEL, FALM-MALL.—1814, p. p. 122.

Of the illustrious trio, whose characters are depicted in such striking colors by Mr. Mackenrot, we profess to have no other knowledge but what public report has made us acquainted with; and of Mr. Mackenrot himself, we know no more than what he has told us at the seventieth page of his pamphlet, to wit, that he was late a magistrate in the island of Tortola. Unable therefore to estimate with accuracy the weight of character attached to either of the parties, we shall not venture to express an opinion in regard to Mr. Mackenrot's statements; but proceed at once to lay before our readers a series of the most abandoned acts, that perhaps were ever contained within the compass of 120 pages. The author has a short preface, in which, declining to employ the pruning knife of criticism, and the embellishments of professors in the art of book making, he humbly trusts, that truth will be found preferable to high-flown and labored eloquence and style.—He then proceeds to the secret memoirs of the honorable Andrew Cochrane Johnstone,* professing to have before his eyes the fear of God, and the fear of the attorney-general; and having determined to confine himself to a narrative of facts, such as came to his own immediate knowledge: (he having been an eye witness to most of the occurrences here related, and having repeatedly endeavored to bring the hon. offenders to public trial.) He solemnly declares, that he writes merely for the purpose of public justice, and not to slander or revile any private character, being able and willing to prove all his assertions in any court of justice. By prefixing his name to this publication, he bids defiance to all, who may conceive themselves too severely spoken of, being persuaded that his pages, far from inviting an ex-officio information, for libel from the attorney-general, will rather attract the notice of this crown-lawyer, to induce him to institute prosecutions of the divers public wrongs and offences here complained of. Mr. Mackenrot then enters with great boldness upon the consideration of the celebrated hoax that was played off on the stock exchange on the 21st of February, 1814, (and of which he appears to have been the first informer) for the purpose of vindicating the conduct of "his majesty's secretary of state for the home department," during "this nefarious transaction." His remarks are chiefly confined to the legality of arresting M. de Berenger, and "the lawless designs conceived and executed by two members of the house of commons, both honorable men, both guardians of their country." Dispensing however with this part of the subject for the present, we shall begin with our author's memoirs of Mr. Cochrane Johnstone at that part of it, where he declares that the "high powers of mind" ascribed to the honorable member, "will invariably turn out to be the crafty contrivances and schemes to overreach the unwary, to betray private friendship, to corrupt public men, and to gratify avarice, lust, and ambition, at the expence of justice and honor."

According to Mr. Mackenrot, sir Thomas John Cochrane was betrayed into the fraud upon the stock exchange by his uncle Cochrane Johnstone; who "grown grey in iniquity," was not content with his own disgraceful plans for defrauding the public.—The latter, "about 12 years ago, was married for the second time" to mademoiselle de Clugny, a French lady of great fortune in the island of Guadaloupe, who was divorced again from him shortly afterwards, not as the Public Character† informed us, by the mere fat of the French governor, in consequence of orders he had received for that purpose from France, but from her own choice, she being prompted to an act of separation by the ill usage she experienced on the part of Mr. Cochrane Johnstone. She indignantly returned him the few thousand dollars he had sent her in July 1803, from Montserrat, together with his letters unopened; and Mr. C. Johnstone soon indemnified himself, by relieving the monotony of the scene in the embraces of a variety of concubines, whose abject condition compelled them to submit to his brutalities; and in particular one instance we know, says the author, where an innocent beautiful creature, whom he had debauched, and taken away from her friends; fell a sacrifice to his brutal treatment, which occasioned an abortive delivery on board the packet on the wide Atlantic ocean, and in the most comfortable and destitute situation.

Mr. Cochrane Johnstone, however, was not so unfortunate in all his illicit amours, having by a prior connection of that kind a natural son, or what the old fashioned people used to call a bastard, who was some years ago a midshipman in the royal navy; and, no doubt, if the young gentleman's natural uncle, sir Alexander Cochrane, continues in favor, interest and command, this young Mr. Johnstone will be soon made a post captain before he attains the age of twenty-one, as there is a precedent in the legitimate part of his family, which happened in the years 1805 and 1806, to the great edification and encouragement of the old lieutenants and masters and commanders on the leeward Island station, as the reader will find in the sequel.

The author then details one of Mr. C. Johnstone's "characteristic performances," in which no calculations are made either of "risk or consequences." Mr. Johnston had prevailed upon a Mr. Baxter in the island of Montserrat to become his surety for the value of a neutral ship and cargo, captured by a privateer belonging to the former, and condemned; but subsequently restored to the claimant on an appeal to the prize court: when the hon. member, instead of releasing Mr. Baxter from his collateral obligation, went off, and left him in the kurch, "to pay every farthing out of his own pocket." At St. Christopher's, he found means through the instigation of a certain Dr. A—g's wife, who was a native of Scotland, to obtain possession of 100 negro slaves, (consigned with others in a French prize slave ship to the doctor), for a bill of his own on England. The doctor, it seems, had a great repugnance at first against the honorable gentleman's bill, but the latter by palavering the wife, soon gained his point; and having exported the negroes to St. Barts and St. Thomas and there sold them for cash in hard dollars, embarked for England, where, says the author, no doubt, he always voted for the abolition of the slave trade, although in reality an abettor and active practitioner in this nefarious traffic. As to the doctor's bill, of course it was never paid. He was next tried, upon his return to England, by court martial, and struck from the army list. At the same time also, he was accused of exciting mutiny in one of the black West India regiments; whom he wanted to work as field negroes upon his own plantation, and of having ordered them to be fired upon by the soldiers of another corps, when the blacks refused to lay down their arms.

Soon after, he was returned to parliament for Grampound, by twenty-seven votes. The way of conducting the elections of the small boroughs in Cornwall, says our author, is too well known to require any comment.* A seat in parliament is a very convenient thing for a man in distress, as it protects him from personal arrests; but Mr. C. Johnstone's West-India creditors became clamorous, &c. some of them went so far as to proceed at law against him, to obtain executions, and seize his furniture and other effects. London was therefore no longer a desirable spot for our hero, and he embarked for the island of Tortola, where 'his majesty's ship Beleisle, sir Alexander F. Cochrane's flag ship, was then at anchor. Here, under the countenance of his brother, the admiral, he acted occasionally as a common informer, contriving seizures of every thing that struck him as desirable. Upon the capture of the Danish islands, through the influence of the admiral, he was appointed auctioneer and agent for the captors; and his first performance in this capacity, was to bribe the judge of the vice-admiral's prize-court of Tortola, to condemn the royal Danish loans, and also certain Dutch loans, amounting to an immense sum. This sentence was reversed by the lords of appeal for prizes; not without the most severe animadversions on the scandalous conduct of the said judge. Mr. C. Johnstone, however, having an eye to his own benefit, had in the meantime got possession of all the bonds, and the produce and money paid by the planters of the said island in liquidation of the interest due thereon; and upon being afterwards ordered to surrender up this property, to be administered in the name of 'his majesty,' he refused; was arrested—released upon his word of honor—broke his parole—stole away in the depth of the night, and got on board one of the admiral's tenders, which was lying in readiness to receive him. The tender got under weigh immediately, touched at day-light at Tortola, distant 12 leagues, where Mr. C. Johnstone landed at the author's house; and, upon pushing off again, requested his appearance to be kept secret. He rowed towards the homeward bound packet, embarked, and about an hour after sailed for England. Upon his arrival an attachment was issued against his person by the high court of appeals for prizes, for a contempt in not bringing into court the proceeds of the Danish and Dutch loans, agreeably to the monition, citation and inhibition served on him for this purpose at St. Croix; but, on account of his 'parliamentary interest,' it was never served upon him. The sum which he had illegally devoted to his own private interest, and which he had thus been cited to bring into court, amounted to 70,000*£* sterling; and this sum, after a considerable lapse of time, was paid for him by Messrs. Finley, Bannantine & Co. of London, in order to obtain his discharge from the fear of arrest. The last grand scheme and speculation in which Mr. C. Johnstone engaged prior to the stock-jobbing fraud, was the supplying the Spanish government with arms to resist their subjugation by the French. He obtained a contract for furnishing the junta with a very large quantity of muskets, about 100,000 pieces, at a stipulated price of *£*3 3s. each. These muskets he procured at Birmingham, at the low rate of 17s.—It is true, they were only ghosts of muskets, says our author, totally unfit for service; but this was no matter to the contractor; he had made them like the razors of Peter Pindar, "for sale, and not for shaving." He was to receive payment in specie at Vera Cruz, and a British frigate being appointed to carry him thither from Cadiz, he took care to lay in at this place a large quantity of foreign manufactured goods, with a view to smuggle them on shore in some of the West India islands. At Dominica, however, the captain learnt, (what was before unknown to him) that his honorable passenger had contraband goods on board; when this worthy officer, says the author, immediately reprobated him publicly on the quarter-deck, and hinted his inclination of throwing the smuggler, along with his goods, overboard.

We are next presented with some traits in the character of 'the honorable sir Alexander Forrester Cochrane, K. B.' who, during the late war, commanded a squadron of ships on the American coast. In the engagement with the French on the 6th of February, 1806, off St. Domingo, although this majesty's ships Superb, (sir Thomas Duckworth's flag ship) and Northumberland, bearing the flag of sir Alexander, sustained alone for nearly two hours the whole brunt of the French fire; yet Mr. Mackenrot insists, that sir Alexander's laurels in this action, sprang from compulsion, and not from spontaneous bravery; in short, that he was obliged to fight, and would rather have been excused from laying alongside the French admiral's ship, which was a three-decker. Sir Alexander's meeting with the fleet of Jerome Bonaparte on the fatal 6th of July, 1806, says our author, presents one of those melancholy and solitary instances where the honor of the British flag was tarnished. The admiral was here commander in chief, and his injudicious fears got such an ascendancy over his mind, as to make him actually see double, when surveying the enemy's force. The French fleet consisted of one 84, and five 74 gun ships; the British of three 74's, one 61, and two 36 gun frigates; and the former having lost a number of men through sickness, were but half manned—a circumstance perfectly known to admiral Cochrane. The two fleets met off St. Thomas—when, instead of closing and attacking the rear of the French, the English squadron all of a sudden backed to the southward, and quietly suffered the French to continue their course straight to the westward of Porto Rico. We need scarcely to add, says the author, that the sentence of admiral Byng was immediately pronounced against sir Alexander Cochrane by hundreds of voices of his indignant countrymen at St. Thomas, whilst the French ex-ultimately crowned in the momentary triumph of the pavilion tricolore, which so rarely fell to their lot.

Mammon is the god of the greatest part of the Cochrane family, and there are but few instances of their love of glory. After this affair the admiral returned with his squadron to Tortola, where, at a dinner on board the Northumberland, Mr. Mackenrot heard him acknowledge, that he abstained from attacking the enemy, because he saw the original French squadron, which he had chased from off Tortola, already superior in numbers, form a junction with three other line of battle ships off the west end of the island of St. Thomas!

Risum teneatis amici?

Sterne says, "the mind sits terrified at the objects she magnified herself, and blackened: reduce them to their proper size and hue, she overlooks them." Alas, this was admiral Cochrane's case; for these pretended three line of battle ships, which the panic-struck knight imagined he saw to leeward joining the French squadron, turned out to be nothing more nor less, than three harmless homeward bound Danish merchantmen, who had sailed that very morning from the harbor of St. Thomas, bound to Copenhagen.

The French fleet consisted of the following ships, viz:

Le Foudroyant	84 guns—admiral Willaumez
Le Veteran	74 guns—Jerome Bonaparte
Le Hazard	74 guns
Le Patriot.	74 guns

Against this inferior number of guns, Mr. Mackenrot considers the very superior efficiency of the British officers and crews, their freshness from the port of English Harbor, Antigua, (the first naval arsenal in the West Indies) to form a very great set-off, and even to over-balance the scale; as the sickness of the French crews, and the inexperience of their officers, were well known and ascertained.

After noticing the futility of the excuse set up by the admiral, namely, his having 'in charge the homeward bound convoy; and that it was generally expected in the West Indies he would find it difficult to account for his conduct to the admiralty; the author proceeds to contrast this inglorious meeting of the two squadrons with several British actions fought with the French and Spaniards under similar circumstances, in regard to the disparity of force, particularly those of sir John Jervis and lord Nelson, in 1797. He then, after a pretty long episode, resumes his narrative of the conduct of sir Alexander, by stating him to be as blameable in affording encouragement to his son, and other officers of the navy, for carrying on illegal exportations of prize produce from Tortola to St. Thomas, France, Spain, Denmark, and America; and protecting the same by 'his majesty's' ships, for money, which he shared, and regularly received, thereby becoming an accessory in this criminal breach of duty.

In August 1807, admiral Cochrane, with a number of the ships of his squadron, sailed for Halifax, to be out of the reach of the hurricanes, during the season. In Nova Scotia he possessed an estate, which being plentifully stocked with horned cattle, mules, &c. and the said admiral being a great adept in the useful science of purserage, he saw, on this occasion, much clearer than when in chase of the French squadron off St. Thomas; for he found out, and that without a council of war, that the supplying of the navy would prove an excellent market for his commodity; and thereby getting the start of the graziers of Nova Scotia, he commanded his purser to buy of him, in his grazing capacity, a large quantity of bullocks, with which, after having fully stocked his fleet, he sailed for the West Indies; where, probably, they were charged to the commissioners for victualling 'his majesty's' navy, at an advanced price; whereby the admiral managed to reap the additional profits arising from the freight, saving of insurance, besides the difference of the market and the course of exchange.—We can assure the reader, continues the author, from our own personal knowledge, that sir Alexander Cochrane employed 'his majesty's' ship Beleisle of 74 guns, to all intents and purposes, as a mule, cattle ship, and smuggler—as we saw him land, and sell mules from on board said ship, the Beleisle then at anchor at Tortola, without any entry being made of the same at the custom-house; for which offence the said ship, the Beleisle, would have been liable to seizure, had the pusillanimous officers of the custom-house of Tortola understood their duty and dared to execute it. The author then quotes the 13th British article of war, in a note, to prove that it is forbidden (under the penalty of being cashiered, and forever after rendered incapable to serve in any place or office in the naval service of 'his majesty,' his heirs or successors) for any officer in the navy to receive or permit to be received on board his ship, any goods or merchandize whatsoever, other than for the sole use of the said ship or vessel; except gold, silver and jewels, and except goods or merchandize shipwrecked, &c. In autumn, 1807, the author saw with his own eyes, sir Alexander Cochrane purchase a large quantity of duck and sheeting, through the interference of a person of the name of John Carruthers, whom he had constituted king's butcher, or contractor for the supply of fresh beef for the use of 'his majesty's' ships, when in the port of Tortola. This person conspired with the said admiral to give vouchers, and receive payment in bills of exchange from the purser of the Belleisle, drawn on the victualling board, purporting to be for so much fresh beef supplied; when, in fact, no such beef at all had been supplied; and the same was done by the command and contrivance of the said admiral, for the purpose of defrauding the said commissioners for victualling 'his majesty's' navy, and the public at large.

Sir Alexander Cochrane had, by this time amassed a large fortune, partly by straight, partly by crooked means, as we have seen, without being in the least satiated. He already possessed an estate in Nova Scotia, another at Bermuda, and a third in Trinidad. After having exposed his incapacity and unfitness for command, on account of the timidity and avarice which he displayed, we will now, therefore, says our author, add, and substantiate an instance of great cruelty and oppression, originating in felony, murder, and robbery! not in the figurative, but in the direct sense of the word, as Mr. Wilberforce and Mr. Brougham, these great advocates of humanity, expressed themselves. The fruits of all these crimes, sir Alexander Cochrane appropriated to himself, by concentrating in him the profits arising from such criminal transactions, and all the guilt and responsibility attached to such felony, murder and robbery.

Sir Alexander took, illegally, possession of, and appropriated to himself a large number of negroes, about 200, who had been captured on board of two American slave ships, namely, the brig Amadea; Johnston, master, and the schooner Nancy, Vidal, master, which had been carried into the port of Tortola by some British ships of war, and condemned under the act subjecting slaves, taken as prize, to condemnation for the use of "his majesty," for certain special ends and purposes, namely, the males to be drafted into the army and navy, and the females and children to be bound out as apprentices to some useful trade for 14 years.

Sir Alexander Cochrane, in manifest violation of his duty, continued, with the connivance of the judge of the vice-admiralty prize court, and of the king's agent at Tortola, to appropriate to himself these men, women, and children, near 200 in number, whom he carried off, in slavery, to the island of Trinidad, where they have been, and still continue, to be unlawfully forced to work as field negroes, on a sugar plantation belonging to the said sir Alexander Cochrane, without their having any chance of reclaiming their liberty thus usurped, upon their first importation from Africa, before they acquired any knowledge of the English language, and consequently before they could form any conception of the protection and advantages granted to them by that generous and humane trait in the policy of Great Britain—the abolition of the slave trade.

A few days before the departure of sir Alexander Cochrane, in H. M. S. Asia, from Portsmouth to Bermuda, the author urged this subject with Mr. Wilberforce, and since transmitted a statement directed to earl Bathurst, to enable him in his official capacity, as secretary of the home colonial department, to make further enquiries into this subject, as likewise the African institution, who have laid the case before government, so that in course of time this cruel act of usurpation is sure to be redressed, and the objects thereof to be relieved.

It may be objected with apparent foundation, that we should have brought forward these charges in time, and not waited until the disgraceful conspiracy to defraud the stock exchange, and all the other exposures resulting from it, laid open the Cochrane family to the sneers and aspersions of every insidious reviler. To this objection, we beg leave to reply, that some of our accusations were brought forward three or four years ago, although in a more general way, and that we specifically accused sir Alexander Cochrane of a breach of his duty and of the articles of war, as long ago as in the month of November last, when his appointment to the command of the North American station was first mentioned in the newspapers as being in contemplation.

Since the late trial of admiral Stirling, at Portsmouth, we have again offered to the lords of the admiralty, to make out, prove and substantiate, some stronger and more disgraceful cases of the same description; and requested for that purpose, to be allowed access to the log-books of certain ships, deposited at Somerset-House. This letter was forwarded by the two-penny post, and necessarily must have reached its destination, but was never answered. We are, therefore, obliged to dispense with the corroborative information we expected to draw from the said log-books, which the admiralty seems anxious to withhold; and, on that account, intend to submit our charges in writing, and demand a court-martial according to law. And it now will remain to be seen, whether the first lord of the admiralty dares to fly in the face of the laws of his country, and protect and screen his creatures from the eye of public investigation, or not.

The duty of ordering a court martial, continues Mr. Mackenrot, upon a complaint in writing being made, appears to be imperative upon the lords commissioners of the admiralty, and not discretionary; we therefore conceive, that the admiralty is bound to summon a court martial to try sir Alexander, and sir Thomas John Cochrane, on the charges preferred by us, as we must abide by the legal consequences; if they are found false or groundless, an event of which we do not entertain the smallest apprehension. Perhaps their lordships are in daily expectation of receiving intelligence of some glorious achievement performed by their trust-worthy commander-in-chief, at Halifax,* in order to stop the mouths of such obscene scribblers as we are; but if this be the case, their present insertions in the Gazette are rather meagre and tardy; as only some inferior American vessels of war, privateers, have been taken by sir Alexander's detached squadron, and if things do not soon mend, then, indeed, "Le jeu ne vaut pas la Chandelle."

When sir Alexander was first appointed to his present command, the greatest expectations were entertained of the exploits he was to perform: immense preparations were made at Portsmouth.—There was such a bustle and packing of ammunition, rockets, fire-ships, bombs and conveniences for red-hot balls, and other missile weapons; two-deckers were cut down to smaller vessels; my lord Cochrane forsook his seat in the senate, and even baron de Berenger, of sharp-shooting memory, had, at sir Alexander's request, scraped the rust off his father's toledo, as lord Cochrane is pleased to inform us on oath: when, alas! we ask, what has been done since February, the time of sir Alexander's sailing from Portsmouth? Nothing.

Parturiunt montes, nascitur ridiculus mus.

Why, sir Alexander must have been asleep all this while; or was he engaged on shore in grazing, cattle-dealing, wood-cutting, slop-selling, smuggling; or other such money-making callings?

His proclamation to the negroes in the southern states, is the chief composition among the state papers that issued from his pen; but this kidnapping system 'his majesty's ministers' have very properly disowned and disapproved of.† Such a warfare has never been resorted to in the colonies, not even at the time when mutual animosity ran highest between the French and English islands during the last war. What would the British West India planters say, if the American government, in order to retaliate, would order her numerous and enterprising privateers to entice from the British colonies, where they can always land in the day time, whole gangs of negroes, who would be very easily prevailed upon to fly from slavery and to seek refuge in the black republic of Hayti? How pernicious, how destructive would this prove to Jamaica and the windward islands? We were at first informed by the newspapers, that many hundred negroes had arrived from the United States at Bermuda, where they did vastly well and earned a dollar a day; presently the tune was changed, and we heard that these poor deluded wretches were in the most abject condition and starving. How came this great reduction of labor to happen? Did sir Alexander, perhaps, only pick out the stout and able men for his own estate in Trinidad, and leave the sickly ones to perish, as he did in 1808, at Tortola?

Sir Alexander Cochrane has about a hundred penants, of all sizes and descriptions, under his orders; the season is considerably advanced, and still we hear nothing of the great and extensive operations he was to perform: such as the bombarding of Boston and New-York, the burning of Baltimore, the destruction of the frigates at New London, and in the docks and arsenals of all the seaports—the scouring of the Delaware and Chesapeake up to the very threshold of president Madison's residence. If sir Alexander performs a fractional part of this round sum of operations, which, in consideration of his great and chosen forces, he could hardly miss (and which, Mr. Mackenrot might have added, is as much, and perhaps more than a British force is equal to) then, and then alone, all would be well, &c.

In point of sir Alexander's other frauds, says Mr. Mackenrot in his concluding paragraph, which, if we include the illegal exportations of prize produce before alluded to, amounts to many thousands, what sentence will he deserve, when we find the other day, admiral William Bradley, sentenced to death at the Winchester assizes, for defrauding the post-master at Gosport of the paltry sum of £3 3s. 6d. and forging a receipt for the same? This is what admiral Cochrane's avarice, not his distresses, have led him to.

We are now brought to the memoir of sir Thomas John Cochrane, member of parliament, who, Mr. Mackenrot informs us, is a son of sir Alexander Cochrane, and commands at present H. M. S. Surprise, a new 38 gun frigate, on the West India station. We shall forbear to interrupt the narrative with any remarks as we pass along, but give, as in sir Alexander's case, whatever we have to put down of it, in Mr. Mackenrot's own words, reserving our own thoughts concerning it until the last.

The rise and progress which this young gentleman made in his profession, is so uncommonly rapid, that we cannot deny ourselves the pleasure of detecting the fatal effects of misapplied power, patronage and family interest, which guides the promotion of a certain department; and perhaps we could even aspire, most humbly and most respectfully, to undeceive the illustrious personage who now wields the sceptre of these realms, and who is the constitutional fountain of honor, by submitting how little the subject of these memoirs is deserving of the honor of knighthood,* conferred upon him by 'his royal highness the prince regent,' probably at the recommendation of one of the confidential servants of the crown, whose representations we must thence pronounce to have been a gross imposition.

*But pray, Mr. Mackenrot, how do you get over the honor conferred upon the puppy Ferdinand of Spain?—A. M. Ed.

VOL. IX.

The author then states, that Mr. Thomas John Cochrane arrived in the West Indies in 1805, as a midshipman, and served on board the Jason frigate, 'captain W. Burgundy Champain, a worthy veteran,' and full of spirit, if we may judge from his name. He was shortly after promoted to the rank of lieutenant by his father, and while serving in that capacity on board the same ship, he suffered her to get ashore off Porto Rico, during his watch upon deck; but as she was not materially injured, no court martial was called to try him for his neglect. Some active service then requiring one of the officers of the ship to volunteer in heading the boat's crew to board and cut out the Spanish letter of marque called Los Dolores, from under the batteries of Porto Rico, Mr. Thomas John Cochrane very prudently remained behind, allowing, contrary to the etiquette of the service, (he being third lieutenant) his senior officer, a Mr. Patterson, to amuse himself with the performance of this exploit, in the most gallant manner. Mr. Patterson, however, remained a lieutenant, whilst the cowardly Mr. Cochrane was promoted over his head to the rank of master and commander, and post captain; in which capacity he afterwards commanded the same ship, the Jason, and all his former senior officers, under whom he had served as a youngster.

He was next put on board the corvette Melville, as master and commander—a beautiful swift-sailing vessel, captured from the French by the Jason. She mounted 22 guns, and had a complement of 125 picked men. The admiral, anxious to see his son make his debut, expected he would perform wonders in this crack ship. In this hope, however, he was wofully disappointed, for the young commander took nothing worth recording in the pages of the Gazette, but two pitiful little French privateers of one gun each, and with a crew of 25 or 30 men. Afterwards, when all was alacrity and joy on board the Melville; the brave tars eagerly anticipating the glory and prize-money they were on the point of earning—she ran away suddenly from a French privateer brig of 16 guns, belonging to Guadaloupe, and a heavy laden English merchant ship, her prize, worth £90,000. In consequence of this capt. Cochrane became the laughing-stock of the whole island of Antigua; and himself, as well as his officers, were, for a long time, quizzed on account of the miserable adventure. He did not long remain in the Melville, however; for his father, the admiral, soon took an opportunity to promote him to the rank of post captain, in spite of his want of conduct, knowledge and experience, and, as it is generally reported, actually before he had attained the age of twenty-one years; in direct contravention of the regulations of the navy, and without having distinguished himself in any shape to warrant such premature promotion. We cannot absolutely take upon ourselves to say, that false certificates of baptism, or the like, were produced to the admiralty, but the extremely boyish appearance of the young post captain, and the general outcry of all the other officers, young and old, on this occasion, coupled with the date of sir Alexander's marriage, scarcely admits of the possibility of his having been of age, at the time this promotion took place; and by right, he ought to have been of age before he passed for a lieutenant. Observe, reader, that this rapid promotion from a midshipman to post captain, was gone through in about one twelvemonth.

Over the heads of old and meritorious officers, then, this unfit strippling, as the author styles him, was, early in 1806, found in the command of 'his majesty's' ship Jason; on whose quarter-deck he had but very lately received the reproofs, and undergone, at least deserved, the punishments incidental to the station of midshipman. His conduct now became haughty, overbearing, and extremely tyrannical. Flogging was the order of the day with him, and so much did he delight in this cruel part of naval discipline, that he often ordered the whole ship's company to be flogged, when his whim and caprice invented a general, imaginary and perhaps in itself, trivial offence. Fancy to yourself, reader, a full complement of a frigate, consisting of 225 men, all brave veteran tars, being ignominiously dragged to a gun, man by man, stripped, bound and having their bare backs lacerated by the lash of a cut-of-nine-tails; and all this at the nod of a beardless boy, because, forsooth, this boy has, through the interest of a father and the corruption of the times,* been irregularly, illegally and scandalously promoted to the rank of post captain, before he was fit to command the crew of a jolly-boat. Such mode of promotion, and such conduct, excited contempt in the breasts of all independent officers, and richly deserved it. As to the seamen and marines, they were, by the young captain's tyranny and oppression, worked up to such a pitch of irritation, as bordered almost constantly on a state of mutiny.—While the Jason was lying in the harbor of Tortola, the boatswain, being the captain's threshing-machine, had become so odious to the whole ship's company, that in one night he had both his ears cut off clean from his head by some unknown hand; and although the whole crew was, in a degree, put to the torture, by general rounds of flogging, still, the perpetrator of this act of vengeance was never divulged.

Captain Cochrane was only a strict disciplinarian as far as concerned others. As to himself, he frequently slept out of the ship; and once in particular, when the Jason rode out a gale in the harbor of Tortola, after repeatedly drifting; and 'his majesty's' brig Hart drove ashore for the want of anchors and cables, whom it was his duty to have succored and supplied. Although the Hart burnt blue lights, fired signals of distress, threw her guns overboard, and laid on her beam end, captain Cochrane never attempted to get off to her, but contented himself with looking at her from our windows through a night glass, whenever the flashes of the blue lights made darkness visible. Any other officer would have been tried by a court martial for such misconduct; but so great was the complaisance of the other officers towards this admiral's son, than none durst ask an enquiry: indeed, they went so far as to allow him to share prize-money in the capture of three American vessels, although he was day and night on shore, engaged in courtship, and consequently neither aiding, nor assisting in their capture.

We have already mentioned the cowardice and cruelty of captain Cochrane; these two vices generally go hand in hand: we now proceed to shew the dangerous consequences of cruelty. During the hurricane months in 1807, the Jason accompapanied admiral Cochrane to Bermuda and Halifax: on her voyage she touched at New York. After coming to anchor in that port, captain Cochrane had his boat manned and went on shore; when, alas! his whole boat's crew, to a man, coxswain and all, ran away immediately on his landing on the beach, and left their poor, disconsolate captain alone, exposed to the groans and hisses of the American populace. Upon his return on board, he must naturally have been a little out of temper, and may have vented his spleen on the crew which remained behind, as a kind of mutiny arose; which was, however, quelled, and some of the ringleaders and recaptured deserters, were shortly afterwards hanged at Halifax. There is a proverbial saying among sailors, that a man-of-war is to all intents and purposes a little hell; and this phrase probably owes its origin to such a demon of a captain.

Towards the latter part of the blockade of Martinique, captain Thomas John Cochrane commanded 'his majesty's' ship Ethalion of 38 guns, and was stationed to superintend the in-shore squadron of lighter vessels, and to watch the inlets to Fort Royal—the line of battle ships belonging to the squadron being at a greater distance from the land.—Whilst charged with this important service, he suffered, one night, a French frigate, the Pallas, to get into port. The officer, who had the watch upon deck, called out to captain Cochrane in his cabin, that he observed a strange sail, and advised him to make the private signals to her; but the captain declined following this advice, saying he knew the sail in question to be such and such a British ship. In the morning, however, he had the mortification to find, that what he lazily mistook for a British man-of-war, was actually a French frigate, with her national colors up, at anchor close under the batteries of Fort Royal. She brought a seasonable supply of troops, ammunition and provisions from France, for which the place was much distressed. In his private life, captain Cochrane is not a bit more praiseworthy than in his public career; for there we find him mean, covetous, mercenary and desperately false and treacherous.

In 1806, he was introduced to a young lady, the daughter of an opulent and highly respected British merchant in a neutral island in the West Indies; and with this young lady he fancied himself soon to be deeply in love: her father and the admiral however, discouraged the match as much as possible, and, in order to try the effects of absence, he was sent for a while to a different cruising ground. But the captain seemed to remain unalterably attached to the object of his flame, whose affections he had gained, and openly opposed sir Alexander's hostile views. In 1808, the father of the young lady dying suddenly, his affairs were found to be in a very deranged state, owing to recent losses, and consequently, the large portion he was supposed to have been able to give to his daughter, dwindled into a mere trifle. Our young man of the world, disappointed in his calculations, immediately forsook his love sick bride; this broke her heart, and she shortly after followed her father into the grave, unavenged by a brother, who had not the spirit to resent the injuries of his insulted and deserted sister.—Captain Cochrane, whose leading vice seems to have been avarice, a characteristic feature in the whole Cochrane family, returned to England, and gratified his passion by leading an heiress to the altar.

In our charges transmitted to the lords commissioners of the admiralty,* we have already stated the outlines of some high crimes and misdemeanors of which captain Cochrane was guilty, when acting in 1806 and 1807, as a kind of commodore of a number of small crafts on the Tortola station, which was then considered the best cruising ground in the West Indies, and yielded a great number of prizes. By law, all colonial produce, such as sugar, coffee, cocoa, cotton, indigo, &c. captured on board of any vessels, and condemned as prizes of war in the vice-admiralty courts, is considered as produce of the British colonies, and cannot be exported otherwise than in British bottoms, navigated according to law, and bound direct to a port in the United Kingdom of Great Britain. Disregarding these enactments, however, captain Cochrane made agreements with the claimants to ransom, or, after condemnation, generally to re-sell all his prizes to the original owners, at a certain price, which, owing to the peculiar situation of European politics at that time, and the exclusion of the British flag from most ports on the continent, they could afford to pay at a higher rate than the bona fide British merchants, who were obliged to import their produce to the depressed markets in England. Upon these conditions, the said neutral claimants relinquished their right of appealing against the sentence of condemnation, and were allowed to export such cargoes of colonial produce, in foreign bottoms, to the then Danish island of St. Thomas, to the United States of America, Denmark, France or Spain, as best suited their speculative views. To crown this scene of iniquity, captain Cochrane himself, presently convoyed with his frigate, or ordered other king's ships to convoy, these ransomed prizes safely to the harbor of St. Thomas, where new clearances were taken out for their ulterior destinations. In this manner, colonial produce to the amount of half a million sterling, has been exported under the immediate protection of that arch-smuggler, captain, now sir Thomas John Cochrane, Knt. with the culpable connivance of the custom-house officers, judge, king's proctor and king's agent, in the island of Tortola.

The author, at the time, repeatedly remonstrated with captain Cochrane against his illegal proceedings, and threatened at last to send some privateers after these ransomed prizes, to detain them again, and bring them back to the port of Tortola, for a second adjudication. He was answered, however, that if the said privateers could engage and silence the guns of 'his majesty's' ship Jason, then under his command, the experiment might certainly be tried; but that otherwise it would lead to the impress of their crews, and consequent ruin of the owners. Against such odds, there was no chance. From particular circumstances, the author was prevented from trying this question, both in court and at sea. Change of residence, &c. occasioned his silence for some time, till at length, about four years ago, he laid the subject before the lords commissioners of 'his majesty's' treasury, the board of trade, and the court of exchequer; who immediately appointed a special commission of enquiry to proceed to the West-Indies for the purpose of examining into the abuses complained of.

Mr. Mackenrot then closes his memoir of sir Thomas John Cochrane, by a few remarks relative to the fraud upon the stock exchange; of which the following only are worth extracting:

Mr. De Berenger declares, he refused a fortune and a pardon by saving lord Cochrane; and we now beg to ask Mr. De Berenger, whether Mr. Cochrane Johnstone, or both together, have not applied to him, and proposed to save them, by saddling another noble lord with his offence; which he indignantly refused?

We ask Mr. Holloway, one of the conspirators, whether he was not actually employed by lord Cochrane and Mr. Cochrane Johnstone, to procure the execution of this fraud, to save them from impending ruin, and whether he did, in contemplation thereof, engage Mr. Sandom, W. Lyte and Mr. McKrae, who became his willing tools, and acted the under-plot in the post chaise and four, which came from Northfleet, and went over London bridge and Blackfriars' bridge?

We ask lord Cochrane himself, if he did not press, nay, force De Berenger to perform the personification of colonel Du Bourg, and whether some remaining qualms of conscience did not make De Berenger stop—pause and hesitate—as the proposal was first broached to him, and that he only yielded in consideration of the many obligations he was under to lord Cochrane and his uncle. We are happy to find, that these conspirators have fallen out among themselves, for there exists no friendship inter malos, and that the whole correspondence is on the point of being published. In a note the author states that it has since been published.

He regrets greatly the escape of Mr. Cochrane Johnstone, the head and chief of this conspiracy. After enumerating the many instances of peculiar boldness and duplicity exhibited by this gentleman in the above affair, and the uncommon hardihood displayed by him in avowing his innocence, upon his honor, in the house of commons; the author asks, whither will he go? In what remote corner of the earth will he hide his head? Loaded with infamy, perjury and fraud, what country will receive him? No part of the globe inhabited by civilized men, will grant him an asylum: no, not even the mountains of Hayti, nor the savannahs of the Mississippi and Missouri. In the back settlements of the United States, not even a cobbler would associate with him; he has fairly hunted himself out of society, and must err over the wide world as an outlaw, and being 64 years of age, he will perhaps never have the satisfaction of in patria mori.

Lord Cochrane is somewhat better situated; for, after his fine and imprisonment are over, he may endeavor to make himself conspicuous by the machinations of faction, where still he has his former services to plead in his favor.

We shall now subjoin the correspondence which the author had with persons, 'high in office,' relative to the matters herein detailed: We begin with letter A on the subject of the Danish and Dutch loans.

(COPY).—A

"To the right honorable lord viscount Castlereagh
St. James' square.

Horn Tavern, Doctor's Commons, March 19th, 1811.

MY LORD.—The question of the Danish and Dutch loan in the island of St. Croix, in the West Indies, having lately been heard before the right honorable the lords of appeal for prizes, and having been condemned by the court of vice-admiralty of Tortola to the captors, and not to the crown, I take the liberty of offering a few observations on this head to your lordship.

I remember that immediately after the condemnation of the said loans to the captors in 1808, at the time when your lordship was at the head of the colonial department, you disapproved highly of this measure, so injurious to the rights and interests of the crown; and that your lordship directed the late general Harcourt, then governor of the island of St. Croix, to dispossess the agents of the captors, of the bonds, and such instalments of payments of sugar, &c. as had been by them received on account of the aforesaid loans, that your lordship severely reprimanded the judge of the vice-admiralty prize court of Tortola, and the king's proctor of the said island, for this manifest sacrifice of the interests of the crown, directing them to justify their conduct, and to assign the reasons for their proceeding.

I doubt, that your lordship has been able to fathom the depth of this abyss of iniquity, and neglect of duty on the part of the aforesaid two law officers; but being myself acquainted with all the particulars of the case, I think it a duty incumbent on me to acquaint your lordship with the same.—

I therefore assure your lordship that it was nothing but broad, open corruption and bribery. No judge, ever since the days of Demosthenes, was more guilty of bribery and corruption than the worshipful and honorable James Robertson, his majesty's chief justice of the court of king's bench, and judge of the court of vice-admiralty of Tortola, was, in this instance.

It was perfectly settled between the honorable Andrew Cochran Johnstone, as agent for the captors, and the aforesaid two law officers; that the said Danish and Dutch loans should be condemned to the captors; in consideration of which the former agreed to pay to the latter a large sum of money, about 5,000*l*. under the general denomination of fees, without submitting the same to taxation, as prescribed by law, otherwise the said agent threatened to dispute the jurisdiction of the court of vice-admiralty of Tortola, and bring the said causes to trial in the courts of vice-admiralty of Antigua, or Barbadoes. Thus, this pusillanimous and avaricious judge, forgetful of his duty, and fearing to miss the opportunity of amassing such extraordinary large fees, swallowed the bait that was held out to him by the wily agent, and actually engaged, before-hand, to condemn the said loans to the captors.

In order to explain this fact by farther elucidation, I beg leave to submit to your lordship the following details. I resided at that period in the island of Tortola, following the occupation of prize agent; in the pursuit of which business I constantly attended the sittings of the vice-admiralty prize court, whether my own immediate concerns and interests required it or not. On the morning of the day fixed for the trial of the Danish loans, I perfectly remember having had a large party of gentlemen at breakfast at my house, which happened to be situated in the vicinity of the court house, whither we all intended to go, to hear the trial of said loan: but, as iniquity always shuns publicity, the king's proctor, George Clarke Forbes, Esqr. whose office was next door to mine, requested me and Mr. G. D. Dix (then an agent for claimants) not to go up to the court-house, and to prevail on my company also to abstain from attending, because, quoth he, "the judge wishes to hear this cause, and give his sentence; in the most private manner—that he, Mr. F. intended, merely, after the crier opened the court, to read the allegations, and there being no claim or opposition, the judge would pass immediately sentence of condemnation, as already agreed upon." Your lordship will please to weigh and duly interpret the meaning of these words. Among my company was a Mr. Vaughan Hamilton, a barrister and junior king's counsel; and Messrs. Grant and Simpson, also practitioners at the bar. The latter gentlemen, being independent men, expressed the greatest indignation at the base conduct of the judge and senior king's counsel, and regretted their not having an opportunity to give them a smart professional lashing; but not being crown lawyers, nor otherwise retained in the cause, they forbore to volunteer against the predetermined and avowed partiality of the judge: but Mr. Hamilton being a young man, just admitted to the bar, and decorated with a silk gown, eagerly embraced this opportunity of rising in fame, and meriting the approbation of his majesty's ministers, by moving the court to condemn these loans to the crown.—He communicated his design to me, whereupon I advised him to give notice thereof to the judge without loss of time. Mr. Hamilton accordingly waited upon his honor immediately, at his chambers, but was received with frowns, and sternly told, that by the rules of the court, he ought to give three-days notice previous to making the motion; that the cause had been set down for a final hearing and sentence on that very day, and that he, the judge, would on no account allow it to be postponed.

After this the court was opened; the common forms were mechanically gone through, and the loans were condemned to the captors, nem. con.—The judge thus disgraced the bench by vending justice, and improperly advocating the cause of the captors against the king his sovereign for base lucre; and even, afterwards he expressed his unconcern about the sensation which his strange proceedings might produce in his majesty's cabinet: adding, that he cared very little for what ministers might do—that having been better paid by the captors than he would have been by the king, they could at the utmost only suspend him, and then he intended to retire on his pension for life, the situation of judge of the vice-admiralty prize court having become less desirable on account of the fees being lessened by the decrease in the number of captures.

This gentleman has now retired to the United States of America, being a great admirer and partizan of the democratic principles of that country,* and has appointed Mr. Maurice Lisle to be his surrogate, to the great scandal and disgrace of the whole bar; this Mr. Lisle being a noted yankee, who allowed the king's health to be refused to be drank by an American at his own table,† on occasion of a public dinner given by him; for which want of loyalty he was excluded from all society, deprived of his rank of colonel in the militia, and only escaped the most summary corporal chastisement, on account of his old age and other infirmities.

I determined on communicating to your lordship these particulars, as the events here alluded to took place during your lordship's administration, and the pending litigation is now drawing towards a conclusion; conceiving that the knowledge of the true and real state of things, and causes and effects must be highly necessary for the guidance and judgment of the lords of appeal, who heard this important cause argued at their last sittings on the 13th instant, but deferred giving sentence to a future day.

I have the honor to be, my lord, your lordship's most obedient and humble servant,

A. M'KENROT.

*Surely Mr. M'Kenrot must by this time be convinced from his own observations, that our 'democratic principles' are much purer than 'royal' ones. Our principles do not breed such monsters as he has described in his memoirs.—Am. Ed.

†We are of opinion Mr. Maurice Lisle knew the Americans better than Mr. M'Kenrot. Force went do.—Am. Ed.

A few days afterwards, the author received from his lordship, the following answer:

"To A. M'Kenrot, esquire, Horn Tavern, Doctor's Commons.

St. James' Square, March 26, 1811.

"Lord Castlereagh presents his compliments to Mr. M'Kenrot, and begs to refer him on the subject of his letter to lord Liverpool, now secretary of state for the colonies, to whom he has taken the liberty of transmitting Mr. M'Kenrot's communication."

The author in a note very modestly disclaims the idea of his letter having had any weight with the court of appeals. It so happened, however, that the colonial sentence was reversed, and the loans condemned to the crown.

"To William Wilberforce, esq. M. P.

London, November 17th, 1813.

SIR—As you have always been one of the principal promoters of the abolition of the slave trade, I think it very expedient to inform you of a gross abuse of this humane act still existing in the British West India colonies, in direct contravention of the provisions of the legislature, enacting, that the slaves on board of every prize ship taken by a British cruiser, shall be drafted into his majesty's navy, or land forces, and that women and others not fit for that purpose, shall be bound to some trade for 14 years. Two American slave vessels, the brig Amadea, Johnston, master, and the schooner Nancy, Vidal, master, were condemned early in 1808, in the court of vice-admiralty in the island of Tortola, but instead of being disposed of as aforesaid, sir Alexander Cochrane, then commander in chief of his majesty's naval forces on the Leeward island station, contrived to obtain possession of all these unfortunate blacks, about 200 in number, by a connivance of the judge and the navy agent, and sent them to Trinidad, to be employed, that is to say, forced to work, and flogged, on a sugar estate of his own, without taking even a single man into the navy or army. Having purchased a large Spanish prize schooner (a Guineaman of his own creation) for the purpose of transporting them to Trinidad, he chartered also the brig Busy, Fitzpatrick, master, in addition to which he caused a brig of war to convoy those disgraceful cargoes from Tortola to Trinidad.

The legislature never intended to bind slaves, or more properly speaking, liberated blacks, to the trade of digging cane-holes or other toilsome operations of a sugar plantation, and the noble admiral suffered himself, certainly, in this instance, to be carried a great deal too far by his avarice. He might have, perhaps, employed on his estate one dozen of men in the different trades of coopers, carpenters, masons, blacksmiths, and the like, but working as field negroes is certainly not a trade within the meaning and intention of the statute.

Sir Alexander Cochrane being now in this country, you may call him to an account, as I understand he is shortly to go abroad again to take upon himself a command; and you may make use of my name and knowledge of the circumstances above alluded to, in any shape you think fit, so the liberation of the aforesaid Africans is thereby effected, whose lives would otherwise be wasted in this slavish occupation, and at the expiration of their cruel apprenticeship, they will be left probably to beg or starve any where, but on sir Alexander's estate.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your most humble servant, A. M'KENROT."

On the same subject.

"To the right honorable lord Holland.

London, December 8th, 1813.

MY LORD—Finding that your lordship has nobly espoused the cause of the general abolition of the slave trade, in the house of lords, on Monday last, with a view of introducing it universally into the politics of all the civilized nations in amity with this country; I humbly beg leave to acquaint your lordship, that a flagrant abuse of this law still exists in some of the British West India colonies, as stated in the enclosed copy of my letter of the 17th ult. to Mr. Wilberforce, who, in answer, was pleased to call it an interesting communication, and promised to bestow his full attention to so important a subject. I therefore trust, that your lordship will, on your part, plead the cause of our suffering fellow creatures, in the house of peers, as it will require the interposition of the highest authority, to make the titled offender in question, relinquish his usurped interest in the lives and liberties of these 200 Africans, worth to him, at the most moderate computations, from 100 to £150,000.

I have the honor to be, my lord, your lordship's most humble servant, late a magistrate in the island of Tortola.

A. M'KENROT,

On the cowardice of sir Alexander Cochrane and sir John Borlase Warren, as the author subsequently informs us.

"To the right hon. lord Henry Paulet.

Admiralty Office, November 25, 1813.

MY LORD—Knowing that your lordship is perfectly acquainted with naval discipline, with the regulations of the service, and the nature of court-martials,* and of course a better judge of these matters than some of your noble colleagues in office, possibly can be, I am desirous to lay before your lordship a statement of facts, from which it will clearly appear, that two gallant admirals, whom I shall, at present, forbear to name, have, upon certain occasions, not done their utmost to capture, burn, sink and destroy, the enemy's squadron, which they had in their power to do. I am astonished that these circumstances have never been enquired into; and I beg to know, when I may wait on your lordships in private, to submit the particulars of the aforesaid charges.

I have the honor to be, &c."

These charges related to the escape of the Rochefort squadron: and, although lord Henry appointed an interview with the author at the admiralty, yet when he heard the names of the aforesaid two admirals mentioned, he drew back, and let the matter slip over.

E.

Containing various charges against sir Alexander Cochrane, K. B. and sir Thomas John Cochrane. "To the right honorable the lords commissioners of the admiralty.

2, Park Place, Chamberwell, July 2, 1814.

MY LORDS—I now take the liberty of submitting to your lordships, here enclosed, charges in writing, against vice-admiral sir Alexander Cochrane, K. B. and against captain sir Thomas John Cochrane, K.

*The author has here a long note, stating that lord Henry Paulet, when a post captain, tried his lieutenant by court martial; who, being honorably acquitted, tried his lordship in turn. His lordship was condemned, dismissed the service, but afterwards reinstated, promoted to a rear-admiral and a seat at the admiralty board.

I have frequently endeavored to bring these offenders to justice, which has been hitherto evaded by various circumstances, such as, the absence of the offenders and witnesses, and the like; but, more particularly, by your lordships' apparent and extreme reluctance, and contemptuous silence; in consequence of which, I have thought it expedient to collect better legal information on this subject, and to bring the matter again under your lordships' cognizance, as prescribed by law, and in such a shape as I conceive your lordships to be in duty bound, to cause further investigation to be made forthwith. Your lordships will be pleased to permit me to anticipate an argument, which possibly may be started as an objection against the great lapse of time since the alleged offences were committed; in reply to which I beg leave to observe to your lordships, that although upwards of three years have elapsed since the commission of sir Alexander Cochrane's offences, your lordships must be aware, that he only returned within the last twelve months from abroad, when he gave up his government of the island of Guadaloupe; therefore your lordships will allow that I am perfectly within the limitations of stat. 22, Geo. cap. 53. sect. 22.

Your lordships must also be aware, that by the provisions of section 24 of the same act, I could lay an information or an indictment against sir Alexander Cochrane, for converting his majesty's ship Belleisle into a muler, and recover a penalty* in any court of justice; but I despise such ways of acquiring money, although sir Alexander does not.—I only stand up for public justice.

As to captain Cochrane, it matters little, whether your lordships will be pleased to order a court martial on him, or not, as I have, years ago, laid a complaint about this nefarious transaction before the lord's commissioners of his majesty's treasury who did not suffer my representations to lay on the shelf, like your lordships, but appointed instantly a commission of special enquiry, who proceeded to the West Indies, to investigate this matter, and to report thereon, which said commission has returned, but their report has been delayed: I presume on account of the late conflagration of the custom-house on Thames-street; where the documents were deposited. It therefore remains open to me to indict captain Cochrane in the court of king's bench, or to get him impeached in parliament for high crimes and misdemeanors.

I have the honor to be, with due respect, my lord, your lordships most humble servant,

A. M'KENROT.*

Charges against sir Alexander Forrester Cochrane, K. B. inclosed in the foregoing letter:

1. I, Anthony M'Kenrot, late a justice of the peace in certain parts of his majesty's dominions beyond sea, called the island of Tortola, in the West Indies, do solemnly charge and accuse vice-admiral the honorable sir Alexander Forrester Cochrane, to have been guilty, on the 6th day of July, 1806, when commander in chief of the Leeward island station, of not making the necessary preparations to fight the French squadron under admiral Willaumez and Jerome Bonaparte, off the island of Tortola and St. Thomas, and of not, in his proper person and according to his place, encouraging his inferior officers and men to fight courageously: of withdrawing, through cowardice and negligence, keeping back, and not coming into engagement with the said French squadron, and of not doing his utmost to take or destroy the said French ships, he having the power and means of so doing; and further of forbearing through cowardice and negligence, to pursue the chase of the flying French squadron to the utmost of his power; which is a capital offence under the 10th, 12th and 13th articles of war, stat. 22, Geo. 2d, c. 33.*

2. I further do charge and accuse sir Alexander F. Cochrane of having, in the year 1807, caused and ordered to be taken on board of his majesty's ship Belleisle, when at Halifax, mules, which he caused to be carried and transported on board his majesty's said ship Belleisle, all the way from Nova Scotia to the West Indies, to the island of Tortola, where they were landed and sold by himself as merchandize, for his own profit and emolument, without entering them at the custom-house: for which act of smuggling the said ship would have been liable to seizure, had the officers of the customs understood their duty and been willing to do it; an offence punishable by the 18th article of war, in the aforesaid statute, with cashiering and forever afterwards rendering such officer incapable of serving in any place or office in the naval force of his majesty, his heirs or successors.

3. I further charge and accuse the said sir Alexander Forrester Cochrane of having purchased, in the year 1807, a large quantity of duck, which he caused to be paid for by bills of exchange on the commissioners for victualling his majesty's navy, purporting to be drawn for fresh beef supplied to his majesty's ships, then in the road of Tortola, by one John Carruthers, the navy butcher and contractor, when in fact no such fresh beef at all was supplied, for the purpose and with the view of defrauding the said commissioners for victualling his majesty's navy; which offence is punishable by the 24th and 33d articles of war, with dismissing such officer from his majesty's service.

4. I further charge and accuse the said sir Alexander F. Cochrane of having fraudulently appropriated to himself about to 200 prize negroes, condemned to his majesty, under stat. 47 Geo. 3d, c. 36, for certain special ends and purposes, that is, to be drafted into the army and navy, and those unfit for this purpose, to be bound out as apprentices to a trade, for which his majesty pays a considerable premium to the captors as head-money, viz. 40*l*. sterling for every negro man. Instead of which, the said sir Alexander Forrester Cochrane, with the connivance of the judge of the vice-admiralty court of Tortola, sent all the negroes, composing the cargoes of the American brig Amadea, Johnson, master, and the schooner Nancy, Vidal, master, in 1808, to a sugar plantation of his own, in the island of Trinidad, where they are working to this day as field negroes, thereby defrauding his majesty of their services, and the negroes themselves of their liberty and of the opportunity of learning a useful trade; a crime against the king, and humanity, almost nameless. London, July 2d, 1814. A. M'KENROT.*

Charges against sir Thomas John Cochrane, Knt. post captain in the royal navy.

I, Anthony M'Kenrot, late a justice of the peace in certain parts of his majesty's dominions, beyond sea, called the island of Tortola in the West Indies,

*The author here quotes, at foot, the said three articles of war, from which it appears that the offences before enumerated are punished with death; excepting that of not making due preparations to fight, or of not evincing personal courage; which are punished with death, or at the discretion of the court.

*The author here notes the penalty, which is for forfeiture of the goods, or £500.

do solemnly charge and accuse sir Thomas John Cochrane, of having, in 1806, when commanding his majesty's ship Jason, on the Tortola station, fraudulently projected, contrived, connived at, protected, and actually effected the illegal exportation of divers large quantities of colonial produce, taken on board of sundry prize vessels condemned in the court of vice-admiralty, in the island of Tortola, from that port, in foreign bottoms, to foreign places, ports, and countries, out of his majesty's dominions; contrary to the navigation act, and contrary to every statute, subsequently passed and enacted, concerning the colonial trade, shipping and prize matters; and of having in open dereliction of his duty, ordered other king's ships, commanded by inferior officers, to give convoy to such foreign vessels, thus unlawfully sailing from the British port and colony of Tortola, to the Danish port of St. Thomas, and protecting them against the lawful search and detention of other commissioned British cruisers: and of all this being done and effected for vile lucre, bribery and corruption; and that under these circumstances the following ships and cargoes were illegally and criminally convoyed and conducted, by order of the said sir Thomas John Cochrane, viz. the American ship Eutaw, White, master; the Medusa, the Fly, the Jane, the Maria, the Camelion, the Swallow, and the Mary, all laden with coffee; the entire cargoes of the Rebecca, Nield, master; the Beauty, M'Krae, master, and the General Eaton, Robinson, master; also consisting of St. Domingo coffee; the ship Nuestra Senora, del Carmen, the Evander, Sturgys; with the Hetty, the Eagle and the Cosmopolite, all laden with cocoa; the Tartan and Columbia, laden with indigo; from Tortola to St. Thomas, as aforesaid, to the great detriment of the revenue of this country, and to the prejudice of the British shipping at large, which every officer in his majesty's navy is especially bound to protect.

A. M'KENROT.

On the subject of the foregoing charges, exhibited in 1810.

To Anthony M'Kenrot, esquire, Horn Tavern, Doctor's Commons.

Treasury Chambers, 2d March, 1811.

SIR—Having laid before the lords commissioners of his majesty's treasury, your letter, containing charges against certain officers in the island of Tortola, of frauds practised against the revenue, collected in that island to a considerable extent: I am commanded by their lordships to acquaint you that they have directed an enquiry to be made into the circumstances contained therein.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

GEO. HARRISON.

Treasury Chambers, 18th March, 1812.

SIR—I am commanded by the lords commissioners of his majesty's treasury to acquaint you, that they have directed your letter of the 5th instant, respecting the frauds committed by the custom-house officers of Tortola, to be transmitted to the commissioners of his majesty's customs, in order that it may be referred, with your former papers, to the commissioners about to proceed to the West Indies, for investigation; and until their lordships have before them their report, they can take no further steps in the matter. I am, sir, your most obedient servant,

GEO. HARRISON.

On the same subject.

To A. M'Kenrot, esquire, Horn Tavern, Doctor's Commons.

Office of Committee of Privy Council for Trade, Whitehall, 29th April 1811.

SIR—The lords of the committee of the council of trade, having had under consideration your letter of the 11th ult. wherein you request to be informed in what manner the officers of the customs at Tortola are to be proceeded against for the breach of the navigation laws, of which you represent them to have been guilty, I am directed to acquaint you, that as the lords commissioners of his majesty's treasury have directed a commission of enquiry into the conduct of the said officers, to be issued, no further steps can be taken until the report of such enquiry shall have been received; and if it shall then appear that there is sufficient ground for prosecuting the said officers, the mode of proceeding must be determined by the lords of his majesty's treasury, this being a question relative to the public revenue: you will therefore address any further application which you may think proper, to the lords commissioners of his majesty's treasury.

I am, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

CHETWYND.

We have thus laid before our readers a full account of the contents of this extraordinary pamphlet, and in conclusion, have but two remarks to make: If this picture, which Mr. M'Kenrot has drawn in such strong colors, be true, we exclaim with the British chief justice, in 1686, 'the Lord grant that we may never see such a sight as that' in the United States. If, on the other hand, they are false, we sincerely hope that Mr. M'Kenrot may be punished to the utmost rigor of the laws of his country, and that we may have the satisfaction of doing justice to the parties injured, by recording the minutes of his trial in the future pages of this work.

An unknown Correspondent

Has transmitted to me a southern newspaper, containing a scheme of a lottery, proposed to be drawn to assist the vestry in the payment of certain debts, incurred in erecting an episcopal church. To encourage the sale of the tickets, the managers take occasion to pass some encomiums upon the general doctrines and peculiar rites of the Christian sect to which they belong; these have offended our correspondent, who calls them "church of England pretensions," and invites us to reprehend them.

The incident is unworthy of notice other than it affords a proper opportunity for a few general remarks, that may be useful to some, in an ecclesiastical as well as a political sense.

The peculiar tenets of any society of professing Christians never has been, and never shall be, subject to animadversion in the WEEKLY REGISTER, while the present editor has the direction of it. This is a rule absolute, admitting of no exception.

But I have sometimes thought that certain persons, snatching at the shadow and leaving the substance of what I have had to say of ecclesiastical and secular things, may have grossly misunderstood me. They read too superficially to ascertain the principle on which they are founded, or hastily reject it through prejudice. When I have spoken of the church of England, for instance, and reprehended its enormity, I have treated it only as the church of the government, not as a church of God. And its characters, I believe, are essentially different. In as first capacity it stands on the bayonet; in the other, I trust, it has its foundation on the Bible. The priests of that, and all other established religions, have two characters; one ecclesiastical, or of God; and the other military, or of human force—for there can be nothing more evident than that they extort their "livings" of the people by the sword of the government. In this last capacity they are fairly before us for remark and reprehension; but with them, as simple ecclesiastics, practising peculiar forms and teaching peculiar doctrines as acceptable to God, we have not any thing to do—that is an affair between them and their hearers and followers, and their Creator; the other is a matter between them and us, as men: one is of the spirit, the other of the flesh.

It appears to me that these distinctions are as strongly marked, as if separated by an Andean ridge; yet some have mistaken, or have not comprehended the limits where the Bible ends, and the bayonet begins; and have strangely supposed that when we speak of priests, pensioned by government and rioting on the blood and sweat of the people, we mean to condemn the religious opinions they profess! Far be it from me to judge them. But, indeed, I consider all government churches—Papal, Lutheran, Calvinistic or Greek—as bottomed upon and having the very same principle and effect. Creatures of government, they wheel about and support it in its most disgraceful measures, and change their manner and form of worship as they who feed them will it. We have many illustrious instances to the contrary, martyrs to their faith are in number enough to fill a volume—but, compared with those who have yielded to the changes of the times to preserve their fat places, they are like a drop in the bucket! At the time of the "reformation" in England, we are told that of 9000 beneficed clergymen less than 100 refused to conform to the new order of things; and the great body of them had, theretofore, went backward and forward as the government directed. Nor was it better in France, in her late revolutions. Many priests sealed with their blood the soundness of their faith in the doctrines they taught; but, taking out of the calculation the indiscriminate massacres of this class of the people by the hell-hounds of destruction that the disordered state of things spewed up, not one in a hundred, perhaps, refused the church service, as regulated by the furious and licitious legislators who distracted that country, and have, possibly, entombed the liberties of Europe with the proceeds and results of their crimes. I presume it is, and always has been, thus in all countries. We have undoubted proof that it was so, even among the Jews; where the priests, supported by the crown, offered incense to idols, or affected the service of the Most High—as it happened to please the notions of the man who distributed the loaves and the fishes. I speak generally, and this, I consider, the natural, the inevitable effect that must eternally belong to every priesthood supported by the sword. Its very constitution is the patron of hypocrisy and deceit; and at war with every thing that belongs to the dispensations of Christ, and rights of society.

It is for these reasons, and for the oppressions of the people that always must be felt under an established priesthood, that we have considered it a duty to expose and reprehend it. It is the great engine by which kings govern, prostrating the "sacred desk" to subserve all sorts of villainy. In the united crimes and oppressions of monarchs and their priests, we see the beauty and excellence of a government that has neither; and find ourselves excited by the most powerful feelings, to cling to and support it. Some in the United States talk of the high taxes they have to pay—when, in fact, all the taxes they have usually paid to the general and state governments would not have supported the English church, or have sustained the English poor-houses, by several millions of dollars per annum! These are the words of soberness and truth—no man will dare to deny them. And, besides, the people ought to bear in mind, that the "Dissenters" in England, as they are called, who are very numerous, perhaps, equal to nearly one half of the whole population, while they are compelled to contribute such vast sums to support the national church, have also the same obligations of duty, and support as we do, by voluntary acts, their own ministers. This is the case in all parts of the world where there are established churches—and where men are permitted to worship God as they believe most acceptable to Him; which is not the case in some pretended Christian countries.

As in monarchical, so also in ecclesiastical establishments, there is a "choice of evils." Though the principle of all is wrong, some are more liberal and just than others. Thus, we vastly prefer the English ecclesiastical court (abounding in foul abuses) to the Spanish inquisition, the sink of all that is detestable: and the English bishops (bad enough) are a thousand times better than the prelates of Spain, who have carried their orthodoxy so far as to urge and witness the roasting alive of men and women for what they had the impiety to call the "good of Christianity!" So, also, in political matters, we preferred the Bonapartes to the Bonapbons—for though, in some respects, the former may have produced more misery than the latter are capable of, yet they also had the power to conceive and confer benefits that the others are incompetent to. Napoleon's public works—his roads, bridges and canals—his incitements to agriculture and encouragement of the arts, will immensely advantage France for ages after the miseries he caused are obliterated: but, indeed, we especially preferred the Bonapartes BECAUSE IN THEIR ESTABLISHMENT WAS FIXED A RIGHT IN THE PEOPLE TO CHANGE THEIR RULERS. This would have been a grand point gained; and, in time, have annihilated that most singular and self-debasing idea that mankind are the property of certain families.

There are degrees in the virtues as well as in the vices of men and things. We are taught to believe there are angels and arch-angels—and told of devils and arch-devils: good and better, bad and worse. Kings and government churches are all of the bad and worse; and whatever we have said in commendation of any, was only comparatively, applied to others of like principle and class. We certainly esteem the leading principles of the British constitution (if such a thing there is) to the summary and outrageous rules by which Bonaparte oftentimes acted—but I will say this, and defy a denial of its correctness, that the British government is at least as ambitious of conquest and as unprincipled in the means of accomplishing it, as Bonaparte ever was. All the civilized world has been excited to the hatred of Napoleon for his conduct to Spain. What did he do in that business which England has not done twenty times over, in the east? He forced a resignation of the supreme authority to himself—he imprisoned the "legitimate" prince—he put a man at the head of the government that would subserve his will—he sent large armies into the country to maintain the authority he delegated, and shed oceans of blood to preserve the sovereignty. By means, in many cases, precisely as millar without a shadow or a shade of difference, the British flag flies over countries yet peopled by sixty or seventy millions of human beings; having made the conquest by a prodigality of life not less than three times greater than Bonaparte would have secured that of Spain, by bayonetting every man, woman and child of the kingdom. There is no metaphor in this—it is a plain and accepted matter of fact; nor have they yet stopped in their career—they have subjugated the “legitimate” king of Candy, and his crown and throne—mind, his crown and throne, valued at eight millions sterling, probably arrived in England within the very last month.

It is useless to proceed. Such traits of character are essentially engrafted on monarchy. Let them be exposed to be hated. It is at all times in season to shew the advantages of a republican government, by exhibiting the deformity of legal institutions.

But, truly, we have been led much further than we designed to go when this article was commenced, and shall make haste to conclude.

If I could believe that any observations I have made on church establishments in Europe were calculated to wound the feelings of honest individuals of the same sects in the United States, whether Protestant or Catholic, no others of the kind would ever appear in this work. I enjoy my own opinion, and freely grant to others the same glorious privilege. I hope and believe there are good men of every religious persuasion; sincere and accepted. And am also clearly of opinion that the body of the ministry in the United States, is really pious and good—more so than in any other country; and the reason is obvious. For, allowing them to have the same passions and weaknesses of other men, they are more strongly bound to restrain them; because in that restraint they find favor with the people and obtain support for themselves and their families. It is a principle happily impressed in the human heart, that the veriest vagabond that affects a regard for religion, will have his minister conform to its general principles and observe the moral law; and will expect him to practice the virtue he teaches. And, in these causes combined, we may safely believe it as a natural effect, that the clergy of the United States, (meaning the ministers of all our various sects,) are a body of the most liberal, most enlightened and most virtuous men, that ever blessed or honored a nation. That there is bad men among them is true—but of the chosen twelve there was one that betrayed his Master. These good dispositions are attended with the best effects in annihilating an immense mass of vulgar prejudices, and promoting a spirit of harmony in all classes of society; in encouraging charity; extending benevolence, and performing those acts which, I believe, are most acceptable to the God we profess to serve, and best calculated to secure the happiness of mankind here and hereafter. All these things result from the immediate responsibility of the priesthood to the people. “Angels in the form of men,” have no more descended to instruct us at the altar, than to govern us on a throne.

Tythes.

From Cobbett's Register, July 22.—The article which I have given below with this title, taken from the Cork Chronicle, I hope my friends in America will read with attention. It shews them what they are to expect, if their Cossack Priesthood should succeed in their attempts to establish a dominant church.* Not only will they exact a tenth of their corn, and their cattle, which grow and are fed in the fields, but their fruit, their apples, their pears, their plumbs, and all those choice and delicious products which constitute the kitchen garden, and are so consoling to the heart of man, will be tythied by these rapacious fiends, who, as was the case in France before the revolution, had the impudence there to assert, that the earth and its fullness is their heritage, and that the people, over which they had assumed a sway, were created merely to be fleeced by them. It is for this, and this only, that the priesthood in America are exerting themselves to overthrow the republican government. They feel, that under a frugal government, which is careful to teach every man his duty in society, without calling in the aid of spiritual teachers, there is no chance of their being able to establish an empire over the mind. This, the foundation of all their power, being unattainable, their grand object is to bring into discredit that system which presents so formidable a barrier to their encroachments.

BISHOP OF CLOYNE'S COURT.—From the Cork Chronicle.—Our readers may recollect that we called their attention some time since to the subject of certain citations issued from this court at the suit of the Rev. Thomas Carson, Rector of Kilmahon, for the recovery of tythe of green clover, apples, pears, plumbs, and cherries, which grew in a kitchen garden. On Tuesday last, the court was crowded to excess, principally a very respectable number of gentlemen assembled to witness the proceedings. However, upon reading the citation, it was discovered that it was erroneously filled; so that the claim of the Rev. Pastor was dismissed, after going through part of the evidence. We have been informed that the Vicar-general took this opportunity of censuring, in very strong and energetic language, such novel modes of proceeding as the present, and expressed his hope that this would be the last time he should witness claims of this nature brought into his court. However, we have been informed that the Rev. Mr. Carson declared in open court his intention of recommencing the suit. It was brought against Wm. Abbott, Esq. of Ballymalee, a young gentleman connected with the most respectable families of the Society of Friends, throughout the country, and from whose well-cultivated farm of 233 acres the Rev. Pastor requires a considerable yearly income in tythe. This gentleman has been remarkable for his very kind attention to a widowed mother, and a number of brothers and sisters, who were left a burthen upon him at a very early period of life. The same Rev. gentleman was dismissed upon two other citations on the same day, one of which was for the tythe of a small quantity of flax which grew in a head-land of a cornfield, the tythe of which had been duly paid.

*There will not be a “Cossack priesthood,” as Cobbett calls certain pulpit fire-brands of the east, where there is not also a “Cossack” people. A few mad-men, listened to by mad-hearers, as far as in them laid, have disgraced religion and their country—but they are too contemptible to ground general remarks upon, and will soon be self-consumed by their own spleen, continually excited by the prosperity of their country. Never was there a more miserable and unhappy set of men than the jacobins of the United States.

West Point.

Extract of a letter to the editor, dated Boston, September 15.

MR. NILES—A friend to your Register, as well as to merit, has just read your number of September 9th, and was much pleased with the account of West Point, which is pretty correct. But, sir, in doing justice to others, the writer (I presume unintentionally) has omitted to give credit to the indefatigable services which have been rendered to the institution by the present inspector-general Swift, whose undivided attention has been given to render the institution what it now is. In making this remark, the writer is not inclined to insinuate that either of the officers connected with the academy are in the smallest degree inattentive to their duties.

Foreign Articles.

By arrivals at New York and Philadelphia we have London dates as late as Aug 7. The chief things they contain relate to the "legitimate" determination respecting the person of Napoleon Bonaparte, who has been sent to the island of St. Helena—and to the state of France, which is yet in a ferment, that the allies seem disposed to allay, by partitioning and contribution. The chief articles that have reached us follow:

OF NAPOLEON BONAPARTE.

As every thing that belongs to the fate of this extraordinary man is interesting, we copy from the London papers each article calculated to gratify present curiosity or future research.

London, August 1.—A Plymouth paper received yesterday, speaking of Bonaparte, says: his curiosity on every point is unbounded, and versatility of talent and powers of conversation on all subjects, whether trifling or important, astonishing: such, indeed, is his appetite for information, that he often freely addresses the seamen and marines. It is impossible, we have learnt from good authority, to imagine the fascinations of Bonaparte's address and conversation, which compel involuntary esteem and attachment, and bereave even those most inimical to him in their hearts, of all hostile feelings while they remain in his presence. When he is walking alone, his hands are folded behind him, and his countenance assumes a pensive cast; but when engaged in discourse his face exhibits a smile of the most engaging description, like a gleam of sunshine on a dark cloud, and his gestures are earnest and impressive. At his meals he exercises what is called in England, a good knife and fork, and rarely speaks; in the use of liquors he is more abstemious. In a thorough acquaintance with men and manners, he is surpassed by few, and particularly, which will appear remarkable, in his knowledge of England, and the principal characters in it who have signalized themselves by their abilities, in various departments. His marshals are continually on deck, in full uniform, in converse with their master, or the ladies and children. Madame Bertrand has been peculiarly inquisitive concerning his destination, and frequently hints that the emperor is poor, having only a million of francs, or 40,000*l.* to boast of, while Talleyrand, formerly his minister, possesses immense wealth in all the funds of different countries.

Liverpool, August 4.—The Northumberland, of 80 guns, captain Ross, arrived on Monday last at Portsmouth from the Downs, on her way to Plymouth, there to receive Bonaparte on board and convey him to St. Helena.

It is certainly determined that none of the suite of Bonaparte, except domestics, are to be permitted to go with him to St. Helena. Neither, it is said, will he be permitted to take with him any considerable sum of money (if the rumor be true that he is possessed of large funds) as every thing necessary to his establishment will be provided by the government. It is said that sir H. Lowe is to be the military officer appointed to be his guard. He will succeed Mr. Wilkes, who is in the company's service as governor of the island. The company's troops will be replaced by a king's regiment, and there will be an article in the new treaty of Paris, by which the expense of this establishment will be made a constituent part of our contingent towards the force that is to be kept up for the maintenance of the peace of Europe. Sir George Cockburn and sir Hudson Lowe, will attend ministers this day on the subject of their appointment to this service. The Bucephalus and Ceylon, are to receive a regiment on board for St. Helena.

Lord Keith, in his official character, as admiral of the fleet on the station, will have to read to Bonaparte the determination of the cabinet as to his future residence and treatment in the island of St. Helena. The ex-emperor, we understand, has heard of his destination, and has written to lord Keith a most vehement remonstrance against the measure of sending him there. With what temper, then, will he receive the dismal confirmation of it? It is said that he is to be permitted to take with him three friends and twelve servants. The amount of the bills and cash which he is said to possess is 200,000*l.* sterling. We learn that sir Hudson Lowe declines the appointment of being his keeper, and we do not know what other officer has been selected for that purpose. The island is to remain in the hands of the East India company, whose troops, under that excellent officer, colonel Mark Wilkes, will continue to occupy the bay, harbor and lowlands; and a king's regiment, with a commandant, will be stationed on the highland as his body guard. This is the final arrangement made with the company, so that their ships will touch there, as usual, in their homeward passage.—Globe.

The countess of Bertrand being told by a lieutenant of the Bellerophon, that it was the intention of this court to assign the island of St. Helena as a place of refuge and security for the emperor, replied, that he would sooner close the scene here—(commit suicide.)

London, August 6.—The following letter will not, perhaps, be uninteresting to our readers:

"Bellerophon, Plymouth, August 2.

"It was on Sunday the papers announced the determination of sending Bonaparte to St. Helena, and as he regularly enquires for them, perusing, with the assistance of madame Bertrand, almost every item, that part did not long escape his notice. Indeed, it was now publicly spoken of by every person. Before this, I had heard it was his determination never to quit the ship alive to be sent to St. Helena; and madame Bertrand informed me on reading the above, he had again positively asserted they should first take his life.

"On Sunday evening he had the marks of much agitation in his countenance. On the Monday, when he officially learnt his destination, he remained on deck but a short time, and appeared as pale as death. Yesterday he was something better.—I fear, on the arrival of the Northumberland, we shall witness some tragic scene. You know we are not the ship destined to convey him to St. Helena.

"A circumstance occurred last night, which seemed to be very near being a beginning to the scene I mentioned above. About 9 o'clock marshal and madame Bertrand were walking on the opposite side of the deck to where I was, in earnest conversation—suddenly madame rushed into Napoleon's cabin, threw herself at his feet for about half a minute, then flying below to her own cabin, threw herself nearly out of the stern window, when she was fortunately caught by the leg by general Montholon. She continued delirious the whole night—to-day she is better.

"On the following morning lord Keith and major-general sir H. Bunbury waited upon him, informing him, it was the determination of the allied sovereigns to send him to the above place, and granted permission to take with him part of his suite, with the exception of those proscribed, Savary, Lallemand and Bertrand. I understand he sent for captain Maitland, and again assured the admiral and general it was his fixed resolution never to quit this ship alive.

"Notwithstanding the news has greatly affected him he continues to show himself for about 20 minutes every evening, to the really astonishing number of people, which I think daily increases. It is with great difficulty the men of war's boats prevent the crowd approaching too near the ship. He now continues but a short time on the gangway, and is visible only to the inside boats. There is no truth in the account of his having taken possession in an authoritative manner of captain Maitland's cabin.

"We are so full in the ship, and have all of us given up our cabins and ward rooms to Bonaparte's suite, that we have been forced to sleep upon deck.

"We are all anxious to know whether it is intended to give up all the persons proscribed.—L'Allemand has written a letter to the prince regent, stating the manner in which he treated some English prisoners, whom he afterwards liberated, and to whom he wishes a reference to be made.

"Bonaparte has also written another letter, from which he seems to have hopes of being permitted to remain in this country."

London, August 7.—The Bellerophon sailed on Friday from Plymouth, accompanied by the Peruvian and Eurotas, with sealed orders. It is understood that they are to meet the Northumberland at sea, when Bonaparte will be transferred to that ship, in order to his proceeding to St. Helena. Bertrand, Savary, Lallemand, who are in the Eurotas, will be sent to some other destination; but it is supposed not to France, as was stated in the course of the last week. These persons were first put on board the Liffy, and thence transferred to the Eurotas, when the Liffy was ordered to the Downs to be paid off.

Plymouth, August 5. The Bellerophon, of 74 guns, having on board Bonaparte, accompanied by the Eurotas frigate and Peruvian brig of war, sailed yesterday afternoon to the eastward, supposed with a view of meeting the Northumberland off the Start Point, in order to transfer him to that ship. For the two last days previous to his sailing, no boats were suffered to approach near the Bellerophon, during which time he did not shew himself to the public; but previous thereto the numbers that surrounded the ship every evening were immense, amounting at times to upwards of 10,000 persons."

Bonaparte's property, excepting what may be absolutely necessary for his use, had been sealed up, and is to be kept in England, in order to prevent him from committing bribery, but he will be at liberty to bequeath it to any person he may like, at his death.

Some of his linen, sent ashore to be washed, appeared to be extremely fine in its texture, and has been held in such high esteem, that many individuals at Plymouth have temporarily put on one of his shirts, waistcoats or neckcloths, merely for the purpose of saying that they had worn his clothes!—Blind infatuation!

Among the sheets were several of exquisite cambric, inscribed in the corners with L: surmounted by a flat crown, in red silk, which renders it likely, that they were stolen from the present monarch of France, or left by him in the Thuilleries when he fled from Paris. Others had N. also in red silk, and surmounted by a crown, but higher than the other, and imperial. Possibly Louis Bonaparte when king of Holland, might have been the owner of the articles marked L. with the low red crown.

Sir H. Bunbury went on board the Bellerophon on Tuesday morning, to announce to Bonaparte the determination of government as to his future destination. When St. Helena was mentioned, Napoleon, it is said, exclaimed, that he could not believe that the report, when he had heard of such a determination, would have been officially confirmed; that no power on earth should force him to leave the Bellerophon on such a voyage; that he would not go alive out of the Sound; and that if his purpose was prevented, he hoped that he could rely on his officers to put an end to his existence. When he appeared as usual, in the evening, before the multitudes afloat, he looked extremely dejected and unwell.

Such are the reports circulated since the visit of sir H. Bunbury, and which continued to circulate at Plymouth and Plymouth dock, uncontradicted.

BONAPARTE AND THEMISTOCLES. As Bonaparte has compared his situation and conduct to those of Themistocles, our readers may be amused with perusing the following letter translated from the original, as preserved by Cornelius Nepos, in his life of the illustrious Grecian—the simplicity of the original is well preserved.

"I, Themistocles, am come to you who caused greater calamities to your family than all the other Greeks, so long as it was my duty to make war against your father, in defence of my own country. I also rendered to your father greater services than all the other Greeks as soon as I was safe, and he began to be in danger. For when he shewed an unwillingness to return into Asia after the battle of Salamis, I informed him by letter that it was in agitation to destroy the bridge he had thrown over the Hellespont, and to surround him. By which intelligence he was delivered from the impending danger: and now pursued and hunted by all Greece, I have betaken myself to you, and ask your friendship; which if I could obtain, you will find me no less sincere a friend, than I have been an active enemy. I request, however, that you allow me the space of one year previous to entering upon the business about which I desire to converse with you, and that, at the end of that period, you admit me to your presence."

Artaxerxes, to whom this letter was addressed, most gladly received the illustrious exile, and magnificently provided for his support. Themistocles is supposed to have died by poison, from despair of being able to accomplish what he had promised to the king in relation to the subjugation of Greece. Such, at least is the opinion of Cornelius Nepos, and, as he says, of Thucydides.

ST. HELENA.—The island of St. Helena is about twenty miles in circumference, and the land is so high that it may be discerned at sea about twenty leagues distant. It consists, indeed, of one vast rock, perpendicular on every side, like a castle in the middle of the ocean, whose natural walls are too high to be attempted by scaling ladders, nor is there the smallest beach, except at the bay called Chapel Valley Bay, which is fortified with a strong battery of 50 large cannon, planted even with the water, and farther defended by the perpetual dashing of prodigious waves against the shore, which, without further resistance, makes the landing difficult; and a little creek, where two or three men may land from a small boat, but now rendered inaccessible by a battery. As there is no other anchorage but at Chapel Valley, touching here is extremely precarious, for the wind being always settled from the south east, if a ship once overshoots it, it is a matter of great difficulty again to recover the harbor. Notwithstanding St. Helena appears on every side to be a hard barren rock, yet on the top it is covered with a coat of fine rich mould, about a foot and a half deep, which produces all manner of grain, grass, fruit, herbs, roots, and every kind of vegetables, in the utmost perfection and plenty.—After ascending the rock which borders it, to the sea, the country is prettily diversified with rising hills and vallies—the first covered naturally with a great variety of herbs, and the latter adorned with elegant plantations of fruit trees and gardens, among which are dispersed the houses of the natives—while herds of cattle low about the fields, some of which are fattened for the supply of shipping, and of the islanders, and the rest kept for milk, butter and cheese, and afford a prospect equally rich and delightful. Although no country produces finer crops of wheat, yet amidst affluence, they are liable to be starved, and their crops totally consumed by rats, which breed in incredible numbers, and destroy every thing, with all the desolation occasioned by locusts in some other countries. This however, is an evil to which certainly a remedy might be applied, as well as to the scarcity of wine, with which commodity they are now supplied by the company's ships, and also with flour and malt. As the island is so sandy, and the soil too thin for large trees to take root, it is extremely deficient in wood, and their very houses are sent ready framed from England—but with regard to underwood, they have as much as is wanted in that warm climate. There are on the island between two and three hundred English families, or at least descended from English parents, or some way allied to them.—Some French refugees were likewise encouraged to settle in order to propagate vines and make wine; a point in which they have by no means been successful.

This island is situated about 400 leagues from the coast of Africa, and 600 from the coast of South America. Lon. 5, 40, W. Greenwich, lat. 15, 55, S.

Bonaparte was complimented by admiral Hotham; after his surrender, by an invitation to breakfast with him. On this occasion the admiral ordered the yards manned as a mark of respect to his distinguished guest.

Bonaparte's travelling library was found in six trunks and amounted to about 800 volumes.—Among them were Homer, Ossian, Voltaire's works, Gil Blas, Don Quixote, Voltaire's Charles XII. &c. all beautiful editions.

Reluctant complaint. Lord Grenville called the attention of the British parliament to the abolition of the "slave trade" on the 6th of June. "This object, it was hoped, would have been secured upon the restoration of the conquered provinces of France; but all that has hitherto been done, either in France, or at Vienna, goes comparatively, but a short way to the removal of the evil. On the late change in the government of France, the person who now de facto exercises the government of that country, [Bonaparte] stepped beyond the existing engagements, and completed the abolition of the slave trade. Seeing as I do, so much to disapprove in the conduct of that person and condemning as I must, the whole of his public character, I am sorry my lords, that an opportunity was left for him to do so great an act. In so far he is clearly entitled to praise, for the act is now done, and the French trade is abolished."

Jerome Bonaparte is said to be ill of his wounds at Valenciennes. Lucien has been arrested at Turin.

OF THE STATE OF FRANCE.

London, July 26—A mail arrived from Hamburg last night, but, excepting a letter from the neighborhood of Paris, dated the 5th inst. it brought nothing worthy of notice. The letter alluded to, states, that the property of the mayors who have been active for Bonaparte is to be sequestered, as also that of all the inhabitants who do not return in eight days to their habitations; the sequestered property to form a military fund, and to indemnify other inhabitants for sacrifices and requisitions. The allied armies are to be maintained, clothed, paid and armed at the expense of the enemy's country, and the following articles required from the occupied provinces—150,000 pair of shoes, 150,000 coats, 40,000 pair of boots, 150,000 cloaks, 150,000 pair of breeches, 150,000 pair of gaiters, 150,000 stocks, 150,000 leather caps, 100,000 kettles and drinking vessels, 100,000 horse shoes, 3000 horses, half saddle, half draught horses, and 4,000,000 of francs, to make good the arrears of pay. The allies appear to have adopted the manner and style of the requisitions which French generals used to levy in foreign countries. Even in Swedish Pomerania, when friendly, the French general told the governor the country must provide for the Gallic troops, that it was the French maxim, that where the army was it must be supported.

Other letters state, and we think this exceeding probable, that the proceedings of the allies have been not a little embarrassed by the circumstance of the king having so soon made his appearance in Paris. Less difficulty, it is said, would have been experienced in settling the government, even for the king's ultimate and personal interests, if he had remained at Ghent.

July 27.—We have heard that the duke of Wellington is about to lead the greater part of the British army, now in France, towards the Loire, and it is understood, that his grace will be permitted to accept a commission from the allied sovereigns for uniting their corps to the British, and taking the command of the whole against the rebel forces in the centre and south of the kingdom.

Aug. 2.—Last night we received the Paris papers of Sunday, and this morning those of Monday. We did expect to have found in them a royal decree for disbanding the army of the Loire; but that army, as well as most other armies of France, continue to brave the royal authority, and to stand out for terms. Its head-quarters are at Bourges and it is untrue that Davoust, its commander, is at Paris. Two divisions of this army are at Riom under Excellmans and Chastel. They refuse to hoist the white cockade, until they have the king's answer to their offer of submission. It is evident therefore, that their submission is not entire and simple.

A mail from Flanders arrived this morning, and the papers brought by it two letters from Paris, of considerable interest. One says that the conditions to be imposed upon France are reported to be as follows:

Huninguch and a circle round it to be given to Switzerland, in order to render Basle secure for the future.

Landau to be ceded to Germany.

Givet, Philippeville, Maubeuge, Conde, and one or two more fortresses (Lilse and Valenciennes we trust) to be given up to the king of the Netherlands.

A large contribution in money in a stipulated time.

Chambery and that part of Savoy given to France by the treaty of Paris, to be restored to the king of Sardinia, who is to cede Nice. We do not see the propriety of this cession. France ought to have no cession made to her.

To the above terms we trust will be added, the restoration by France of all the pillaged statues and pictures.

French papers of the 2d inst were received yesterday. The information respecting the refractory armies is yet scanty. There are numerous desertions, accompanied by great disorders and irregularities on the part of the soldiers, who carry off their arms. These desertions and irregularities the generals declaim against, and endeavour to restrain, evidently for the purpose of maintaining their own power, by keeping the troops together, while the king's friends feel disposed to look with indulgence on the outrages in contemplating the reduction of the army. The main body is understood to have gone from the Loire towards the mountains of Auvergne, in which the most desperate will form gangs, living at discretion upon the whole country, when, as a whole, the force will have melted away to nothing. It is supposed that when the military chest shall be exhausted, which may be concluded to be nearly the case at present, a general dissolution will take place of itself. The notorious Lefebvre, with two regiments of cavalry have, it is said thrown themselves into the mountains of Auvergne as partizans, that is, as military robbers. Several of the persons of whom the king is more particularly bound to make examples, have been arrested; but we suppose only to be let loose again, with the double incentives of provocation and impunity, to commit fresh offences.

[Another London paper of August 7, tells us that France is as unsettled as ever. "The head is fallen, (says this paper) but the body still exists; a single wheel of the machine is deranged, but its general powers are not destroyed; the serpent is overthrown, but his teeth are scattered abroad, to start up into the same fierce and dangerous combatants that we have vainly subdued. In other words, Bonaparte has been taken from the scene, but the jacobin faction remain."

It then goes on to state that the submission of the army is every where slow and reluctant—that many towns are the victims of contending parties.—That even in Paris the mighty foreign armies are hardly able to keep down the factions. That disputes between the royalists and their opponents run so high, that at the public hotels they have had separate tables assigned them. Mentions that some arrests have taken place, and closes the article as follows: "Shall these men [meaning the people of France] talk about their destinies and their glories, till the rest of the world are contented to believe them, like clowns who gape at an impudent juggler? If it be for no other purpose than to vindicate the moral superiority of the rest of Europe, let France be left to gaze upon her nakedness, and thus learn to sum up the deformities which her tinself trappings have so long concealed."

Whether this unsettled state of things really exists in France, or is only proclaimed by the "legitimists," to prepare the way for their designs upon her independence as a nation, we shall know a little while hence. Possibly, the massacre of the French at Madrid, which was called a "glorious revolution," may be re-transacted at Paris, on the foreigners—who, in like manner, have placed a king on the throne, and attempt to keep him there, against the will of the people. If these reports be true, it is undoubted that Louis is not the "desired" of France, and we may look for another, and, perhaps, more destructive revolution. Would that the world had repose! But it is hardly possible to have it, except in the most finished despotism, with the present system of kingscraft.

The "legitimate" remark respecting the gallant Lefebvre is worthy of notice—he is a "military robber," but all that was heavenly was hardly sufficient to serve for encomiums on Mina and others of the Spaniards who done the very thing they attribute to him. What wretched and truly royal hypocrisy!]

Old king George continues as usual—and Frederick Guelph has tumbled down and broke his arm; which, the London paper says, "will deprive the public of his active and valuable services."

The loss of the Dutch and Belgian troops in the battle of Waterloo, was 27 officers, and 2053 under officers and privates killed and missing, and 115 officers and 1939 under officers and privates wounded. The loss of horses was 1680.

NATIONAL GUARD OF PARIS.—ORDER OF THE DAY PARIS, JULY 4, 1815.—A convention has been made with the generals of the allied powers to stop the effusion of blood.

The citizens of Paris should suffer no alarm, and remain in the position at once peaceable and firm, which they have preserved in the midst of dangers.

The police of the city remains entrusted to the national guard and to the municipal gendarmerie under my orders as governor of Paris.

Continue to secure persons and property from all assault, to prevent all tumultuous assemblages, to silence every species of language that might tend to excite dissension, and not to suffer to be displayed in any place by any person whatever, any other than the national colours: these are the duties now imposed upon the national guard.

I depend for their performance upon the zeal of the citizens who compose it, and upon the devotion of its officers.

The marshal, peer of France, governor of Paris, commander in chief of the National guard.

(Signed) Prince of ESSLING.

PARIS, JULY 5.—Adieu of the army to the National guard of Paris.—BRAVE COMRADES—We shall perform our retreat upon the Loire, agreeably to a convention.

In making this sacrifice, so grievous for our glory, we give to France, to the country, the highest proof of our obedience. We carry with us the most lively regrets at separating from you, brave and generous citizens of Paris, whose valour and patriotism ever honour the ties of friendship and glory, by which we have been re-united for the defence of the country.

Indelible shame to those cowardly Frenchmen, who have laboured, who still labour for the reverse, of the nation, and smile at the success of foreign armies! Leave them to disgrace themselves by their cries of baseness and of joy; they only dishonor themselves, and not the nation, which disowns them. They will reap nothing but the double contempt, of their fellow citizens and even of our enemies who know how to respect our glory.

Honor to you, brave and generous citizens, who have rendered yourselves worthy of that respectable title by partaking our glorious labors! Defend the national colors, which we have made illustrious by our exploits. These last belong as well to you as to us; they are those of the nation. Preserve by your noble attitude those sacred titles to our esteem; we will preserve also the same title to yours.

Arrived at the points designated for us, we shall become stronger than ever by the same national spirit. Malignity will have no more influence upon our re-united arms. If contrary to our expectations the promises of an honorable peace, consecrating our rights to choose our government and to give ourselves a free constitution, should be deceptive, we will hasten to you either to die in illustrating anew the French name, or to prove that a nation is always free when she wills it.

Adieu, brave comrades; and you, citizens, worthy of the French name! Upon the banks of the Loire, as upon those of the Seine, our vows shall be, for the country and for you.

Subscribed by the commanders of corps, officers and subalterns.

Paris, July 5.

TEMPER OF FRANCE.—From the New-York Columbian.—*Letters from France, received in New-York, relate the following facts:—*Cande.—A French officer, in the name of Louis XVIII. and the allies, was sent to the commander of this city to ask its surrender; for answer the officer was instantly seized and hung in front of the glacis and in full view of the enemy.

A Prussian corps of 25,000 men were ordered to prevent the junction of two French divisions, the one under marshal Davoust, and the other under marshal Suchet. It happened that the Prussians arrived too late to prevent it, and soon enough to be literally cut to pieces. Upwards of 11,000 were killed, 9700 men wounded, and a corps of about 3000 men that were making their retreat were surrounded by the peasants armed with pitchforks, axes, spades, hoes and scythes, and not one of the enemy escaped death.

These facts, and many others similar, were not permitted to be printed in France; but the public may be assured of their authenticity.

Old Times.

NAVAL BATTLE ON LAKE CHAMPLAIN, IN 1778.

From the Columbian.—It appears from a very minute narrative in the Gentleman's Magazine, (a periodical frisk publication) that a naval encounter took place between the Americans and British on Lake Champlain in the year 1778. It is remarkable, as will be seen by the following, that this battle and Macdonough's were both fought on the same day of the month, and almost in the same month. Macdonough's was fought on the 11th of September, and this on the 11th October. The British captain's name, who fought Macdonough, was Pringle, (capt. Downie being killed early in the action)—and in this battle the captain's name Pringle. The most surprising circumstance of all, however, is that notwithstanding the vast superiority of force on the part of the British, and the experience and skill of an able naval officer, they still could not gain a victory over the American squadron, commanded by no less a novice in maritime warfare than brigadier-general Arnold. The reader must observe that the following facts are founded on British authority which in those trying times were notorious for exaggeration and misrepresentation.

"The force," says the British historian, "was very considerable with respect to the place and service, extraordinary in regard to the little time spent in its formation, and such as, a very few ages ago, would have been deemed formidable even upon the European seas. The ship Inflexible, which may be considered as admiral, had been re-constructed at St. John's, from whence she sailed in 28 days after laying her keel. The strength of the two squadrons was as follows:

BRITISH.

Ship Inflexible, 18 twelve-pounders.
Schooner, 14 six-pounders.
Schooner, 12 do.
A Radeaux, 12 twenty-four and twelve-pounders, besides howitzers.
A Gondola, 7 nine pounders.
20 Gun-Boats, 20 nine and twenty-four pounders.
Some Long-Boats, force not specified, tenders, transports, &c.

AMERICAN.

1 Schooner, (the largest vessel) 12 six and four pounders.

14 smaller vessels, force not specified.

"Our armament," continues the British historian, "was conducted by captain Pringle, and the fleet navigated by above 700 prime seamen, of whom 200 were volunteers from the transports, who after having rivalled those belonging to the ships of war in all the toil of preparation now boldly and freely partook with them in the danger of the expedition. The guns were served by detachments of men and officers belonging to the corps of artillery. In a word, no equipment of the sort was ever better appointed, or more amply furnished with every kind of provision necessary for the intended service.

"The enemy's force was in no degree equal either with respect to the goodness of the vessels, the number of guns, furniture of war, or weight of metal. Sensible, though they were, of the necessity of preserving the dominion of the lakes, and aided in that design by the original force in their hands, with a great advantage in point of time for its increase, their intentions in that respect were counteracted by many essential, and some irremediable deficiencies. They wanted timber, artillery, ship-builders, and all the materials necessary for such an equipment. Carpenters, and all others concerned in the business of shipping, were fully engaged at the sea ports in the construction and fitting out of privateers, whilst the remoteness, and difficulty of communication, rendered the supply of bulky materials extremely tedious. When we consider the difficulties on their part, we think it not just to deny the Americans the praise, of having combated and in part overcome them, with an assiduity, perseverance, and spirit, which did not in the least fall short of what had been employed against them. For their fleet amounted to 15 vessels of different kinds, consisting of two schooners, one sloop, one cutter, three galleys, and eight gondolers. The principal schooner mounted 12 six and four pounders. They were commanded by Benedict Arnold, who was now to support upon a new element, that known which he had acquired on land in the Canada expedition.

"On the 11th of October our fleet having proceeded up the lake, discovered the enemy drawn up with great judgment, being very advantageously posted, and forming a strong line, to defend the passage between the Island of Valicour and the western main. A warm action ensued, and was vigorously supported on both sides for some hours; but the wind being unfavorable, so that the ship inflexible, and some other vessels of force could not be worked up to the enemy, the weight of the action fell upon the schooner Carleton and the gun-boats, which they sustained with great firmness, such extraordinary efforts of resolution being displayed both by men and officers, as merited and received the highest applause from their commanders. It is to be presumed, that when so much praise was due and given to the conduct and valor of a superior force on our side, the enemy must not have acted their part amiss.

"The detachment belonging to the corps of artillery, were highly distinguished, and did most essential service in the gun-boats. But the same impediments still continuing, which prevented their being seconded by the other vessels, captain Pringle, with the approbation of general Carleton (who was also in the fleet), thought it necessary for the present, to withdraw those that were engaged from the action. At the approach of night, he brought the whole fleet to anchor in a line, and as near as possible to the enemy, in order to prevent their retreat.

"Being now fully sensible however of their inferiority, the enemy took the opportunity which the darkness of the night afforded, of endeavoring to escape from their present imminent danger, hoping to obtain shelter and protection at Crown Point. Arnold concerted and executed this design with ability, and fortune seemed at first so favorable to his purpose, that they were out of sight by the next morning. The chase being however continued, both on that day and the succeeding day without intermission, the wind, and other circumstances peculiar to the navigation of the lake, which had been at first in favor of the Americans, became at length otherwise, so that they were overtaken and brought to action a few leagues short of Crown Point.

"A very warm engagement ensued, and continued about two hours, during which those vessels that were most ahead pushed on with the utmost speed, and passing Crown Point, escaped to Ticouderoga. But two galleys and five gondolas which remained with Arnold, made a desperate resistance. Finding, however, at length, that it was impossible to withstand the superiority of force, skill, and weight of metal, with which he was overborne, and that he was but ill seconded by the captains of some of his vessels, he determined that his people should not become prisoners, nor the vessels a prey to the enemy. He executed this design with equal resolution and dexterity, and run the Congress galley, in which himself was, with the five gondolas, on shore, in such a manner, as to land his men safely, and blow up the vessels, in spite of every effort that was used to prevent both.

"Loss and defeat were so far from producing their usual effect with respect to Arnold, that his conduct in this command raised his character still higher than it was before with his countrymen. They said that he not only acted the part of a brave soldier, but that he also amply filled that of an able naval commander. That when his vessels were torn almost to pieces, he retreated with the same resolution that he fought, and by the happiest and most critical judgment, prevented his people and them from falling into the hands of the enemy. But they chiefly gloried in the dangerous attention he paid to a nice point of honor, in keeping his flag flying and not quitting his galley till she was in flames, lest the enemy should have boarded and struck it!"

Alas! what an unhappy change was afterwards wrought upon this truly brave man. D.

PITTSBURG, SEPTEMBER 9.

To the Editor of the Mercury.

Detroit, August 26, 1815.—Underneath you have the substance of what has transpired as yet at the Indian treaty, which is held three miles from this place.

August 22, 1815.—This day, a preliminary meeting was held at the council house, in this city, (Detroit) by gens. Harrison and McArthur, and Mr. Graham, commissioners plenipotentiary on the part of the United States, and the chiefs and warriors of the principal part of the Wyandots, Pottowatomies, Chippaway and Ottawa nations.

SUBSTANCE.—Gen. Harrison informed these chiefs and warriors, that one of the primary objects in calling them here at this moment, was a renewal of their former peace and friendship towards each other. Other nations, however, being absent, but very soon expected, it would be necessary to adjourn for their arrival. In the mean time, he requested the chiefs present to invite their brethren, who were now at Malden, to attend at the Spring Wells, (three miles below this town) on the 25th inst. to kindle the council fire.

On the 25th, the commissioners met agreeably to adjournment.

The messenger sent to Malden returned for answer, "that the message sent was delivered to their brethren, then in council with the British commandant, who answered for them, saying, "that his great father, on the other side of the great waters, had directed him to hold a council at this very time, with his red children, and he could not think of letting the chiefs then present attend at the American fire kindled at the Spring Wells, until his council was over. If the young men, said he, wish to go there, they might, he had no objections; but the old men and chiefs, (the Prophet being among the number) must not go for the present—they must fasten the soles of their feet to the British shore."

The chiefs, &c. at the Spring Wells, "expressed their satisfaction this day, at a renewal of peace and friendship between them and the United States; and said that they were naked and very hungry; and hoped that their fathers, the commissioners, would give them plenty of every thing, particularly bread, meat and whiskey."

The nations absent on the 22d inst. have not yet arrived.

Council adjourned, to meet on the 28th instant. Extract of a letter from a gentleman on board of the United States frigate Congress, dated at Flushing, July 16.

"We arrived here after a pleasant passage of 29 days—rather longer than we expected, from our having got as far as 17 W. in 15 days; but after parting with the Neptune we had nothing but easterly winds and calms for 19 days. We fell in with a number of British men of war, who were very polite, and in all instances run under our lee, and requested to send a boat on board as they had information from lord Wellington's army. This our friend, his Excellency the Ambassador, was anxious to hear. Among the British men of war, was the one commanded by captain Dacres, formerly of the Guerriere, who was remarkably polite. All the merchant men lowered their royals or top gallant sails as we passed.

"On our arrival here, the Dutch admiral showed us every attention possible—offering to send a vessel to Antwerp at procure water, there being none on Walcheren.

"We landed our minister in great style under a salute from this ship and the Dutch admiral, yards manned, &c. On his arrival at the hotel, the captain and a number of officers called upon the minister, who gave an entertainment.

"During the passage Mrs. Eustis never once complained of indisposition.

"Yesterday the Ambassador and suite embarked on board the king's yacht accompanied by captain Morris, for Rotterdam. On the return of captain M. which will be in 2 or 3 days, we shall leave here for the Mediterranean."

BRITISH WEST INDIES.—It is known to those who are concerned in the West India trade, that two or more of the governments of those islands on their own responsibility permitted the entry of American vessels with produce, after the expiration in March last, of the order in council, premitting their entry. The following is a copy of the reply of the British minister to the governor of the island of Tobago on this subject.

Dorning-street, 30th May, 1815.

SIR—I have received your despatch of the 30th March, and am very sorry to be under the necessity of conveying to you the decided disapprobation of his majesty's government, of your having admitted any American vessel to entry, after the expiration of the order in council, by which such admission was authorized for a limited time.

The conduct which you have adopted in this instance, is both contrary to law and the general interest of his majesty's colonies, and I am therefore to signify to you the express commands of his royal highness the prince regent, that you should in no instance take it upon yourself to authorize the admission into the ports of Tobago of vessels and cargoes, which are excluded by the general law of the empire.

(Signed)

BATHURST.

His honor John Balfour, Esq.

There is a decided disposition in the British to exclude our vessels as much as is possible from all their colonies. Some of their acts in the West Indies are outrageously severe. The ship owners of the east begin to talk a new language.

The Indians. There is a prospect of an immediate peace with the Indians of the north west, as we learn by a letter received by the surveyor-general from governor Cass, at Detroit; and, in consequence, surveyors were about to start from Chillicothe to run the lines, &c. But the Sacs and Foxes, west of the Mississippi, it is thought, must be brought to a sense of justice through feeling—they must be Jacksonized, as the saying is in the west.

Shipwrecks. An idea of the effects of the late gales, may be gathered from the following fact, mentioned in a Boston paper—"A few days since, eleven sail of dismasted ships and brigs were seen off Gay Head, all in sight of each other! Six of them went into Newport, and the remainder chiefly through the Vineyard Sound.

Transportation.—The British are transporting considerable numbers of Scotch to Canada, and Irish to Newfoundland.

Vermont election.—We have not yet received the returns; but the republican ticket has entirely prevailed.

Ceylon. The British papers officially state the capture of Candy and the entire subjugation of Ceylon. The king, with two of his wives, was taken prisoner. Will the illustrious "congress of Vienna," the "high allies," restore him to the throne? Ah! the spoiler is one of themselves, and the act is "legitimate." The affair is thus announced—

"Despatches have been received from general Brownrig, the governor of Ceylon, in the East Indies, of rather a gratifying description.

"The king of Candy (the Bonaparte of Ceylon) who has been long a ferocious and barbarous enemy of the British nation in that quarter of the globe, has been taken prisoner, after his troops were totally defeated by the British and native Indian forces sent against them. His power is, in fact, at an end, and his territories have been annexed to our Indian possessions."

The king of Candy was the "Bonaparte of Ceylon," and "a ferocious and barbarous enemy of the British nation in that quarter of the globe"—Why?—Simply, because the British invaded his territories and would have served him as Napoleon would have treated Spain. This is the truth; let the "legitimates" look to it.

PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, NO. 29, SOUTH CALVERT-STREET, AT $5 PER ANNUM.

The present number [No. 5] consists of a sheet and a half, or 24 pages, being an extra quantity of unusually interesting matter—among which is a list of the officers of the navy of the United States, so arranged as to be concluded in the next paper and follow in regular succession when the work is bound up; a plan that will be always pursued when mechanical convenience, or a due regard for variety, shall induce us to divide a long article.

We design, in the next paper, to insert an exceedingly interesting account of Wilmington, Del. and its vicinity, shewing the manufactories in that delightful neighborhood; to which is added a philosophical essay “on the probability of human life in the middle states,” &c.

On giving away half a sheet, I have felt justified in appropriating a page to shew the contents of the Supplement to the 8th Volume, just published and forwarded to all whose orders for it have yet reached me. About 300 copies remain to be disposed of, and may had at 1$ each.

British Statistics.

EXPENDITURES—LOANS, &c. FOR 1815.

Considerable labor and attention have been directed to bring out the results below—which, the editor believes, will interest many of his readers who have not leisure or opportunity to wade through the documents and papers needful to obtain them.

The sum required for the service of the united Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, for the year 1815, was about 90 millions sterling, as follows:

Navy and transports	£18,644,200
Army and ordnance	43,582,398
Foreign payments, including bills of credit	9,000,000
Vote of credit 6,000,000—do. for Ireland 200,000	6,200,000
Army prize money	942,347
Miscellaneous	3,000,000
"Separate charges," various	8,300,000

£89,728,926

To which is to be added, the payment of the interest on the national debt—support of the civil government, allowances, pensions and bounties, &c. &c. &c. making in the whole not less than forty millions; or a grand total of one hundred and thirty millions, equal to about five hundred and seventy seven millions of dollars, for one year.

The war expenses were as follows:

In 1808, ...	£44,000,000
1809, ...	59,010,000
1810, ...	47,000,000
1811, ...	52,000,000
1812, ...	52,000,000
1813, ...	57,000,000
1814, ...	68,000,000
1815, calculated at	72,000,000

In eight years . . . £442,000,000

Equal to $1,962,480,000—nearly two thousand millions of dollars. To which inconceivable amount must be added vast claims not yet liquidated.

The fiscal operations of Great Britain have been greatly aided by the Sinking Fund. (See the history and account of this fund, vol. II. page 60.) Its proceeds are sometimes nearly equal to the sums borrowed; but latterly, by some encroachments upon it, and a greater want of money, it has fallen much short. In 1806, the sinking fund was equal to a 65th part of the whole national debt. It went on prosperously three or four years and got up to a 44th; but reverted, in 1814, to a 64th, and probably this year will be about a 70th part of the debt. In 1806 the product of the the sinking fund was within 1,270,000 of the amount of the loans for that year; in 1810, less by 5 millions; in 1814, less by 29 millions; and in 1815, less by 33 millions of pounds.

The ways and means for the service of the year 1815, were as follow:

Annual duties	13,000,000
Surplus consolidated fund	3,000,000
War taxes	22,000,000
Lottery	250,000
Naval stores	508,700
Vote of credit	6,000,000

134,756,700

Leaving about fifty-five millions to be raised by loans, except the produce of the taxes, in Ireland, which is not stated.

The customs, excises, &c. &c. &c. not mentioned, are probably equal to the payment of the interest on the national debt, and support of the civil list, assisted by the product of the sinking fund.

We now come to the difficult task of attempting to explain the nature and principle of the British loans in general, but especially of the great loan of 36 millions (159,840,000 dollars) voted on the 14th of June last, in part to support the service of the year. The facts below have been collected, and collated with great care, and, we believe, are essentially correct in all their parts. But much study and reflection, perhaps, more than I am capable of bestowing on the subject, is requisite to obtain a general idea of the British method of managing their loans. Indeed, it may be esteemed as a science sui generis. But the facts developed, as far we have gone, are interesting and curious.

The terms of this loan of 36 millions were as follows:

130 l . 3 per cents. reduced	} for every 100 l . subscribed.
10 l . 4 per cents.
44 l . 3 per cents consols.

The dividend upon the 3 per cent. reduced and 4 per cents, to commence from April last, and upon the 3 per cent. consols from July next; and the first half-yearly dividends on the 3 per cent. reduced, 3 per cent. consols, and 4 per cents. to be exempted from the property tax. Discount after the rate of 4 per cent. per annum for payments made in full.

The time of payment embraces a period of 10 months—10 per cent. a month. The first instalment in June, 1815, the last in March, 1816.

The day on which this loan was taken, those amounts of stocks would have produced in the money market 101*l*. 15 2½. This, with the discount for prompt payment, pre-interest allowed, &c. constitutes what is called in stock-jobbing phrase, the bonus; to be shewn more clearly below.

But in consequence of this great loan being required, the stocks were lower on the 14th of June than they had ever been before, on one occasion excepted. Only five days before, the stocks given for 100*l*. would have produced 107*l*. 10*s*. 6*d*. in money—thus:

130 l . 3 per cent. reduced at	57 l . 10	74 l . 15 0
10 l . 4 per cents.	72 l . 15	7 l . 5 6
44 l . 3 per cent consols	53 l . 15	25 l . 10 0
		107 l . 10 6

The stocks, June 8,	107 l . 10 6
“ “ 14,	101 l . 15 2½

Difference 5*l*. 14 3½

Shewing a depreciation of the value of stocks, or a rise of the value of money, in the space of 6 days, of 5*l*. 14 3½, per cent.

In the year 1792, the 3 per cent. consols had a steady sale at 95*l*. per cent. In 1802, they had fallen to 77*l*. At the peace of Paris, 1814, they were worth 66*l*. Their present value will be noted below, when we attempt to shew the profit made by the contractors for the loan.

The real depreciation of the value of British stocks, compared with gold and silver, may be exhibited as follows:

In 1792, 100 l . in the 3 per cents. would produce in specie	95 l . 00 0
— June 14, 1815, the same 100 l . would fetch in paper currency,	55 l . 15
Deduct premium for specie at 30 per cent	16 l . 14—39 l . 1 0

Real depreciation, per cent. 55*l*. 19 0

That is—100*l*. of stock was worth fifty-five pounds nineteen shillings more in 1792, than on the 14th of June, 1815.

The contractors of the loan have also a singular advantage, or bonus, as to the interest on the stocks issued. We see that the interest on some part of them is actually to commence almost two months before the loan was effected!—and they will have received, or had due, 274,054 of interest, before they paid one farthing of the principal. And further, taking the end of 5 months as the equated time of all the instalments, they will receive for the first year, an additional extra or clear interest of about 1,030,000*l*. That is—the interest that will be paid or accrue on the stocks issued for the money the contractors have engaged to pay, will produce to them the sum of 1,334,054*l*. over and beyond the interest on the money as really paid into the treasury.

We are unable to comprehend clearly the amount borrowed for the service of the year 1815; for the chancellor of the exchequer (Mr. Vansittart) sometimes leaves us in doubt whether he means Great Britain and Ireland jointly, or Great Britain only, and there are some other things that we are not confident of under rightly. In his speech of the 14th June, in the house of commons, in producing the budget he says—

“The total amount of the capital created by the exchequer bills [treasury notes] funded, and the loan in the five per cents. amounted to 21,208,000*l*. 5 per cent. stock: the interest of this to 1,050,000*l*. the sinking fund 331,000*l*. with the usual charge for management. The loan obtained that day created a capital of 49,683,000*l*. the interest of which would be 1,517,000*l*.; the sinking fund, which by the act of 1813 was extended to exchequer bills, would amount to 738,700*l*.; to which was to be added the charge for management. The total amount of the capital created in the present year by funding, was 70,883,000*l*. The interest on this was 2,577,000*l*.; the sinking fund 1,090,000*l*. The total annual charge to the country, 3,689,000*l*. The rate per cent. at which the whole of the sum raised in the present year had been obtained was, to the subscribers (including the sinking fund) 5*l*. 14*s*. 2½*d*. The total charge to the country was, every thing included, 8*l*. 3*s*. 5½*d*.”

By this, we suppose that nearly 50 millions had been borrowed, and that the whole charge to the nation therefor, was really at the rate of 8*l*. 3*s*. 5½*d*. per cent.

We shall now proceed to an estimate of part of the profits made by the contractors for this loan of 36 millions:

The price of stocks on the 27th of June (on the news of the downfall of Bonaparte) was—

For 3 per cent. reduced	£58 15 0
4 per cents.	73 2 6
3 per cent. consols.	60 10 0

The fair peace price of the latter may be esteemed at 65*l*. which, indeed, is lower than they are under such a circumstance. But we intend merely to attempt to shew what they may be considered to have realized in thirteen days.

They have—46 millions of 3 per cent. reduced, rated to them, June 16, at 55*l*. 2*s*. 6*d*. per cent. but worth on the 27th of that month, 58*l*. 15*s*. and had an advance of 3*l*. 7*s*. 6*d*. for every 100*l*. of stock. In like manner, there was an advance on the 4 per cents. of 3*l*. 7*s*. 6*d*. and on the 3 per cent. consols. of 4*l*. 15*s*. per 100*l*.

46,000,000 of 3 per cent. red. at 3 l . 7 s . 6 d . per 100 l .	1,552,500
3,600,000 4 per cents	ditto 121,500
15,840,000 3 per cent. consols. 4 l . 15 s .	722,400

£2,296,400

But Mr. Vansittart said the contractors had received a bonus of 3*l*. 2*s*. per cent. We do not exactly know how this was made up. A part of it was in the 1*l*. 15*s*. 2½*d*. which he gave in stocks, over their selling price on the day the loan was negotiated, as described above. But there is no doubt they received the whole 3*l*. 2*s*. He would not make it more than he had paid.

36 millions at 3l. 2s. per cent.	1,116,000
Add to the above, rise of stock	2,396,400
	3,512,400
To which again add the interest received over and beyond the interest on the principal paid, as before stated	*1,334,054
	4,846,454

Which, I think, comes pretty nearly, though I hardly believe it amounts to the profits actually made by the contractors in the space of thirteen days. Upon reflection, I feel confident that this enormous amount is below the real profit. So great is the profligacy of the government in issuing its paper, and so wily the jobbers in the management of their affairs, that, it is probable, the sum may be given at six millions of pounds sterling—if not more.

A few more calculations and we have done—
The amount of the loan	1,36,000,000
Deduct the bonus at 3l. 2s. per cent.	1,116,000
The extra interest	1,334,054
Other allowances and charges of management	1,000,000
	3,450,054

Produce	1,32,549,946
---------	--------------

Then, to shew the specie, or real value, deduct at the rate of 30 per cent. only (and specie at the time the loan was effected was more than that advance compared with bank notes, and the British government has doubtless paid at that rate for it) and the product will be

1,25,038,420

The loan of thirty-six millions might, therefore, have been bought for £25,038,420 in cash, or its equivalent. And 144l. of the loan raised only 100l. in cash.

The stock issued for this loan of 36 millions, which raised 25 millions in cash, or its equivalent, was 65,440,000—thus:

46,000,000	3 per cent. reduced
3,600,000	4 per cents.
15,840,000	3 per cent. consols.

1,65,440,00—equal to $290,553,600

And 100l. of stock produced only 38l. 5s. in cash, or its equivalent.

Tables to shew the actual taxes paid by the people of England, including those in the shape of tythes, poor rates and county rates, &c. &c. with a calculation of what is borne by the productive population of the kingdom, will be useful, and may be attempted—to present a wholesome contrast to the people of the United States.

FROM A LATE ENGLISH PAPER.

Bank of England accounts.—The average amount of public balances in the hands of the bank, between the 1st of February, 1814, and the 15th of January, 1815, both inclusive, upon accounts opened at the bank, was 261,162l.: and the amount of the same (exclusive of the exchequer account) between the 1st of February 1814, and the 15th of January, 1815, both days inclusive, upon accounts opened at the bank previous to the 28th of March, 1800, was 4,227,025l.—The aggregate amount of bank notes, (including 1,200,220l. in bank post bills) in circulation on the 15th of May, was 26,473,880l. The average amount of unclaimed dividends on the hands of the bank for 12 months, up to the 1st of January, was 779,794l. making the gross amount 9,357,533l.—The amount of unclaimed dividends in the hands of the bank on the first of January, 1815, was 1,297,742l. of which 876,739l. has been advanced to government per 31 and 48 George III. leaving a remainder in the bank of 421,003l. Mr. Grenfell's resolutions, proposed concerning the bank of England.

*This is fairly added, because the prices quoted were those paid for the ordinary stocks. Those issued for this loan were not yet in the market, except in what is called omium—i. e. a script of all the stocks of which a loan may be composed.

1. That it appears, that there was paid by the public to the bank of England, for managing the national debt, including the charge for contributions on loans and lotteries, in the year ending 5th of July, 1792, the sum of 99,803l. 12s. 5d.; and that there was paid for the like service, in the year ending 5th of April, 1815, the sum of 281,568l. 6s. 11 1-4d. being an increase of 181,764l. 14s. 6 1-4d. In addition to which, the bank of England have charged at the rate of 1250l. per million on the amount of property duty received at the bank on profits arising from professions, trades, and offices.

2. That the total amount of bank notes and bank post bills, in circulation, in the years 1795 and 1796, the latter being the year previous to the restriction on cash payments; and in the year 1814, was as follows:

1795—1st Feb.—	12,735,500l.	—and 1st Aug. 11,214,000l.
1814—1st do.—	25,154,950l.	—and 1st do. 23,800,150l.

3. That at present and during many years past, more particularly since the year 1806, considerable sums of public money, forming together an average stationary balance amounting to many millions, have been deposited with, or otherwise placed in the custody of the bank of England, acting in this respect as the bankers of the public.

4. That it appears, from a report ordered to be printed, 10th of August, 1807, from “the committee on the public expenditure of the united kingdom,” that the aggregate amount of balances and deposits of public money in the hands of the bank of England, including bank notes deposited in the exchequer, made up in four different periods of the quarter ending 5th January, 1807, fluctuated betwixt the sums.

pages 74 and 75. vide report	{ of 11,461,200 & 12,198,236 }	{ including bank notes deposited in the chests of the exchequer.
	{ of 18,178,536 & 9,948,400 }	{ excluding bank notes deposited at the exchequer.

5. That the aggregate amount of such deposits, together with the exchequer bills and bank notes deposited in the chests of the four tellers of the exchequer, was on an average in the year 1814—

11,966,371l. including bank notes deposited at the exchequer, amounting to 642,264l.

11,324,107l. excluding bank notes deposited at the exchequer.

6. That it appears that this aggregate amount of deposits, together with such portions of the amount of bank notes and bank post bills in circulation as may have been invested by the bank in securities bearing interest, was productive during the same period, of interest and profit to the bank of England.

7. That the only participation hitherto enjoyed by the public, since the year 1806, in the profits thus made on such deposits by the bank, has consisted of a loan of three millions, advanced by the bank, by 46 Geo. III. cap. 41, bearing 3 per cent, interest, which loan was discharged in December, 1814: and in another loan of three millions, advanced to the public by the bank by the 48 Geo. III. cap 3, free, of any charge of interest; which loan became payable in December, 1814, but has, by an act of the present session of parliament, cap. 16. been continued to the 5th of April, 1816.

8. That this house will take into early consideration the advantages derived by the bank, as well from the management of the national debt as from the amount of balances of public money remaining in their hands, with the view to the adoption of such an arrangement, when the engagements now subsisting shall have expired, as may be consistent with what is due to the interests of the public, and to the rights, credit, and stability of the bank of England.

18th June, 1815.

Mexico and South America.

(From a Louisiana Correspondent.)

At a time when our brethren of Mexico and South America are bravely contending for their liberties, it must be gratifying to the people of the United States to receive an account of their progress.

The Spanish government having prohibited the entry of foreigners into those important regions, for the space of three centuries; we have only heard of their existence by the fame of their mines: But the spell is at an end, the veil is rent asunder, and the magnificent theatre of the New World begins to unfold itself in all its grandeur.

Mexico and South America have, from the conquest, been divided in several grand sections, denominated by the Spaniards vice-royalties, or captain-generalships. The vice-royalties are, Mexico, New Granada, Rio de la Plata, and Peru: The capital, or seats of government are, Mexico, Santa Fe de Bogota, Buenos Ayres, and Lima. The captain-generalships are, Guatemala, Venezuela, Chili, &c.

VICE-ROYALTY OF MEXICO.

The importance of this part of America, has been better known since the travels of the celebrated baron de Humboldt were published in Paris. "I consider," says he, "as extremely probable, that the population of Mexico in 1808, exceeds 6,500,000." It is to be observed that Humboldt was deceived by the Spanish authorities, as the policy of their cabinet constantly has been to conceal the importance of that extensive country. We know that the attempts of the famous count de Ravillagegedo failed during the administration of his paternal government, probably in compliance with orders from the king. Ravillagegedo was an American, and Mexico is indebted to his zeal and patriotism in many respects. Many of the most intelligent natives compute the population of the vice-royalty of Mexico at 9,000,000 of inhabitants, of which the city of Mexico alone contains 200,000.

The spirit of independence was, from the beginning of the revolution, counteracted by the violence of party animosities. The failure of Hidalgo is attributed to several causes; disaffection, want of system and order; yet his downfall was chiefly ascribable to Vegenas' perfidy. The patriotism and example of Hidalgo has inflamed the breasts of his countrymen, more especially the Mexican clergy, as he was himself a priest. The events of late years have tended to enlighten the independent government of Mexico on the subject of its future operations, towards the establishment of a free and enlightened system of polity. Order has thus succeeded confusion and anarchy. A paternal government is established at Valladolid, composed of three branches. We have seen a part of the address of the Mexican congress to the people. It is a masterly piece of eloquence, of sound principles, of true love of country and liberty. The independent army of Mexico, may be estimated at 70,000 regular troops and militia, and they have the happiest prospects of complete success. Where is the republican that does not sigh for the emancipation of Mexico? Who that is free, will deny the blessing to his brother, or be indifferent of his struggles to win it of tyranny? Who is there in the United States, merchant or manufacturer, planter or artisan, that would not be benefitted by the liberation of this great empire from Spain, and in its exaltation to the rank of a sovereign and independent state? The advancement of republican principles, as well as of the commercial interests of our country, are alike engaged on the side of the patriots of Spanish America, whose success would open a source of trade to us more important than any we have with the old world. In the present state of nations, policy, perhaps, may require the government of the United States to be neutral on this great question, but it is impossible to divest the people of their wishes for the prosperity of the patriots.

VICE-ROYALTY OF NEW GRANADA.

This great section of South America is most advantageously situated. Placed at the head of this extensive peninsula, possessing sea ports both on the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, nature has rendered New Granada one of the finest and richest countries in the new world. The communication on both seas is strengthened by the strong holds of Guayaquil and Carthagenia; both harbors capable of giving an asylum to all the navies of Europe. Carthagenia is as well fortified as Cadiz.

For the information of your readers, I give the following comparative statistical table of that country, with the United States, at the commencement of their political existence:

Comparative table of the population, extent, commerce and coinage of the United States of America and the province of New Granada, at the epoch of the declaration of their independence.

The seat of government of New Granada is now held at the ancient palace of the Spanish viceroys. The provinces are governed by the last acts of the congress; and by this regulation there is in each of the provinces a governor, a lieutenant governor, an assembly, and a tribunal of justice for appeal. All the public functionaries are chosen by the voice of the people, according to the election laws enacted by the provincial legislatures.—The federal government has made a very successful attempt to organize the provincial governments on the same basis. By these means, local prejudices no longer exist, and ample and effective power has been given to the general government; which, by the same law, is composed of three equal branches. The executive council consists of three members, who are chosen for three years, one of whom is annually elected. The legislature is composed of two deputies from each province. The supreme tribunal consists of five judges, and two attorneys general, one of whom officiates in the civil, and the other in the criminal court. The seat of government is at Santa Fe de Bogata.

Foreign Articles.

The exultation of the British over the fallen Napoleon Bonaparte, is disgraceful to the character of their country. The lion preys not on dead carcasses. And his transportation to St. Helena is an outrageous stretch of power without law, and abhorrent to every principle of greatness and magnanimity. History will speak of it as a violation of all honorable feeling, and give to infamy the governments that directed the procedure. How different the behavior of France to kings of England expelled from their country! The barbarism of the transaction is strengthened by a knowledge of the fact, (which every act of the allies in France demonstrates) that he was the chosen ruler of the French people. Many people believe that the reports given out of his expected resistance to transportation, are intended to cloak his designed murder; which, indeed, is well supported by the fact that Cockburn is to have charge of him—a man capable of any thing but an honest or honorable action.

Carnot retires to Switzerland. Foreign troops are yet pouring into France. It would appear that some of them may be necessary to protect Louis on the throne; which, certainly, is not interfering with the internal government of France!! The duke of Otranto, by license from the king, has married mademoiselle de Castellane, "of one of the most ancient families of Provence."

The works of art brought to Paris as trophies of the victories of France, from Italy, Prussia, &c. &c. are to be carried back. Bonaparte has been greatly abused for carrying off these articles—why was he more reprehensible for that, than the British for sacking Alexandria, or for taking negro slaves away!!

A shock! The exchange at Vienna fell 12 per cent. on a report that Bonaparte has escaped from Havre!

It is said that the emperor Alexander will attend the coronation of "his brother of Austria" as king of Lombardy—and the latter will, assuredly, return the compliment by seeing him crowned king of Poland. These monarchs have not one particle of that ambition they charged Bonaparte with—no, not one particle! They do not want to add kingdom to kingdom—no, no!

The British are rapidly reducing their naval establishment.

Many arrests have been made in France for "seditious cries." The king himself appears to be assailed with them very frequently—the people coming under his very windows, that he may hear them. The audacity of the factious, says a Paris paper of Aug. 6, increases daily. 30,000 Prussians are coming to Paris. The report that a body of Prussians had been cut off, seems destitute of any foundation. It is understood that 100,000 foreign troops are to remain in France five years—to shew the love of the people for their king!

A Paris paper, of August 5, says, Marshal Brune and his troops have sent in their submission.

The duke of Bassano has obtained leave to reside in Switzerland.

The pope has written to the king of Spain to invite him to re-establish the order of the Jesuits in his kingdom, as a measure necessary for the maintenance of religion, the reformation of manners, and the progress of science.

Many of the generals named in the decree of the king, of the 24th July, it is said have obtained passports to depart from the kingdom.

The exportation of grain and other provisions from France is prohibited.

French funds 60½.

It is rumored that Murat has been arrested at Toulon, with all his treasure.

The Diet of Switzerland have been obliged to take hostile steps against the canton Underwald, in consequence of armaments preparing there by dissatisfied persons.

If the following be a genuine paper, it exhibits a trait of character in Louis that cannot be too highly estimated—but we doubt its authenticity. The following note by the editor of the Democratic Press, shews the manner in which it was received;

"Just as our paper was, yesterday, going to press, we were favored with the very important note of prince Talleyrand, to the ministers of the allied powers. The interesting character of this note and the doubts which are expressed of its authenticity induce us to give it another insertion, and accompany it with a statement of all we know concerning it.

"The note, in French, was received by a respectable merchant of this city, inclosed in a letter from his correspondent at Rochelle, dated 19th August, by the schr. Sally, from Nantz. The gentleman at Rochelle received the note of prince Talleyrand from the prefect of his department, who told him that it had been sent in a circular form to all the prefects in France. At the bottom of the enclosed note is a memorandum to this effect:—"A favorable answer has just been received from the allied powers." This memorandum probably relates to the point of time at which the letter is dated, August 19.

"Other letters received in this city state, that there are 4000 Prussians in Nantz, and the inhabitants have sent all the young ladies out of the city.

Translated for the Democratic Press.

Note delivered by prince Talleyrand to the ministers of the allied powers.

"The conduct of the allied armies will soon reduce my people to the necessity of arming against them, as has been done in Spain. Were I younger I would put myself at their head, but if age and my infirmities prevent me from doing it, I will not at any rate co-operate in the calamities under which I groan, and if I cannot mitigate them, I am determined to ask an asylum of the king of Spain.

"Let those who, even after the capture of the man, against whom alone, they have declared war, continue to treat my people as enemies, and consequently to consider me as such, attempt my liberty if they think proper—they are the masters—I prefer lying in a prison to remaining here a passive spectator of the sufferings of my children."

Homage of respect to Bonaparte. The Plymouth correspondent of a London paper, speaking of the peremptory and precipitate measures for removing Bonaparte, says:

"There certainly appears a considerable degree of haste in this business—not to say harshness. Many reasons are assigned for it. The Plymouth Dock paper says: 'On Sunday, we regret to say, a large portion of spectators, not only took off their hats but cheered him; apparently with the view of soothing his fallen fortunes, and treating him with respect and consideration,' &c.—"His linen, sent ashore, to be washed, has been held in such high esteem, that many individuals have temporarily put on his shirts, waistcoats and neckcloths. Blind infatuation!" Our correspondent, who was alongside the Bellerophon on Sunday last, says, that the sympathy in his favor was astonishing; that he heard no cheering, but that the hats of the men and the handkerchiefs of the ladies, were waving in every direction. Bonaparte himself has observed, that he recognized in the behavior of the myriads in Plymouth Sound, the magnanimity of the British people; who, he said, were, in general, too noble to strike or insult an enemy at their mercy: It is too probable, however, that the respect and consideration in which he was held on board the Bellerophon, and the altogether unexpected but generous treatment which he experienced in Plymouth Sound, has partly produced the precipitate sailing of the Bellerophon from that port.

General Bertrand, his wife, and children, countess Montholon and child, count Lascazes, general Gourgard, nine male and three female domestics, accompanied Bonaparte. Savary and Lallemand were left on board the Bellerophon.

Torbay, August 7. Sailed the Myrmidon, to the westward, with such of Bonaparte's suite as are not to accompany him.

Degradation of France. On the 21st July, it was agreed by the allied and French ministers, that the allied forces should be stationed in certain departments in order to cause the king's authority to be respected, and to render the approvisionnement of the forces less inconvenient to the French nation. The allied commanders are to appoint military governors—but the prefects and sub-prefects of Louis are to continue in authority. The money requisitions on towns are to be discontinued.

The movements of the allied corps, as stated in the Paris papers, shew this arrangement was in execution. The British troops were advancing into the western departments.

A Paris article of August 2, says "the government is much the same to all substantial purposes, as if the king were not among us"—of which there is no doubt.

A Basle paper of July 17, says—Yesterday numerous deserters escaped from Hungenen. The works of the siege go on rapidly; the cannon will soon be planted on them.

The allied troops leave Mont Belliard to advance. The French provinces feel now what it is to support foreign armies at the expence of the country.

The department of the Upper Rhine is to pay within a month a contribution of four millions of francs. The merchants to pay beside 360,000 at the end of the week, and 4,000 for every day's delay. Muhlhausen 100,000 and Colmar 230,000 for requisitions not furnished, with 2,000 of every day's delay.

Extract of a letter dated Paris, 10th August, 1815: "We have been these two days past in the greatest consternation for the life of our sovereign; his majesty having attempted to command the manœuvres of the national guards, at the grand parade on the Carrousel, fatigued himself so much that he was seized by a violent attack of the gout, which proved nearly fatal; his majesty was confessed next day. Public prayers were ordered immediately—the churches were full day and night,—God, in his mercy, has been pleased to restore health to our beloved sovereign, who is now in a fair way of recovery. In consequence of this accident, an order has just been issued to the garrison of Paris for relieving the national guards from this unnecessary show of military parades, which will be replaced by the attendance of the troops of the good allies; the national guards will only attend at a solemn mass every Sunday, so grace be rendered to our pious king—before long, every vestige of the tyrant's institutions will disappear: the holy phial having been destroyed at Rimini during the revolution, the ecclesiastical peers are daily sitting in conclave to consult upon the means of substituting something for the sacred phial, brought by a white pigeon from Heaven; we are waiting most anxiously to know when and where our king will find his home."

From the Gazette de la Cour. PARIS, JULY 27.—We are really at a loss to account for the indirect insults daily offered to our august sovereign, by the Prussian troops; we are informed, upon good authority, that a few days ago, one of the Spanish infantas, charged with a mission extraordinary from his Catholic majesty the King of Spain, presented himself at the gate of the castle of the Thuilleries, and was most insolently refused admittance, by the Prussian commanding officer of the guard; his royal highness was obliged to submit to the degrading necessity of repairing to the quarters of the Prussian commander of the sixth arondissement in which our beloved king resides, to solicit the permission of seeing his august relation; which was not granted to him but with some difficulty. These things cannot be dwelt on with perfect ease, but—adieu for the Bourbons!

Peronne, August 13. A requisition was made on the 22d July, of 800,000 francs, on the department of the Somme, for the service of the troops of the king of the Netherlands. This department having suffered considerably by the passage of 200,000 men, found it impossible to comply with this requisition. The sub-prefect went immediately to Paris, to see the hereditary prince of Orange, to expose the situation of the department; and the prince generously dispensed with the requisition.

Paris, August 3.—We are assured that, according to the measures ordered by the Prussian generals, the French military who remain at Paris without authority, will be exposed to be considered as prisoners of war.

July 29.—News from Vienna add some facts to those which we have already stated, respecting the arch-duchess Maria Louisa and her son. When the news of the abdication of Bonaparte arrived at Schoenbrunn, the persons attached to the court of the arch-duchess, wished to express their joy, but every demonstration of that kind was strictly forbidden by the police. Besides, even before the departure of the emperor for the armies, and the subsequent events, this princess had, it is said, given her father the assurance, that she would never, under any pretext, return to France.

August 6.—The army of the Loire and Suchet's, are no longer composed of any but officers. All the soldiers have deserted to go home.

Workmen were employed in replacing the names of the streets and public places of Paris, which they bore previous to the year 1792.

August 10.—Letters from Amsterdam, state, that the stocks of the United States have advanced considerably.

The king, by special decree, has recognized as part of the national debt, the contracts and expenditures made by Bonaparte during his late usurpation, as a matter of grace and not of obligation.

August 12.—Marshal Ney has been arrested, and conducted to Aurillac.

Marshal Brune, after having quitted Toulon, with passports from M. de Revierre, has been assailed by the people of Avignon. He alighted from his carriage, and took refuge in one of the hotels in the city. The prefect had advised him to prosecute his journey without delay; and having heard that his life was in danger by the populace, he went to rescue him at the peril of his life; and at that moment, the marshal thinking that his door would be forced, shot himself!

August 14.—Orders have been given that marshal Ney be transferred to Paris. It is presumed that he will arrive in four or five days, and that the process against him will commence immediately.

Marshal Macdonald, duke of Tarente, took on the 1st instant, the command of the army of the Loire. It constituted an effective force of 45,000 men.

Versailles, August 1.—We are assured that our prefect has been required by a military authority, not French, to deliver up the registers of the votes in the last instances, in favor of Napoleon Bonaparte and his constitutional act. It is added, that it is only intended to watch strictly the individuals who have given these votes. [These amount to seven. See Vol. VIII. page .]

London, August 7.—There was scarcely any business transacted yesterday on the stock exchange; and we are sorry to find, that the little that was done had the effect of depressing the consols one-eighth per cent. The emigrations to Paris, the daily draughts from this country, the unfavorable state of exchange, the stagnation of trade, and the consequent mercantile embarrassments, all conspire to paralyze speculation, and to keep the funds below par, notwithstanding the temptation to purchase stock, which will at present prices, produce about five and a half per cent interest.

Cardinal Fesch, in passing through Baeg (Ain) officiated there clerically. After divine service some persons conducted him to his residence, crying loudly "Vive l'Empereur!" The Austrian general who commanded in the town, sent for the mayor, upbraided him with not having immediately repressed the cries of sedition, and imposed a fine of 60,000 francs upon the city, to be paid in twenty-four hours by way of punishment.

It is said that generals Excelsmans and Flahaut have established themselves at Effiat, in Auvergne, in a castle capable to a certain degree of defence. They have with them about 800 men, who spread terror through the neighborhood. General Lefebvre Desnouettes has adopted the same course on the estate of M. de la Tremouille, near Cosna. He makes war as a partisan in a neighboring country. The remaining part of the French army, which gained Auvergne, appears on the contrary eager to submit.

August 5.—The residence of the duke of Wellington is at length fixed in Cheshire. A purchase of land is said to have been agreed upon, consisting of about 12,000 acres. The mansion is to be as splendid as 200,000 pounds can make it.

August 8.—The army of the Loire has made a movement which appears to be directed towards the mountains of Auvergne, whither it is preceded by a great part of its material and artillery.

Marshal Suchet was at Roanne on Saturday morning. He had with him about 7 or 8 battalions and artillery proportioned to that number of troops.

The allied troops are making dispositions for a vigorous blockade of Laon and Soissons.

A Russian military government has been organized for Lorraine, and the departments of the Marne and the Seine and the Marne.

General Lecourbe is shut up in Befort—Besancon is yet blockaded.

August 9. Letters of the 6th, as well as Paris Journals of that date, prepare us to expect some violent convulsions in France. The apathy of the allies tended to corroborate rumors that the foreigners were desirous of seeing the country in commotion. The factions rail at the king for bringing the allies into France—the royalists say the factions cause their stay. The French cabinet meets daily. A treaty was formed; but the conduct of the factions cause the allies now to demand new securities. At first they required two fortresses—now two provinces, Alsace and Lorraine.

Government have received official information that Bonaparte has been removed to the Northumberland, and is now on his way to his destination. He has not threatened to destroy himself; but has submitted with apparent fortitude. While shifting from one ship to another, he spoke to admiral Cockburn, with great good humor.

Berlin, July 15. The loss of the Prussian troops in the battles of the 1st and 2d July, under the walls of Paris, amounted to between 2 and 3000 men in killed and wounded.

Roman Catholics. A London paper of August 2, has the following article:

The Gazette of Rome contains the following article: "A letter from M. DELMOTRE, bishop of Casoria, announces, that the Catholic religion makes great progress in the United States of America and in the empire of China. In one year baptism was administered to 10,184 children and 1,677 adults; and 2,674 individuals were preparing themselves to receive it. The number of christians in Tonkin is 60,000."

State of Spain.

A late letter from Gibraltar, says—"Spain is in a most horrible state; the legitimate Ferdinand is completely influenced by the priests and there have been several Auto-de-fes latterly at Madrid. The Spaniards begin to speak freely on the acts of the government, and I think that there is a storm gathering, which may crush the king and his monks."

London, August 2.—Prosecution of the Spanish patriots of Corunna.—Fresh intelligence received yesterday from Spain furnishes additional accounts of the prosecutions of individuals by the Spanish government. Calero, O'Connock and Pardo were all condemned to the galleys, but as they are all absent from Spain, it may be found difficult to carry their sentences into execution. Calero was editor of a newspaper at Corunna, and was charged with a libel against the government. O'Connock was a strong supporter of the constitution, and was formerly a captain in the Spanish navy. Pardo is an eccentric friar of uncommon abilities; he was a great advocate for the constitution, and had long been persecuted by the priesthood.

Tarica is a merchant, and had written in favor of the constitution—he is sentenced to the galleys. Perabeles spoke in favor of the constitution.

Mosquero is a gentleman of fortune—he is fined 400 ducats, and costs.

Peronda, formerly an intendant in New Spain, of great talent, is sentenced to six years confinement to his house, at Pampeluna, is prohibited from using his orders and titles, and is obliged to pay all costs. These gentlemen were charged, as censors of the Press, with having allowed the publication of newspapers in favor of the constitution. Of Messrs. Samaniago, Suarez del Villar, Velonado Pesturia, and Ribera, the three first were acquitted, and the two last sentenced to four years banishment from Corunna.

In the prosecutions against the municipality of Corunna, Bahamonde has been fined 400 ducats, and banished for four years from Corunna.

Salas and Molla banished 4 years from Corruna to pay costs.

Messrs. Galceran, Romen, Pola, Escurdio Gozalez, Diez, all to pay 400 ducats, to lose office and to pay costs. Mosquera is fined 200 ducats, with costs and privation of office. Lopez 100 ducats and costs. Laragoriti costs.

In the cases against the Merchants their fines will stand as, follows:—

Liano	$ 7,000	Yturundo	$ 300
Vega	6,000	Pujana	200
Escurdia	5,000	Bianco	200
Romen	3,000	Puig	1,500
Reguera	2,000	Daton	1,500

Perez	1,200	Abate	1,000
Ehupema	800	Muro	1,000
Villiegas	1,000	Fuertes	500
Valdes	300	Sanchez	500
Garcia	300	Adalid	1,000
Gurrea	2,000

August 3—Private letters of a recent date from Bilbao state that the merchants and proprietors had paid one third of the contribution imposed on that part of the country by the king of Spain, but were so much distressed to accomplish it, that they proposed to send deputies to Madrid, to solicit a release from the payment of the remainder as totally impracticable. The part of Spain is covered with bands of robbers, the remains of the Guerrillas and other troops employed in the late war.

At Cadiz it was understood that another expedition was ordered against the Revolutionists in Spanish America, in which 25,000 troops were to be employed; and that several ships of the line which were at Port Mahon, were to convoy the expedition. The Algerines had required a large sum of money of Spain, threatening hostilities if it was not soon paid. A part of the money was collecting at Cadiz.

¶ We exult in the hope that the great colonies of the American continent are lost to Spain. If the patriots acts upon liberal principles, all the power of the "mother country" will waste itself only to establish their independence. We have the following account of certain resolutions lately entered into by the congress of the "united provinces of Rio del Plata."

1. Declaring all blacks free as soon as they land in the provinces.
2. Declaring all Indians free, and exempting them from tribute.
3. Abolishing the Inquisition.
4. Abolishing torture.
5. Abolishing titles of nobility.
6. Declaring that preferments shall be only according to merit.
7. Allowing the exportation of gold and silver.
8. Establishing a registry of merchants. None but those registered can be consignees. A consignee shall not charge less than four per cent. on sales and two on purchases, on penalty of being struck from the registry.
9. Allowing foreigners to search for ores and mines—to claim such as they may discover—to buy or lease mines, mills, &c. the same as native citizens—to enjoy their own religion. Quicksilver is declared free.

The bishop of Salta has been imprisoned for using his clerical influence against the revolutionists. The division of France into military governments by the allies.

PARIS, JULY 26.

OFFICIAL NOTE.

The ministers have taken into mature consideration the overtures which the ministers of the king have transmitted to them, by his excellency baron Louis, with a view to regulate the conduct of the administration in the countries occupied by the allied armies. They are too deeply sensible of the necessity of adopting the most urgent and the most efficacious measures on this subject, not to enter heartily into the views which have dictated those propositions. They are, therefore, of opinion, that the following arrangements which have been determined upon, will be best calculated to reconcile the wishes of the king, with the situation in which the allied armies will be placed during their stay in France:

1. To prevent the movements resulting from the uncertainty in which the allied armies still are respecting their cantonments, a line of demarcation shall determine the departments which shall be occupied by them, and be especially assigned for their subsistence.

2. These departments shall be divided among the different armies in such a manner, that each of them shall have a district, and consequently that in each department there shall be no troops but what belong to one and the same army.

3. Nevertheless, in the different districts, and in general in all the departments occupied by the allies, one uniform system shall be pursued in all matters which concern the administration and relate to the wants of the armies.

4. The authorities of the king shall be immediately restored in the departments, and the prefects and sub-prefects reinstated in the exercise of their functions.

5. In order to protect these authorities, and to provide with certainty that, on the one hand, whatever relates to the service and the wants of the allied armies, shall be punctually executed, and that, on the other, those armies observe the strictest order, military governors shall be appointed for the departments forming the district of each army; but it shall be only in regard to the service and security of these armies, that the prefects and other public functionaries, shall receive the directions of the military governors of the allied powers.

6. These objects shall be still more particularly determined; but the maintenance of the different armies shall take place on principles which shall be uniformly adopted.

7. An administrative commission has been established at Paris, and shall, as soon as possible, communicate with the commission appointed by the king.

8. Orders have been given that the contributions in money which have been imposed upon several towns and departments shall not be further enforced, and that in future no contribution of this kind shall be demanded. By the single orders of the Intendants of the different armies.

As these arrangements go so far as the allies are permitted for the moment, by a due concern for their own armies, and their military situation, the undersigned flatter themselves, that the king's ministers will perceive in them, the sincere desire which they feel to contribute to the re-establishment of the royal authority, and to the alleviation of the charges of the war, as far as circumstances allow them the possibility.

They have the honor to assure prince Talleyrand of their high consideration.

To his serene highness prince Talleyrand, &c.

CIRCULAR—

War Office, July 31, 1815.

Sir—The prince regent having taken into his most gracious consideration the distinguished gallantry manifested upon all occasions by the officers of the British army, and having more particularly adverted to the conspicuous valor displayed by them in the late glorious victory gained near Waterloo, by the army under the field marshal the duke of Wellington: and his royal highness being desirous of testifying the strong sense entertained by him of their devotion to his majesty's service, I have the honor to acquaint you, that his royal highness has been pleased to order:

First,—That the regulation under which pensions are granted to wounded officers shall be revised, and that the pensions which have been, or may be granted to officers, for the actual loss of eye or limb, or for wounds certified to be equally injurious with the loss of limb, shall not be confined to the amount attached by the scale to the rank which the officer held at the time when he was wounded, but shall progressively increase, according to the rank to which such officer may, from time to time, be promoted; the augmentation with regard to the pensions of such officers, now upon the list, being to take date from the 18th of June, 1815, inclusive.

Secondly,—That every subaltern officer of infantry of the line, who served in the battle of Waterloo, or in any of the actions which immediately preceded it, shall be allowed to count two years service in virtue of that victory, in reckoning his service for increase of pay given to lieutenants of seven years standing; and every such subaltern will therefore be entitled to the additional shilling a day, whenever he shall have served five years as a lieutenant.

And, Thirdly. That this regulation shall be extended to every subaltern of cavalry, and to every ensign of the foot guard, who served in the above mentioned actions; and every subaltern and ensign will therefore be entitled to an additional shilling a day, after five years service as a lieutenant in the cavalry, or as an ensign in the guards.

His royal highness being also desirous of marking his sense of the distinguished bravery displayed by the non-commissioned officers and soldiers of the British forces in the victory of Waterloo, has been most graciously pleased to order, that henceforward every non-commissioned officer, trumpeter, drummer, and private man, who served in the battle of Waterloo, or in any of the actions which immediately preceded it, shall be borne on the muster rolls and pay lists of their respective corps as "Waterloo men;" and that every "Waterloo man," shall be allowed to count two years' service in virtue of that victory, in reckoning his services for increase of pay, or for pension when discharged.

It is, however, to be distinctly understood, that this indulgence is not intended in any other manner to affect the conditions of their original enlistment, or to give them any right to their discharge before the expiration of the period for which they have engaged to serve.

The duke of Wellington has been requested to transmit returns of the subaltern officers to whom these orders may be considered by his grace to apply; together with accurate muster rolls containing the names of all the "Waterloo men" in each corps; such muster rolls being to be preserved in this office as a record honorable to the individuals themselves, and as documents by which they will at any future time, be enabled to establish their claims to the benefits of this regulation.

I have great pleasure in communicating these instances of the prince regent's gracious consideration for the army; and I request that you will be pleased to take the earliest opportunity of announcing the same to the officers and men of the corps under your command.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient humble servant.

CHRONICLE.

Erie, (Pa.) Sept. 13.—Major-general Brown, and suite, land at this place, from the brig Niagara, on Thursday last, and embarked again the next evening. The general is on his way to the eastward; he left Detroit on the 2d instant.

The schr. Diligence, captain Barney, arrived here on Saturday last, in five days from Mackinaw and three days from Detroit. Captain B. states that general Harrison, general McArthur and major Graham, the commissioners appointed to treat with the Indians, had been holding a council with them for some time. There is no doubt but a treaty would be concluded, as the Indians manifested a strong desire to be at peace with the Americans.

To the editor of the Pittsburg Mercury.—DETROIT, Sept. 2.—On the 28th the commissioners met agreeably to adjournment, but the nations expected not having arrived, the council adjourned to the 31st. On that day, commissioners met agreeably to adjournment. There were presents—the Wyandotts, Chippewas, Ottowas, Pottawatimies, Shawanees, Delawares, Miamies and Senecas, as also the Shawnee Prophet, and several other chiefs and warriors of the Sacks and Winnebagoes, just from Malden.

The tomahawk was this day buried between the United States and the above nations, chiefs and warriors, with considerable ceremony, and apparent sincerity, and there is every reason to believe that the object of the treaty will be shortly accomplished.

Nothing material transpired between the 31st of August and the 2d of September. Council adjourned to meet on the 4th instant.

LATE FROM DETROIT, Buffalo, September 12.—We announce to the public the safe arrival of major-general Brown and suite, on Saturday morning last, in the brig Niagara, in 8 days from Detroit. A national salute was fired from the Niagara, on landing of the general.

By this arrival, we learn, that the affairs of the west assume a very pacific aspect. The north-western Indians, among whom appeared the celebrated prophet, brother of Tecumseh, have assembled at Detroit, and have met our commissioners, generals Harrison and McArthur, and Mr. Graham, with a sincere desire of planting the tomahawk; and we have every reason to believe, that ere this, an advantageous treaty of peace has been signed.—We hail this event, in connection with a commercial arrangement with Great Britain, as a happy omen for the future growth and prosperity of the western country. At peace with the natives, the hardy sons of the east will prostrate the towering forests, and make the wilderness of the west 'blossom as the rose.'

The pacification with the indians, will be very advantageous to our western merchants and traders, as the furs and peltries of the extensive country above Detroit, will be principally brought in and bartered at that market; which will certainly enhance their business; in being enabled to make a handsome profit on the return cargoes.

Detroit is now garrisoned by 12 or 1300 men, under the command of general Miller. General Macomb is shortly expected at Detroit, when he will assume command.

Mackinaw is represented as one of the strongest places in the western country; and is now garrisoned by 400 troops, under colonel Chambers.

The troops are represented to be in a fine state of health and discipline.

On the 7th, 280 troops of the new 2d, embarked at Erie for Detroit. During the embarkation, 6 soldiers were drowned.

Washington, Sept. 28.—JOHN GRAHAM, Esq. one of the commissioners appointed to treat with the Northern Indians, arrived in this city on Tuesday, with a treaty signed at Spring Wells, on the 8th inst. by the commissioners and the chiefs of all the tribes with which they were authorized to treat. The treaty is entirely satisfactory, we learn, and stipulates for the faithful performance of all previous treaties.

Boston, Sept. 20.—U. S. 6 per cent. 85 per cent. Treasury notes, 11 per cent. dis. New-York bank notes, 11½ do. Philadelphia do. 16 do. Baltimore do. 17 a 18 do. Bills on London, 1½ per cent. dis.

London, August 11. Lord Brougham has been appointed minister to the United States and was to sail for New-York in the frigate Macedonian [probably Lacedemonian.]

The Spanish dollar is now five shillings and five pence.

Baltimore. As notified, the military and citizens of Baltimore, a great multitude, assembled on the 12th inst. to lay the corner stone of a monument sacred to the memory of the brave men who fell in defence of this city on the 12th and 13th of September last. We have neglected before to notice the proceeding, because we expected an account of it from the committee which superintended it. As that has not appeared, we may just say that it was done with great pomp and solemnity.

Plattsburg. The anniversary of the glorious triumphs of the navy and army at this place, have been celebrated there with great merriment and glee.—A notice of the proceedings hereafter.

Algiers. The treaty made by com. Decatur with Algiers, has been announced in France, it was said officially. The terms of it were said to be, that on our part we give up the ships of war captured, with all prisoners; and that Algiers relinquishes all claim for tribute, gives up all captured American vessels and prisoners, and engages to indemnify us for the expense of the expedition against her.

Extract of a letter from Gibraltar, dated the 1st August, received in New York, by the Flying-Fish, via Norfolk.

"Our saucy squadron is before Tripoli, demanding satisfaction for some aggression committed on some of our people there; and unless atonement is made, Decatur is determined to punish her. The Algerines are peaceable since the thrashing they got from Decatur."

Professor Zimmerman, the author of the work on Solitude, died lately at Brunswick, (Germany) in the 73d year of his age.

Great sale of public lands. According to an official advertisement in the western papers, (observes the National Intelligencer) it appears that all the public lands, (to which the Indian title is extinguished) in that part of the Mississippi territory which lies west of Pearl River, are to be exposed to public sale at Washington, in the Mississippi Territory, on the second Tuesday in next month. This sale, which probably will continue many days, affords an opportunity not to be neglected by those who are desirous to hold lands in that country.

Of the navy. It is a curious remark that of the nineteen vessels that went to Algiers, to settle the affair of tribute with the dey, only two were built, or belonged to the United States before the war.

Connecticut election. The strength of parties in this state, as represented in assembly, is somewhat changed, but still there is a large federal majority. New London county sends 13 republicans and 7 federalists, and 1 neuter member. Southington, "famous in story," elected republicans by 100 of a majority.

Vermont election. Every branch of the government is republican—the majority in the house of representatives is 14 to 20. The nett republican gain is from 14 to 1500 votes.

Maryland election. The election in this state takes place on Monday next. Both parties are sanguine.

Joseph M. Mann is elected governor of the state of Tennessee, in the room of Willie Blount, whose constitutional period of eligibility had expired.

A dreadful gale has been felt at Boston and its vicinity, doing great damage on the land and water. Trees eight or ten feet in girth were cast down, many houses seriously injured, and many vessels sunk at the wharves or otherwise seriously damaged.

Library of the United States.—A CARD—Congress having supplied the loss occasioned by the rude and conflagrating hand of our late enemy, by the purchase of a library, perhaps equal in value, as far as it extends, to any in Europe; and intending, as they no doubt do, to make it the great national repository of literature and science, and in some instances of the arts also, it is desirable, that American authors, engravers and painters who are solicitous to preserve their respective productions as mementos of the taste of the times, would transmit to the library a copy of such work as they may design for the public eye—this will serve not only as a literary history of this now interesting country, but will also tend to exhibit the progress and improvement of the arts. The librarian, as far as his power and means extend, will take due care that such productions, literary or graphic, as may be forwarded to him, shall be properly preserved and advantageously exhibited.

MEXICAN NEWS.

NATCHEZ, AUGUST 16. By a letter received in this city from a gentleman at Natchitoches, certain intelligence is obtained of the successful operations of the Mexican patriots, throughout the whole of the provinces of that extensive country. It is too long to give at large—the following is extracted therefrom:

"A republican officer lately arrived here through the internal provinces; he left Mont el Rey the 29th of June last, but had been a considerable time from the seat of congress. The republicans are again in possession of Guanajuato, since the 3d April, with almost all the country north of Mexico, as far as Sattillo, Durango, and San Louis Potosi; all the coast on the Pacific ocean and adjacent country.

"They have established a regular form of government, and have large funds; nearly all the riches of this immensely rich country are in their possession, and are progressing fast towards effecting their entire independence.

"Arredondo was still in possession of Mont el Rey, but the country near that was much harassed by Pachon, who had lately intercepted and taken a party with 200,000 sheep which the marquis Aguerre was driving from his stock in the internal provinces to Mexico, for the support of that city, under an escort of 700 of Arredondo's best troops, who were all taken or killed.

At Mont el Rey there were about 700 troops (of the Royalists) nearly naked, and at San Antonio the same number, impatient of some change from their misery. This is the whole force of the four eastern provinces, (Arredondo's command); that of the western does not exceed 2,000 scattered from Santa Fee to the Durango, where the commandant, general Bonavia, has his head-quarters. Salcedo is in Mexico.

"This constitutes the whole force north of Mexico, that the (royal) government party can muster, exclusive of the inhabitants, few of whom they can furnish with arms.

"An official packet had been intercepted by Pachon, from Arredondo to the viceroy, stating that without a reinforcement of troops, of money and arms, he would be compelled to abandon his position—he had begun forming of two companies, but could not equip them. The republicans have two divisions of troops near the city of Mexico, in order to intercept communications with the country and cut off their resources. The desertions from that city have been very considerable."

Quakers. We find from three registers of the society of Friends, that as a consequence of their exemplary temperance and steady conduct, half of their children live to 7 years of age; whereas doctor Price tells us, that of the general population of London, half the born live only 2½ years, and also, that among the Friends, 1 in 10 arrive at 30 years of age, but of the general population of London, only 1 in 40. Never did a more powerful argument support the practice of virtue.—Belfast Chronicle.

Died at Rippingale, Eng. aged 16, Ann Hardy, daughter of Thomas and Sarah Hardy, of that place. This young woman had attained the extraordinary height of seven feet two inches! and had attracted much attention at Lincolnshire, having for a considerable time, been publicly exhibited at fairs, &c. as a phenomenon. Her parents are persons of only middling stature.

Steam ships! A project is on foot, at New York, to build a vessel of 350 tons, to be propelled by steam, to serve as a packet between that city and Charleston, S. C. in which it is estimated the passage will be made in four days! Those whose opinions are entitled to the fullest confidence, decidedly believe that the voyage may be made with at least as much safety as in any other vessel.

"Legitimizes!"—The National Advocate says, there is now confined in the state prison of New York, "a grand daughter of George III.; a niece of the prince regent, a daughter of his brother Edward, duke of Kent," who, it appears, "has all the virtues of her ancestry."

Carlisle, August 30. The regiment of riflemen who had been at the garrison in this place for some time, marched from it on Monday last, under the command of colonel W. S. Hamilton, we understand for Prairie du Chien. To the number of men we have seldom witnessed better looking as to health and dress, and in every respect martial.

The price of grain has considerably fallen in England.

The West-Indies appear to be overstocked with all kinds of American produce.

The emigrations to the west from the east continue astonishingly numerous. The next census will present us with some extraordinary facts.

"LAND-WATER" SPOUT.—London, July 18.—A great misfortune befel the town of Langenseibza on the 10th ult. A land-water-spout falling about nine P. M. after several tempests, caused such an inundation in the town and suburbs, that the water rose to the height of several ells. Many houses fell in, and buried the families who inhabited them under their ruins.—The cattle were carried away out of their houses and drowned. About 300 houses are so damaged, that they are in danger of falling, and 1000 acres of land are covered with mud to a great depth. A similar misfortune happened near Prague on the 13th.

Indian Prophet.

Onondaga, August 23.—Died, at Onondaga Castle, one of the chiefs of the Alleghanies, well known through this country as the Indian Prophet.

Those who have been acquainted with the influence which this man's preaching has had upon the conduct of the six nations, (the Oneidas excepted) cannot but look upon his death as a severe dispensation of Divine Providence. We think that a short biographical sketch of this extraordinary man cannot be unacceptable to the public.

During the first fifty years of his life he was remarkable only for his stupidity and beastly drunkenness.—About thirteen years ago, while lighting his pipe, he suddenly fell back upon his bunk, upon which he was then sitting, and continued in a state of insensibility for six or eight hours; his family supposed him dead, had made preparations for laying him out, and while in the act of removing him from his bunk, he revived. His first words were "don't be alarmed, I have seen heaven; call the nation together that I may tell them what I have seen and heard." The nation having assembled at his house he informed them that he had seen four beautiful young men who had been sent from heaven by the Great Spirit, and who thus addressed him:—"The Great Spirit is angry with you, and all the red men, and unless you refrain from drunkenness, lying, stealing, &c. you shall never enter that beatiful place which we will now show you." He stated that he was then conducted by these young men to the gate of heaven, which was opened, but he was not allowed to enter; that it was more beautiful than any thing they could conceive of or he describe; and that the inhabitants appeared to be perfectly happy; that he was suffered to remain there three or four hours and was then re-conducted by the same young men, who, on taking their leave, promised they would visit him early, and commanded him to inform all other Indians what he had seen and heard. He immediately visited the different tribes of Indians in the western part of the states, the Oneidas excepted. They all put the most implicit faith in what he told them, and revered him as a prophet.—The consequence has been, that from a filthy, lazy, drunken set of beings, they have become a cleanly, industrious, sober and happy people. The prophet has continued, as he says, to receive regular annual visits from these heavenly messengers, immediately after which, he, in his turn, visited the different tribes. He was on one of these annual visits at the time of his decease.

It will be proper to observe, that he was called the peace prophet, in contradistinction to the brother of Tecumseh who was called the war prophet.

Kentucky Mummy.

A New-York paper says—There is now in this city a remarkable human mummy; it is thus described in a letter from the Honorable Samuel L. Mitchell, to the Secretary of the American Antiquarian Society.

"It is a human body found in one of the lime stone caverns of Kentucky.—It is a perfect exciccation; all the fluids are dried up. The skin, bones and other firm parts are in a state of entire preservation. In exploring a calcareous chamber in the neighborhood of Glasgow, it was found enwrapped carefully in skins and cloths. The outer envelope of the body is a deer skin; the next covering is a deer skin whose hair had been cut away by a sharp instrument; the next wrapper is of cloth, made of twine, doubled and twisted, but the thread does not appear to have been formed by the wheel, nor the web by the loom. The warp and filling seem to have been crossed and knotted by an operation like that of the fabrics of the North West Coast, and of the Sandwich Islands. The innermost tegument is a mantle of cloth like the preceding, but furnished with large brown feathers, arranged and fastened with great art, so as to be capable of guarding the living wearer from wet and cold. The plumage is distinct and entire. The body is in a squatting posture, with the right arm reaching forward and its hand encircling the right leg. The left arm hangs down with its hand inclined partly under the seat. The individual, who was a male, did not probably exceed the age of fourteen at his death. There is a deep and extensive fracture of the scull near the occipita which probably killed him. The skin has sustained little injury; it is of a dusky color, but the natural hue cannot be decided with exactness from its present appearance. The scalp, with small exceptions, is covered with sorrel or fox hair. The teeth are white and sound. The hands and feet in their shrivelled state are slender and delicate."

The Steam Engine.

From the Louisville (Ky.) Courier. There are a few facts, which ought to be made known, with regard to STEAM ENGINES, by every one who may have any inclination to employ this noble piece of machinery. This knowledge is necessary to enable him to make a safe contract with an engineer, and to avoid imposition: it will also enable those who have engines, to judge of their merit.—A good engineer will never hesitate to bind himself to make his engine perform at least a moderate proportion of work in proportion to the fuel expended, if he receives a good price. An engine is only good or bad, in proportion to the work done by a given portion of fuel.

Engines were first substituted instead of horses, for raising water, driving machinery, &c. Hence it became common to say, that an engine is equal to 10, 20 or 40 horses, according to the work it was able to perform. James Watt, the first and most celebrated improver of the steam engine, being an honest and upright man, as well as one of the most profound philosophers and mathematicians of the age, set the power of a horse at 32,000 lbs. raised one foot high in a minute. This is a power that few horses are able to produce 8 hours in the day, but is the horse power meant as a measure of power in calculating the power of an engine.

This horse power is sufficient to grind and bolt a bushel of wheat per hour. It will drive 100 co-iron spindles with the cards and other preparation machinery.

Four horse power will drive a pair of mill stones four feet diameter, with sufficient force. It will drive a saw-mill with one saw, with sufficient force.

From the foregoing statement, a horse power, as a measure of power among engineers, will be correctly understood.

Five and a half pounds of good pit coal will produce an horse power in a good engine one hour; of course, 82½, or a bushel, will produce a horse power fifteen hours. (See Emporium of Arts, vol. II. p. 32, note.) 1089 lbs. of dry oak, it is said, gives out as much heat as 600 lbs. of coal; a cord of dry oak will weigh from twenty-five to thirty-hundred wt. hence may be estimated equal to 20 bushels of coals—dry wood is much better than green; oak is far from being among the best sort of wood. Captain Gregg, of the steam boat Enterprize, told me that a cord of wood was about equal to 20 bushels of coal—Capt. Ogden, of the Vesuvius, told me about the same. This statement is also confirmed from other sources of information.

A cord of good wood ought to grind and bolt 300 bushels of wheat, or saw 5000 feet of plank, or roll and slit 10,000 lbs. of iron.

Heat will not enter a hot body with the same rapidity that it will a colder one; it also escapes as rapidly through all bodies from under pressure, as water or air does through porous ones; hence, to work steam to a high temperature, causes a great waste of fuel.

The nearer an engine is enveloped in flame, the more powerful it will be, in proportion to the fuel expended, as there is a rapid escape of heat, from every part the fire is not applied to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT TO THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

I transmit to the senate a report from the acting secretary of state, complying with their resolution of the 24th of October last.

JAMES MADISON.

February 28th, 1815.

REPORT.

The undersigned, acting as secretary of state, to whom was referred the resolution of the senate of the 24th October last, requesting the president of the United States to lay before the senate (provided he shall not consider the same improper to be communicated,) the proof of any traffic carried on in the West Indies, by the sale of negroes taken from the United States, by the British forces since the present war, has the honor to state, that such proof was transmitted to the executive by the hon. St. George Tucker, in the form of an affidavit of captain Williams, from which it appeared that he had been a prisoner in the Bahama islands, and that, whilst there, he had been present at the sale of negroes taken from the vicinity of Norfolk and Hampton. This affidavit, voluntarily given, and strengthened and corroborated by a variety of circumstances, was considered at the time, as full proof of the fact, and was transmitted to our ministers at Ghent. When the resolution of the senate was transmitted to this department, application was made to judge Tucker, and subsequently to major Griffin, for the original affidavit, or for an authenticated copy; as neither have yet been received, and as it is deemed improper longer to delay this report, the undersigned begs leave to refer to the accompanying papers, marked 1, 2, 3 and 4, from which the material facts stated in the affidavit may be collected, and the circumstances which have prevented its transmission to this department explained. This subject will be further investigated with a view to place it, in all its circumstances, in the most satisfactory light.

All which is respectfully submitted,

JAMES MONROE.

Department of state, Feb. 28th, 1815.

No. I.

Richmond, November 24th, 1814.

SIR—I do myself the honor to enclose you a letter from my friend, Mr. Cabell, and one from Mr. John Tabb Smith, the magistrate before whom the affidavit was made, a copy of which I transmitted the president. Mr. Cabell has written to major Griffin, to endeavor to procure the original, and if he should fortunately obtain it, I will lose no time in forwarding it to you.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,

ST. G. TUCKER.

John Graham, Esq. department of state, Washington.

No. II.

Copy of a letter from Joseph C. Cabell, Esq. to the hon. St. George Tucker, dated Richmond, November 22, 1814.

MY DEAR SIR—I have received your favor of the 14th inst. embracing an extract from the letter recently written to you by Mr. Graham, of the department of state, on the subject of the resolution of the senate of the United States, of the 24th ult.

I distinctly recollect all the material circumstances in regard to the copy of the affidavit, which you forwarded to the president. About the period that major Thomas Griffin, of York, went on board the British squadron, in Lynnhaven bay, for the purpose of endeavoring to recover his negroes, who had gone off to the enemy, I happened to be in Williamsburg. The destination of the slaves that had been taken or received by the British, was then a subject of curiosity and concern throughout the lower country. I understood that a seafaring man of the name of Williams, who had been a prisoner with the enemy, and had recently arrived at Hampton, had gone in company with major Thomas Griffin, of York, before John Tabb Smith, a respectable magistrate, of the county of Elizabeth city, and had made oath, that while a prisoner in one of the Bahama islands, he had been present at the sale of the negroes that had been carried off from the vicinity of Hampton and Norfolk; that the negroes were sold at a high price, and that a negro carpenter, from Norfolk, was purchased for a thousand dollars. Several gentlemen, of the first respectability, who had conversed with major Griffin, informed me that he spoke of Williams as a man whose appearance entitled him to credit, and that he had, accordingly, published the affidavit in the town of York. Through the medium of Mr. Coke, of Williamsburg, I procured a copy of this paper, which I handed to you, and was forwarded by you to the president. This affidavit was a subject of general conversation about that time. The circumstances under which Williams arrived at Hampton; the manner in which he described the negroes sold in the Bahamas, and particularly the carpenter from Norfolk, and the appearance of entire sincerity in his narrative, left no doubt, I was assured on the mind of either Mr. Smith or major Griffin, that the alleged sale had actually taken place.—I did not see major Griffin, nor did I inquire what he intended to do with the original affidavit of Williams; my conjecture was, that he would send it on to the committee of congress, charged with the business of collecting proofs of the barbarous conduct of the war, by the enemy. As it seems he has not done so, I presume it remains in his possession. I will write immediately to him, with the view of ascertaining whether this be the fact; and if it be, to request the favor of him to enclose me the affidavit. The result of my inquiries of that gentleman shall be made known to you without delay.

In the interim, I remain, most respectfully and sincerely, yours, &c.

JOSEPH C. CABELL.

No. III.

Copy of a letter from John Tabb Smith, Esq. to judge Tucker, dated Hampton, November 21, 1814.

SIR—Your favor I have now before me. Some time in the year 1813, there came before me a captain Williams (I think his name was) in company with major Thomas Griffin, of York, with the affidavit you speak of in your letter, which he swore to before me, and I gave my certificate thereto; I then gave the affidavit to major Griffin, and expected to see it published in one of the Richmond papers, but never heard of it since; but from your letter, I expect the original can be got from major Griffin. But if it is mislaid, I well recollect the substance of the affidavit, and will render you any service in my power. I am, with respect,

JOHN TABB SMITH.

If it can be got from major Griffin, it had better be in the the captain's own words, with my certificate.

J. T. S.

St. George Tucker, Esq.

No. IV.

York, (Virginia) February 16, 1815.

SIR—Your favor of the 6th instant, has been received. I have examined my papers and cannot find the original affidavit of captain Williams, therein alluded to. The copy I gave Mr. Cabell was literally correct; the original has been mislaid, or I fear lost, in the bustle of moving papers from hence so frequently as has been done, to place them from without the reach of the enemy during the war.—I will again examine and endeavor to recover the affidavit, and will forward the same to the department of state as soon as it shall be recovered.

Very respectfully, I am, sir, your obedient servant,

THOS GRIFFIN.

John Graham, Esq. department of state,
Washington.

From the Savannah Republican.

The following is the correspondence which we promised in the Republican of the 23d ult. between admiral Cockburn, and the commissioners on the part of the United States, relative to the restoration of property, according to the first article of the treaty of peace. The reader will plainly perceive the game played off by Cochrane and Cockburn in this affair. We trust and hope, congress will not suffer this affair to pass without investigation.

Sapelo Island, Geo. March 16, 1815.

SIR—We left Darien on Saturday, the 5th inst. and arrived at Dungeness at 4 o'clock on Monday.—As we observed British troops were embarking; and as we believed many slaves and much private property would be sent off with them, we determined to call upon admiral Cockburn immediately, and to present the letters from general Pinckney and yourself, with our letter of authority. On reading general Pinckney's letter, and discovering that instead of a copy of the treaty of peace from the secretary of state's office, the National Intelligencer was enclosed, admiral Cockburn expressed much surprise; and it appeared from his manner that his temper was not a little ruffled by the incident. He totally denied the authority of a treaty so communicated to him. After reminding him that the Intelligencer was the state paper of the United States; that in England, the publication of a treaty in the Gazette would be considered the proper promulgation of it, and the impossibility that there would be of furnishing to every detached squadron that floated upon the sea, any more authentic copy of a treaty of peace than the public papers afforded;—(these were the ideas we brought forward, and this the language, excepting abridged.) Adml. Cockburn still denied our position; but then proposed to us, that we should make a transcript of the treaty, that we should certify it to be a true copy, and should present it to him as such, on the part of general Pinckney and yourself. As forms were no object, we assented to this at once—this difficulty having been gotten over, we thought it proper to enter immediately upon the subject matter of our mission, and requested to know of admiral Cockburn what public property taken at Point Petre or at St. Mary's, remained upon Cumberland Island, in the ships near Dungeness, or in the ships then lying in the sound, of which there were many; some of these ships taken at St. Mary's, and then loaded with property taken at the same place. As we had no instructions as to the extent of the restitution we should demand, and were left to our own judgment on the occasion, we determined to adopt the same rule in regard to private property and to slaves, that we had adopted in regard to public property. We, therefore, demanded, all the slaves and private property of every description taken or received at Cumberland island, and at St. Mary's, or St. Simon's, and which was then on Cumberland island, or laying in the waters contiguous to the same, on board his ships, or which had been there at the ratification of the treaty of peace by the president of the U. States; and in making this demand, we were happy to find that a very great proportion of the public and private property, and almost all the slaves, taken or received since the British forces had been operating in Georgia, came within the limits we had prescribed to our demand. To our enquiry as to public property, and our demand as to private, admiral Cockburn at once replied, he had no public property, that the guns he had removed, the munitions of war he had destroyed; but if they were there, not having been taken at Cumberland Island, which place alone remained in his possession at the ratification of the treaty, they did not come within the operation of the first article of it; that with regard to slaves and other private property, he meant to adopt the same rule: that the property and slaves taken at Cumberland and remaining there at the ratification, would be restored, but what were taken or received from other places, although on Cumberland, or in the ships in the river or sound would not. It will be understood, that we do not here repeat the words, but the substance of what admiral Cockburn said, who appeared during the whole of this conversation a little wary. Having discovered the construction admiral Cockburn was pleased to put upon the treaty, and his manner forbidding a hope of a change of opinion, Mr. Spaulding thought it proper to draw his attention to the ships then laying within a hundred yards of the wharf of Dunginess, on board of which it was known some slaves were, by observing to him that the river was taken possession of at the time that Cumberland was occupied by the British forces; that it was equally in his possession with the soil adjacent on the ratification of the treaty, and would only be restored to the United States at the moment he withdrew his forces from Dunginess; that consequently, under his own rule, the property and slaves on board those ships originally taken at Cumberland, it was expected would partake of the quality of the property and slaves originally found on Cumberland and remaining there. To which admiral Cockburn replied, that wherever the British flag was, there is British territory; and by way of elucidating his position, demanded of Mr. Spalding, whether if he, admiral Cockburn, committed a murder on board one of those ships in time of peace, he believed him amenable to the laws of the United States? "No, sir, said he, "I am amenable to my own government, and to my own sovereign." To this it was replied, he was amenable to his own sovereign as an officer, but he was amenable to the laws of the United States as a man; and it was in turn asked, whether he believed if a murder was committed on board an American ship in the river Thames, the laws of England would not operate upon the murderer—"No, sir." I, too, sir, have studied the laws of England, in my youth, and think they would. "Then, sir, we are at issue; and it is unnecessary to say more." If we are at issue, admiral Cockburn, upon an abstract principle, it is of little importance; will you please to turn over to the first article of the treaty, and we will see if we can agree upon a practical result. This conversation is reported in its very words, that you may be possessed of the admiral's manner of reasoning and mode of thinking, at our arrival, and it was closed by observing, that we should address a note to him, which we hoped he would answer as soon as possible—then took our leave. The next day, the 7th inst. we called upon him and presented a transcript of the treaty, certified by us to be a true copy, which he accepted of. We then handed him the following note:

Sir—We are instructed by general Floyd to call upon you, and are by him authorised to receive from you any public or private property, or any slaves that are or were in your possession at the time of the ratification of the treaty of peace by the president of the United States. The construction put upon this article by us, is, that all private property, and all slaves in your possession, whether on land or on water, at the ratification of the treaty of peace, are to be restored. We place this construction upon the first article of the treaty, because it appears to have originated in the most amicable dispositions of both the American and British commissioners. Amicable on the part of the American commissioners in demanding what might be restored without inconvenience. Amicable on the part of the British commissioners in promising to restore all that could be restored without great inconvenience. For we cannot persuade ourselves, that the restoration of private property or slaves is to be limited to the slaves or property originally taken in the forts or places you occupied; for it must be obvious to you, sir, and it must be obvious to all, that there are no slaves, and that there is but little private property ever taken in forts. The limitation that appears to exist in the first part of the first article of the treaty as to such property as may remain in the forts and places in your possession, is obviously confined to artillery and other public property taken in such forts and places, and which, if once removed, would have required much trouble and much expence to restore. And this conclusion is the more obvious from noticing that in the following part of the same article, archives, records, deeds and papers, which are objects of easy transport, are promised to be restored, into whosever hands they may have fallen, or wheresoever they may have been transferred.

Begging that we may have an answer upon this subject, so deeply interesting to the inhabitants of Georgia, as soon as possible, we remain, sir, respectfully, your very obedient servants, &c.

Which, after having read, he promised to answer the morning following. And here it is proper to observe, that at this meeting, and the very many that followed it, admiral Cockburn was calm and his manner courteous in a high degree. During the evening of this day, we understood admiral sir Alexander Cochrane had arrived, and consequently that we should not receive an answer to our note until there was a conference between the admiral Cockburn and himself. At this delay we felt no regret, as we hoped from him, from many causes not necessary to state, a more liberal construction of the treaty; the weather was so bad that it was the 10th before this communication took place, immediately after which admiral Cockburn transmitted us the following note, in answer to the one we had addressed to him:

Head-quarters, Cumberland Island, 7th March, 1815.

GENTLEMEN—I have had the honor to receive the document which you state yourselves authorised to assure me is a true copy of the treaty of peace that has been concluded between our respective governments, and which you have been instructed to lay before me by generals Pinkney and Floyd.—Accompanying this document, I am likewise honored with your note of this day, informing me of your being authorised to receive from me any public or private property or slaves to be restored by me under the first article of the aforesaid treaty, and explaining to me the construction you are pleased to put upon that article; but I only find in the certified copy you have laid before me, that "all territory, places or possessions taken during the war, or after the signing of the treaty, (excepting only as therein excepted) shall be restored without delay, and without causing any destruction or carrying away any of the artillery or other public property originally captured in the said forts or places, and which shall remain therein upon the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty, or any slaves or other private property."

It becomes, therefore, alone necessary for me to state to you that Cumberland Island being the only place of possession taken from America in this neighborhood, which was retained by me, at the date of the ratification alluded to, I shall, as quickly as possible evacuate it without causing any destruction, and I shall leave on it, or deliver to you, whatever private property or slaves (originally captured here) remained upon the island at the date of the ratification. I have not the slightest reason nor inclination to doubt the amicable disposition you state to have actuated the British and American commissioners in forming this treaty; it appears, however, clear to me, by the expressions they have thought fit to adopt in it, that I am only required and authorised to make the restitution I have above stated, and I must beg to decline venturing an opinion as to whether the treaty is properly worded according to the intentions of the commissioners, but I apprehend had they wished to imply (as you conceive) "that all private property and slaves in my possession, whether on land or water," were to be restored, it might have been so specified without difficulty; and although you observe there are no slaves, and but little private property ever taken in "forts," yet the continuation of the words "or places," may perhaps do away the difficulty which presented itself to you on that point; therefore, gentlemen, in giving up this place in conformity with the treaty you have done me the honor to lay before me, I must beg to be excused from entering into discussions relative to captures made elsewhere on land or water, and which have been removed from the places where captured prior to the exchange of the ratification of the treaty.

I have the honor to be, with much consideration, gentlemen, your most obedient humble servant,

G. COCKBURN, Rear-admiral.

Approved—A. COCHRANE.

To captain Newell, of the United States' sea fencibles, and Thomas Spalding, esq. agents on the part of the U. States for recovering property to be restored according to treaty, &c.

Finding this note was approved of on the margin by sir Alexander Cochrane, and understanding, and even knowing from our own sight, that he had taken his departure from the coast, by the time we had received this note, all attempts at demonstrating the incorrectness of the conclusion drawn by admiral Cockburn from the first article of the treaty, seemed useless, for admiral Cockburn no longer had the power, if he had the inclination, to correct his first opinion; and we presently understood, that even the small return of slaves and property embraced by this construction of the treaty was yielded to with some reluctance by sir Alexander Cochrane: We, therefore, the same evening addressed to admiral Cockburn the note that follows:

"Sir—Your letter of the 7th is before us; and after the desire you have been pleased to express of declining all discussion of your construction of the first article of the treaty of peace between the United States and G. Britain, it only remains for us to call upon you for a list of the property, public or private, and the slaves "originally captured on Cumberland Island," which you have declared your readiness to deliver.

It is our duty to add this further and final remark, that this list will, we presume, include all slaves originally captured on the Island of Cumberland, whether such slaves may have been usually resident on that Island, or having come from other sections of the country, have there first fallen under the dominion of the British arms; and especially that it will include all slaves and other property taken or received, since the ratification of the treaty of peace between our respective governments."

And in the conversation which took place after the delivery of this note, it was agreed that orders would be given to restore to the owners any slaves, that were received in the British camp or ships, after the ratification of the treaty, and in consequence of this understanding, orders were given to restore some slaves so situated by admiral Cockburn, but every means were used by the inferior officers to prevent the due execution of these orders, particularly on board the Regulus, capt. Robert Ramsay, as we were informed, and as captain Newell himself was witness to. It was at the same time indicated to us, the course which would be pursued with the slaves that had repaired to the British camp or British ships from Florida, namely, that they should be sent to Bermuda and there confined in a ship, until the decision of the British administration was taken on their case. We have deemed it proper to communicate this, as not unimportant to our own government, and our own citizens. On the morning of the 11th an answer to our note was received, covering a list of 77 negroes, a few bales of cotton, and a few horses and cattle, which were to be restored, as having been originally taken at Cumberland Island, and having remained there to the ratification of the treaty.

Head-Quarters, Cumberland Island,
the 11th March, 1815.

GENTLEMEN—I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note, of the 10th current; the first part of which, obliges me to beg your reconsideration of my letter of the 7th, as I believe so far from declining therein "all discussion of my construction of the 1st article of the treaty of peace lately concluded between our governments," I have there quoted verbatim the major part of it, and have explicitly stated to you the line of conduct which my construction of the said article called upon me to adopt in giving up the territory possessed by the forces under my orders.

I declined only entering into discussion respecting "capture made elsewhere, and which had been removed from the places where captured prior to the exchange of the ratifications of the peace," such not appearing to come within the specified intention of the aforesaid 1st article of the treaty, and you will perceive, by his signature added to my letter, the commander in chief of his Britannic majesty's forces on the North American station concurs with me in this opinion.

I have herewith the honor to transmit, in compliance with your request, a list of property and slaves that were captured on Cumberland Island, and which appeared to have remained on it at 11 P. M. of the 17th ult. the period at which the ratifications were exchanged.

I have the honor to be, gentlemen, your most obedient humble servant,

G. COCKBURN, Rear Admiral

To captain Newell, Thomas Spalding, Esq. agents for receiving restored territory and property, &c.

In order to place the matter in a proper light, we the same day transmitted the following answer, which closed our joint correspondence with the admiral:

SIR—We have to acknowledge the receipt of your note of the 11th inst. containing a list of slaves and property which had been originally found on Cumberland Island, and which were remaining on the Island, at the ratification of the treaty of peace by the president. Against this construction of the first article of the treaty of peace, we must still protest, and we must still contend, sir, that all the property, and all the slaves, that were on Cumberland Island, or in the rivers or waters adjacent to the same, at the ratification of the treaty, in the spirit of amity in which that article was concluded, should have been restored; and this construction of the first article of the treaty, was the more important to the people of the United States, as a great proportion of the property taken, and a great proportion of the slaves received, were sent from the waters of the United States, or from the Island of Cumberland, as late as between the period of the second and the fifth of March, and no inconsiderable number of slaves have been sent on, board your shipping in the offing, since we had the honor of addressing to you our first note of the 7th inst. But, sir, to have pressed our construction of the treaty, after your letter had been approved by the commander in chief, Sir Alexander Cochrane, and he had retired from the station, would have been something more than useless. We have, then, sir, no alternative, but to refer this affair to our government.

We cannot, however, conclude this correspondence, without acknowledging the pleasure we feel at the facilities which you have afforded to all claimants of slaves to obtain their voluntary return—facilities which we are sensible would have been productive of more effect, had some time been allowed to operate; and we are, sir, very respectfully, your very obedient servants, &c."

And here it is necessary for understanding the last clause of our letter to state what led to it. Mr. Spalding had suggested to admiral Cockburn, after every other means had failed, his giving permission to claimants to go on board his ships in the offing to obtain the voluntary return of their slaves; this he assented to with great willingness—he sent an officer with them, and in the presence of ourselves gave the most positive instructions to the officer to have every facility afforded them. This step produced a return of thirteen slaves—six of captain Wylly's, five of Mr. Couper's, one of major Butler's and one of major Johnstone's and would produced a return of hundreds, if it had not have been for the means employed by the inferior officers to prevent their return. On the morning of the 13th inst. the British flag was struck at Dungeness, and having consulted with the many respectable gentlemen who were with us, as to the necessity of the occasion, we called upon captain Massias for an officer and twenty-five men, to be sent to Dungeness, to prevent as far as possible fugitive slaves still joining the British ships, that were just in the offing, and were to remain so for two or three days. Mr. Spalding then addressed the following letter to admiral Cockburn, and followed captain Newell, who had already taken his departure.

Sir—It is with much regret I have to state, that of the slaves, which you have ordered to be restored as having joined the British forces under your command, after the ratification of the treaty of peace by the president of the United States, several of them now on board the Regulus, captain Ramsay, have not been delivered. These slaves are two of Mr. Armstrong's, January Stubbs and Mary Stubbs, one of the slaves of Mr. Miller, and four of Mr. Copp, which were yesterday directed to be given up. I have to add, that two of the three slaves delivered to Mr. Armstrong, the very night they returned home, made their escape, and will unquestionably attempt to reach your ships.

I must therefore request that any of the above persons, that can be found, or any other slaves that may join your fleet, from the United States, before they quit this station, may be delivered to captain Massias at Point Petre, or to his officer at Dungeness; and I am, sir, respectfully, your very obedient servant,

T. SPALDING.

* Although admiral Cockburn evinced to the commissioners this willingness; yet we have it from the very best authority, he had previously given orders to his officers to lay in the way of claimants every obstacle that would tend to defeat the return of any negroes—this fact is proved by the conduct of the inferior officers to claimants. It is absurd in the highest degree.

Having thus, sir, closed the mission with which we were charged by general Pinkney and yourself, it is important in our opinion that we should observe to you, that at our arrival at Dungeness on the 6th instant, the United States' barge taken at St. Mary's was at the wharf, but was removed that evening; and we also understood most of the cannon taken at Point Petre were removed subsequent to the ratification of the treaty from Cumberland. Five or six hundred negroes brought from St. Simon's as late as the 15th of February, were at Cumberland long after the ratification, and many of them sent off in the night of the day after our arrival. In a conversation with Mr. Spalding it was admitted by admiral Cockburn, that major Kinsman, of the marines, had continued to enter fugitive slaves into colonial and West India regiments, after notice of the ratification of the treaty and until he, admiral Cockburn, had given written orders to the contrary.

Accompanying this letter you will receive a list of such slaves as their masters have returned to us—from Mr. Hamilton, who lost two hundred and twenty odd, and from major Butler, who lost one hundred and thirty; and from others, whom the terror of the times had driven away, we have no return. Nor is it to be wondered at, that a thin population fled before a war which has been conducted in a spirit which this has been since January last; for it carried insurrection as its means, and, like the awful visitations of Providence, ruin has marked its course. But we state, sir, with pleasure, that the unhappy sufferers look with manly firmness to their own government for a reparation of their injuries, and to that government we now beg leave to consign them, with a firm persuasion that they will not be disappointed in their expectations, and we remain, sir, respectfully your most obedient servants,

THOMAS M. NEWELL, } Agents,
THOMAS SPALDING, } &c.

From the Nassau Royal Gazette, April 10.

We have been favored with the copy of a letter written by William Wylly, esquire, his majesty's advocate and procurator-general, to his excellency the governor, in refutation of the charge made by the American government respecting the sale in these islands, of negroes taken from the United States. Although every person in this colony must be perfectly satisfied that the charge is altogether unfounded, yet, as it appears by Mr. Monroe's report to his government, that the subject had been deemed of sufficient importance to be officially communicated to the plenipotentiaries at Ghent, and has otherwise been widely circulated, we consider it right publicly to repeat our firm belief that the accusation, thus brought against the commander in chief and other meritorious officers of his majesty's navy on the American station, and involving in its consequences the inhabitants of this colony, has been fabricated for the double purpose of stigmatizing the British naval character and fanning the flame of discord between the two nations. We might have said only, that it must have proceeded from some erroneous and false information by which the public functionaries of the U. States, have been deceived, did not the remarks of Mr. Monroe, embodied in his report, point directly to a spirit of rancor as dictating the representation—remarks, which we see repeated in the National Intelligencer with increased malevolence, and which, as appearing in that paper, bear the mark of auhority, and shew that the object is not so much to shew proof of the injustice complained of, as to aggravate the imputation and to impress its belief upon the minds of the people of the United States, still heated from recent animosities. It will be observed that the attorney-general has confined himself in a great measure to prize negroes. It is to be wished that he had gone further, because it is the aim of the American government to do so. The true purport of the accusation at the present day, means as much that the desertion of slaves was encouraged, and that they were afterwards betrayed and sold, as that captured negroes were carried away for sale. An accusation equally false and groundless as the other, and equally incredible with all who will give it a moment's reflection, and consider the impracticability of such proceedings under the existing laws, over which the eye of authority is particularly vigilant in all our colonies, but in none more so than this.

We understand that sundry affidavits have been voluntarily and solemnly made, which not only fully corroborate the statement of the attorney-general, but also shews that no American slaves were, at any time, or under any circumstances whatever, introduced and sold in the Bahamas during the late war. If copies of those affidavits can be procured, they shall appear in a future number; in the mean time, the letter above alluded to is published:

"New Providence, May 5th, 1815.

"Your excellency must without doubt, have been surprised at seeing in our last Gazette, copies of the papers which have lately been published under the authority of the government of the United States, upon the subject of the pretended sale of American prize negroes in these islands and although the charge appears upon the face of it to be groundless, your excellency may nevertheless think it right that it should be contradicted.

"I have, as your excellency knows, been his majesty's attorney, advocate and procurator-general of these islands for the last fourteen years, and I was present, perhaps, at every sitting of our prize court during the late American war, so that I have had the very best opportunity to know what has been passing in that court, and take upon myself without any reserve to assert, that not a single negro or person of color, taken from the Americans and brought into these islands, in the course of the war, was either prosecuted, condemned or sold here, and that it was an invariable practice to liberate or exchange them all, whether freemen or slaves.

"An instance occurred in 1803, and another in 1811, in which negroes who were probably born free, were trepanned and smuggled into the colony, by masters of American vessels; the first a man called Robert Sawyer, in the brig Joseph Ross, Jas. Henryham, master, from Washington, in North Carolina; the other a young woman named Catharine Richardson, in the schooner Cynthia, of New York, Charles Johnson, master; both of these were seized, prosecuted, and made free here by sentences of our admiralty court, under the authority of the act of parliament for the abolition of the slave trade, and I took the liberty to write letters giving notice of these transactions, both to Mr. Monroe, the American secretary of state, and to the society established at Philadelphia for the abolition of slavery.

"I have the honor to be, with great consideration, sir, your excellency's faithful, humble servant, (Signed) WM. WYLLY.

His excellency Charles Cameron, Esq. &c. &c.

The following letter on the same subject was addressed to Mr. Monroe, in March last. Whether he condescended to answer it, we have not yet heard; it has not been published:

8th March, 1815.*

SIR—In a London newspaper, the Times, of the 21st of November last, I observe in the close of a letter from you addressed to the American commissioners at Ghent, dated the 28th January, 1814, the following paragraph, which alludes to the negroes that had taken refuge on board his Britannic majesty's ships from the shores of the United States:

"It is known that a shameful traffic has been carried on in the West Indies, by the sale of these persons there, by those who profess to be their deliverers. Of this fact, the proof that has reached this department shall be furnished you."

Although at the date of your letter I had not left England, consequently the events there said to have taken place, were previous to my assuming the command on this station. It is a justice I owe to my predecessor and the officers now serving in this fleet, to call upon you for the proofs that you state to have reached your department.

When such accusations are sanctioned by such high authority as the secretary of state of the United States of America, it is to be supposed that he must have been in possession of sufficient information to induce him to give publicity to them. I therefore trust to your furnishing me with the proofs to which you allude; also, such other proofs as you may have to adduce against any person, since the British fleet upon the North American station has been under my command.

I have no hesitation in declaring, that I do not believe any negro, either free or a slave, who had taken refuge on board the fleet under my command, has at any time been sent to the West Indies; the whole were either ordered to the island of Bermuda or to Halifax. I further declare, that none of these persons have been kept in a state of slavery, but suffered to go wherever they thought proper. As the local laws of Bermuda did not permit of their settling there, until opportunities offered of their being sent to Halifax, they and their families were maintained at the public expence, and those who performed any work were regularly paid for the same.

As I am confident you would not have asserted what you did, without you had considered yourself authorised to do so, I cannot doubt of your readiness to acquaint me with the particulars to which your letter related, and the authorities you quote; should you think proper to favor me with these, I pledge myself, either to disprove every part thereof, or to bring the guilty parties to punishment.

If your informants had been acquainted with the regulations that have been established in all the British West India islands since the abolition of the slave trade, they would have known the total impossibility of introducing slaves into any of them in the manner they state; the public authorities could not have permitted the flagrant acts of injustice to have obtained which have been imputed to those who professed to be the deliverers of the negroes upon their quitting the American shores.

I have sent this letter by a ship of war to Hampton Roads, the commander of which has my instructions to wait your answer. I will endeavor to send a duplicate by post; having by a late despatch from England received similar information to that contained in your letter to the commissioners at Ghent (which I presume had been sent to the British government from thence) it makes it of moment that I should be put in possession of all the facts, that the investigation may be proceeded on before the separation of the fleet takes place in consequence of the peace.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

(Signed) ALEXR. COCHRANE.

*The hon. James Monroe, secretary of state,
Sec. Sec. United States of America.*

From the National Intelligencer, June 24, 1815.

When, the other day, we had in hand the subject of the captured slaves, we admitted, because we knew of no fact to the contrary, that slaves captured on the high seas might not be subject to condemnation as property in the British admiralty courts. Since the publication of our remarks on this head, we have been obligingly put in possession, from a source entirely to be relied on, of the following brief narrative; which at once convinces us of our error, and establishes the fact, that slaves have been subjected to condemnation in British prize courts, the authority of Mr. attorney-general Wyllie to the contrary notwithstanding.

In December, 1812, a merchant of Norfolk sent a schooner to the West Indies, on board of which he had five negro slaves, part of the crew. She arrived safely under the guns of the forts of St. Jago de Cuba, when the boats of the British brig Rhodian were suffered to board her without opposition from the Spanish batteries, and carry her to Kingston in Jamaica, where the vessel and cargo, and the slaves, were condemned as prize to the king, and sold as such. The friend, at Kingston, of the merchant of Norfolk, purchased in these slaves, with the view of returning them to him, for the sum of $1650.

A copy of the decree of the court in this case is subjoined. It is conclusive as to the fact of condemnation of captured slaves, and, being from an official source, will, we presume, at once silence those prints here, that have taken the British side of this question. In the following document, we find the authority of the vice-admiralty court and his Britannic majesty's advocate general of Jamaica arrayed against that of his majesty's advocate and procurator-general of Nassau. We have authenticated facts against loose and general assertions. It is proved that slaves captured from us during the war, on the high seas (or rather on neutral territory) have been condemned and sold in the West Indies—and the inference is strong, if not irresistible, that slaves taken from our shores have shared the same fate.

DOCUMENTARY PROOF.

At a court of vice-admiralty held in the town of Saint Jago de la Vega, on Tuesday the thirty-first day of August, 1813, before the honorable Henry John Henchcliffe, esquire, judge and commissary of said court.

Schooner WILHELMINA, ?

Reynolds, master. } Our sovereign lord the King against the schooner Welhelmina and goods and slaves, seized and taken by his majesty's brig Rhodian, John George Boss, esquire, commander, and brought into the harbor of Kingston, in this island of Jamaica, and against Barnard O'Hara and Achilles Auffroy, the claimants thereof.—This cause coming on to be heard on the former proceedings had in the said cause, the time allowed the claimants therein to adduce further proof by the decree of this honorable court, made on the eleventh day of February last, having expired, and no further proof being made, the judge, at petition of Marston, and on motion of his majesty's advocate general, and on reading the allegation and proofs in the said cause pronounced against the said schooner Welhelmina, (whereof David Augustus Reynolds was master) and goods and slaves on board her, to have belonged at the time of the capture and seizure thereof, to enemies of the crown of Great Britain, and, as such or otherwise, subject and liable to confiscation, and by interlocutory decree, condemned the said vessel and cargo as good and lawful prize, taken and seized by his majesty's said brig Rhodian, John George Boss, esquire, commander, and condemned the said slaves as good and lawful prize to our sovereign lord the king Jure Coronæ; and the judge by further interlocutory at the petition of the proctor for the captors, decreed that the said claimants do forthwith bring into the registry the sum of three thousand and ninety-one pounds, currency, being the amount of the stipulation bond entered into by them to answer the adjudication thereof in this honorable court, the said vessel, cargo and slaves having been delivered over to them on bail, pursuant to the decree of this honorable court, pronounced in the said cause on the eleventh day of February last, and thereupon that the said stipulation bond be cancelled.

From the London Courier, of June 2, 1815.

HOUSE OF COMMONS. Mr. Horner referred to a question which he had formerly put to the other side of the house, respecting a charge deliberately brought against this country by the American commissioners at Ghent. He wished to know what degree of credit ought to be attached to the assertion that a British officer had been guilty of seizing and afterwards selling slaves in the West Indies. The American government had, he understood, offered proofs of the transaction, and he should be happy to learn now, what had appeared to color or corroborate them in the course of the negotiation.

Mr. Goulburn said he was perfectly willing to afford explanation, and such an one as he hoped would prove satisfactory to the house. The charge in question was contained in the instructions of the American ministers: and it was evidently of so serious a nature, that it was impossible any hesitation or delay should be evinced in urging the necessary investigation. With this view a demand has been made, that the American commissioners would produce their evidence. This, however, it was replied, was not consistent with their instructions, but that they had no reluctance to submit to him (Mr. Goulburn) as a private individual, the amount of the information they had received. The effect of this was, that a person, a prisoner in one of the harbors of Virginia, had made an affidavit that a vessel had entered that harbor to which a slave had been sold for a given sum of money, which slave had been afterwards re-sold in the West Indies; and that he believed this to be a common practice. As both the name of the deponent and of the vessel were named in the affidavit, he had been directed by lord Bathurst to institute the most accurate enquiry in America, and from the reported purchaser of the slave. The enquiries had not yet been answered, but he earnestly hoped that the season would not expire before the most satisfactory explanation on this delicate business should be received.

Wilmington, Delaware,

AND ITS VICINITY.

The writers of this account of Wilmington, in the state of Delaware, and its vicinity, have for several years thought of publishing something of the nature of the present essay; but were prevented from attending to it by their accustomed occupation, which are adverse to literary pursuits—they, therefore, make no pretensions to any thing but plain narration: and even what they now publish would probably never have existed, but that they were stimulated by the perusal of similar accounts of New-Haven and Pittsburg—and, with the hope that the like influence may induce individuals in all the different towns of the United States, to bring forward materials from whence the future geographer or historian, may select for more valuable and permanent works. They have only to add, that what is done has been done with care, as relates to the matter—the style was a secondary consideration—believing in the propriety of the sentiment, that the “first qualification of a historian is truth.”

The state of Delaware, lying on the west side of the Delaware river, is 100 miles long, the medium breadth 24 miles, and contains (according to Carey) 1,200,000 acres. The population by the census of 1810, was 72,674 persons. Three counties, New-Castle, Kent and Sussex, comprise the whole state. New-Castle, the upper or most northern county, is divided into nine hundreds, and at the aforesaid enumeration, contained 24,429 persons. Christiana, the most populous of these hundreds, had, at the same time, 5,776 inhabitants. It is in this hundred that Wilmington is situated, N. lat. 39, 43, 18, long. 1, 27, 31, with a population of 4,416 persons, exclusive of the adjoining village on the N. E. side of Brandywine creek, which consists of 50 houses and 300 inhabitants, making in the whole about 750 houses and 4,716 persons.

Wilmington lies 2 miles west of the Delaware river, where it is between 2 and 3 miles in breadth. On the south west it is bounded by the Christiana river, and on the N. E. by Brandywine creek, separated at this point a measured mile. Brandywine is 40 miles long, and throughout its whole course is a fine stream and well adapted to water works; as the descent, in 25 miles of its course, is known to amount to 300 feet. Christiana, though a larger water opposite the town, is but 20 miles long,* and for one half of its course has a fine tide water; the remaining 10 miles has considerable fall, on which are erected various water works. Both these streams have large and valuable branches, particularly the Christiana, into which White Clay and Red Clay creeks, and their various tributary streams, empty.

Christiana is navigable to Wilmington for ships drawing 14 feet water; to Newport there is 9 feet, and to Christiana bridge, at the head of the navigation, nine miles (by land) from Wilmington, 6 feet. The Brandywine admits of 8 feet water to the mills, where the navigation terminates. The main post-road from the eastern to the southern states crosses the Brandywine on a hanging bridge of 143 feet chord, passes through Wilmington, bends off to the W. and S. W. ranges the northern bank of the Christiana, and continues southwardly. A branch of it crosses Christiana on a bridge of 600 feet long; and and is continued through the peninsula between the Chesapeake and Delaware bays. The last mentioned bridge is built on piles, and has a draw of 30 feet in width, to admit vessels to the towns above. Besides the roads mentioned, three stoned turnpikes leave Wilmington in a west, north west and north direction, and pass into Pennsylvania. By the Christiana is the nearest and most practicable route to the waters of the Chesapeake bay, and it is the stream by which the canal long since contemplated is to connect them with the Delaware.

The site of the town of Wilmington is a gently swelling hill, that rises on the south west from the Christiana, on the north east from the Brandywine, and south east from the junction of those two streams, to 109 feet. On the south west side of this hill the town is principally erected; on the north east is the village of Brandywine, on both sides of the river. The two towns contain about 750 houses, principally brick; 9 places of religious worship, a town house and an academy, in which the learned languages are taught: 21 schools in which at this time are 650 scholars.

At a medium distance of 2 miles from the centre of Wilmington a range of high lands, commencing on the bank of the Delaware east from the town, sweeps round to the south west point, and presents many beautiful, if not elegant prospects; through this range the Skilpot, the Brandywine, Mill creek and Christiana break and change the character of the scenery. Different country residences, at different elevations, from 150 to 250 feet above the tide water, are scattered over those hills, and add beauty to the neighborhood of the town, while they command an extensive and variegated view of those high lands, the interval between them and Wilmington, the town, the courses and junction of the rivers before mentioned, the flat lands through which they pass, the broad expanse of the Delaware and the shores of New Jersey clothed with wood, presenting a horizon as level almost as the ocean, for miles in length.

The first house in Wilmington was erected about a century since. Its charter is dated in 1739. The government of the borough is vested in two burgesses and a council of 13 members.

Having described the town and its immediate vicinity, we shall attempt an account of the country within the circuit of a few miles, noticing the various improvements of which we can obtain correct information.

And first, on the Brandywine, in the immediate vicinity of the town, are 14 mills for grinding grain, of 2 pair stones each, and capable of manufacturing 500,000 bushels per annum; two blacksmiths' shops; one tilt hammer; one considerable establishment for making cotton and woollen machinery; two carding machines; 16 coopers' shops; and about 90 houses of brick, stone or frame, 40 of which are within the borough of Wilmington. N. E. from Wilmington, and two miles from the centre of the town, the Skilpot crosses the post road—on this stream there are two mills for grinding grain.—Proceeding south west, we come to the Brandywine; ascending it from the improvements before mentioned, in half a mile, we meet with a cotton mill of 700 spindles; half a mile further is a paper mill of two vats, and opposite to it is a snuff mill; one fourth of a mile further is a woollen manufactory; beyond this about half a mile, is a large establishment for making cotton and woollen machinery; and at about the same distance above, a cotton mill of 1500 spindles,* and a machine shop; oppo-

*Between these two points the Brandywine has a fall of 40 feet in about one mile, almost unoccupied, and which is capable, if improved with judgsite to these is a large building intended for a cotton mill. Advancing still up the stream, we arrive at a large cotton mill intended for several thousand spindles;† half a mile higher is a large establishment for making gunpowder; and further on, about the same distance, is another for a like purpose; opposite to this last, is a large woollen cloth manufactory. Still going on about a mile, we arrive at a cotton mill of 600 spindles; a grist mill, barley mill and saw mill on the west side, and on the east side a woollen manufactory.

To all these improvements appropriate buildings for the accommodation of the owners and workmen are annexed, several of them in a handsome taste (or style) rendering a walk on the banks peculiarly agreeable to a person disposed to be pleased with a rudely variegated country, progressing in improvement under the hand of industry and intelligence. Of all these improvements, those belonging to the Duponts are most worthy attention; as here a village has grown up within a few years, in consequence of great exertions and the expenditures of much wealth.

As the Brandywine has a fall of upwards of 100 feet in the four and a half miles above where the post road (before mentioned) crosses it, some years since a proposition was made for opening a canal to the top of the hill upon which Wilmington stands. Had this been effected, there would have been fall and power sufficient to have driven 50 mills, each of 1,000 spindles, within the bounds of the borough. But though $30,000 would probably have completed this work, it was not executed, nor can we expect it will be, as the improvements below the intended junction forbid it.

Although the works on the Brandywine already mentioned, include 36 water wheels, there is power of water and fall sufficient remaining for nearly an equal number within five miles of Wilmington.*

On the west side of Brandywine, near Dupont's manufactory, a small stream comes in, that drives a cotton mill of 600 spindles, leaving a fall unoccupied of equal power. Continuing to progress south-westwardly, at one and an half miles from Wilmington, we meet with Mill creek—this stream drives a saw and grist mill. The next in order, 6 miles on the post road, is Red Clay creek, discharging its waters into White Clay creek (each so called from the color of the clay found on their banks) a branch of Christiana. Redclay is a lively stream, passing through a hilly country, abounding in springs and falls of water, and gives power to many establishments for various purposes, viz. 7 mills for grinding grain, 6 saw mills, 2 cotton mills, 1 slitting mill, 1 snuff mill, and 1 woollen manufactory.—

ment, of driving 20,000 cotton spindles; or other machinery, requiring equivalent power.

†Opposite to this building is the foundation of a large woollen manufactory erected by a father for his amiable and agreeable son, who had spent three years in France to acquire a knowledge of the woollen business: but how uncertain are human hopes! a few months after his arrival consigned him to the silent grave, and with him the fond hopes of his parents, and the expectation that his information would become serviceable to his country.

*When we speak of the power of the Brandywine to drive water-works, we mean the average of the whole season. A few years have occurred in the last twenty-five, when the supply of water for two months has been much under this average; but for two thirds of every year the force of this stream is at least double what we have calculated from.

Burrows' Run, a branch of this creek, drives several saw mills and one grist mill

Stanton is a small village 6 miles from Wilmington, on the S. W. post road, situate between White and Redclay creeks. Mill creek, a branch of White Clay, passes through this village, and drives one woollen and two cotton manufactories, two grist mills, an oil and saw mill. White Clay creek succeeds, a powerful stream, crossing the post road 7 miles from Wilmington, and within the county of New Castle; and drives 8 mills for grinding grain, 1 cotton manufactory, 1 paper mill, 2 saw mills and 1 glazing mill.

The village of Christiana, 9 miles from Wilmington, at the head of the tide water of Christiana river, succeeds. This is an important place as a depot for goods transporting east or south, as it offers the shortest land carriage between the bays of Delaware and Chesapeake, of 11 miles only. Christiana river drives 7 mills for grinding grain, and 2 saw mills.

Completing our semi-circle we arrive at New Castle, on the banks of the Delaware, 6 miles from Wilmington. This town contains about 1000 inhabitants; the houses mostly brick, and here the courts for the county are held. The site of the town is a handsome bank of the Delaware, where it is about 3 miles broad; below, the river spreads, bends to the eastward, and is in view for 20 miles. Like Christiana, New Castle is an important place of depot and transport between the east and south. One steam-boat and two packets ply between this town and Philadelphia.

The country over which we have now travelled in our circuit round Wilmington, is generally high, healthy and well peopled. But, except the embanked lands, little of it will be estimated above 2d or 3d quality soil originally, and much of it has once been, and some still is, poor. Industry and intelligence, however, oblige the "churlish soil" to yield tolerable crops of grain and grass, more especially within the borough where the system of manuring has rendered the earth fertile.

It is generally believed (at least by the inhabitants) that Wilmington is a healthy situation; and the fact of their having been found within the borough, (in 1794) 152 persons of and above 60 years of age, when probably the whole population did not exceed 3000 persons, seems to corroborate the opinion. In the note annexed some interesting matter will be found under this head.*

*Wilmington is situated in Christiana hundred, the population of which in 1810, was as follows:

	10 & under.	10 to 16:	16 to 26:	26 to 45:	above 45:	total:
Males	898	397	551	603	397	2,846
Females	838	441	651	597	403	2,930
	1736	838	1202	1200	800	5,776

The children under ten years of age in this statement, are at the rate of 30 per cent of the whole population, or almost one third of the whole; the persons over 45 years are at the rate of 14 per cent. of the whole. Taking the population of Wilmington at 4,416 persons, the number of children of 10 years of age and under, are 1327; add one half of those of 10 and under 16, and we have 1653 children—about two-fifths of whom are schooled, two-fifths are probably two young for that kind of education, and one-fifth not schooled regularly. Three persons now reside in Wilmington, members of the same family, whose ages amount to 240 years.

The number of children at school in this town and at Brandywine, in the year last past (1814) were as follows: 168 girls, in five schools for that sex only; 151 boys in four schools for males; 317 children in eleven schools for the two sexes; and 34 children of color in one school—making a total of 650 children.

The different religious sects in Wilmington live in harmony, knowing that they are not accountable to man for their opinions, and that worship is entirely free. All occasion of difference is taken away, and the Presbyterian and Methodist, the Episcopalian and Quaker, the Baptist and the Catholic, associate together without envy and without fear. Their places of worship are as follows:

Methodist, white	1—colored	2	3
Presbyterians			2
Baptists			2
Friends or Quakers			1
Episcopalians			1

The following societies for civil purposes exist in Wilmington:

A library company, books about 1000 volumes; a humane society for the recovery of persons apparently dead by drowning; a female society for the relief and employment of poor women; a female society for the distribution of soap and clothing; three fire companies, with fire engines, ladders, &c.; one school society for assisting colored and other poor children in their education.

The banking establishments in Wilmington are—

The Bank of Delaware, capital $110,000

The Wilmington and Brandywine Bank, capital 120,000

And a branch of the Farmers' Bank of the state of Delaware, capital unknown

Wilmington is well supplied with every article necessary to comfort, whether foreign or domestic. We have two markets weekly, and the ready communication with Philadelphia and Baltimore, supply all that luxury demands.

The prices at present (5th month, May 1815) in our markets, for food, is about as follows:

	per lb.
Flour, superfine, $4½ per cwt.	cents 4
Indian corn, 70 a 75 cts. per bushel.	1 1-3
Beef	8 a 12
Veal	6 a 8
Mutton	6 a 8
Pork	8 a 12
Butter 15 a 25, cheese 12 a 20 cts.
Potatoes 50 a 75 cts. per bush.

The various mechanical business carried on in Wilmington and at Brandywine are indicated by the following statement of their different establishments: millwrights, 20 hands; coopers, 22 shops; blacksmiths, 8 shops; machine makers for cotton and woollen, 5 shops; millers (when business is active) 23 to 35 hands; shoemakers, 19 masters; taylor, 9 masters; carpenters, 6 do.; carriage makers, 3 shops; wheelwrights, 3 shops; cabinet makers, 6 shops; rope-yards 2; ship-carpenters, 2 yards; saddlers, 3 shops; breweries 2; druggists 4; turners, 2 shops; tanneries, 6; curriers, 4; skinner, 1; printing offices,* 3; book-binders, 5 shops; tinners, 4 shops;—coppersmiths, 1 shop;—hatters, 6 shops;—board-yards, 3; potteries 2; air furnace, 1; watch-makers, 4 shops; silver-smiths 3; pump-makers 1; brass-founder, 1; gunsmith, 1; stocking-weaver, 1; weavers, 6; tallow-chandlers, 3; tobacconists, 3.—Many of the houses in the principal streets of Wilmington are made use of as stores, in which the following articles of American manufactures were to be had last year, as the writer knows by personal enquiry, and it is presumed the quantity and variety has rather increased than diminished, as he was assured that almost every week brought forward some new article.

Andirons of brass and iron, shovels and tongs, brass and iron tops; bed-screws and wood screws, of all descriptions; plane bits and planes of all kinds; screw augurs, axes and hatchets; tutania ladles and spoons, and iron ladles; box coffee mills; bellows, brass and iron pipes; waggon boxes and hollow ware of all kinds; shovels and spades; mill, cross cut and frame saws; girth and straining webbing; spikes, nails, tacks and sprigs of all descriptions; whitened and brass knobs and coach makers ware generally, plated and plain; shoe knives, stirrups and bridle bits, plated and plain; window glass of all kinds; white and red lead; litharge, spirits turpentine; linseed oil; Spanish brown and yellow ochre, ground and dry; painting brushes and other brushes generally; trace, chains and other chains: shoe-maker's hammers; carpenters rules; brass candlesticks; patent lamps; straw knives and window bolts; glass paper; drawing knives; iron squares; frying pans; currying combs; horn combs and whet stones; lamp black; stone jugs; iron and steel shovels (called Devonshire shovels) and ditching shovels; nail and spike gimblets; grid irons, grid-dies and roasting pans; weights of all kinds; house, horse and sheep bells; sad irons; masons trowels and stoves of all kinds; some American files, and may be had in plenty, but their quality not sufficiently ascertained. Although the variety here enumerated is very considerable, new articles are coming forward daily, and it is probable will not be long until we can add locks of all kinds; butt and HL hinges and some other important articles that are yet wanting. Window glass is now made in large quantities by various glass works, bottles and vials of American manufacture are common; flint glass of a beautiful quality and in considerable quantities, is made in Pittsburg and brought to the Atlantic states; oils, of mint, saffrairs, worm and pennyroyal and castor; nitrous and sulphuric acid; all mercurial preparations; rectified spirits; pearl and potash; saffron; gold leaf; magnesia; sal nitre; spice and tincture bottles; sugar of lead; glauber salts; soda; vol. spirits; hartshorn; tartar emetic; teeth brushes; syringes; teeth drawing instruments, &c. of American produce and manufacture, are to be found in our druggists' shops.

By the census of 1810, the county of New Castle contained 24,449 inhabitants. The poor of this county are provided for in a house within the borough of Wilmington, built of stone 120 feet long, 40-feet broad and three stories high; in a healthy and beautiful situation.

The number of paupers for the last 7 years, has averaged 85, and the cost of their maintenance was 4,285$ per annum; or 50$ a year for each pauper.†

*Two of the printers each publish a semi-weekly paper.

†This is something less than 3½ persons to each 1,000 inhabitants. It would have been satisfactory

†The price of tuition varies in our schools with the abilities, reputation and patronage of the tutors; from 10 to 32$ per annum is paid for education alone. In our boarding schools, where there are usually 60 girls, the price of tuition is 156$ per annum. There are a considerable number of children schooled in Wilmington by charity.

For several years past there has been a progressive rise in the price of eatables purchased in our markets. When the war took place, it seemed reasonable to conclude that, as a large proportion of the flour, grain, beef, pork, butter, cheese, &c. &c. which had usually been exported, would be retained in the country, the prices of all those articles would decline, and, indeed, fall very low. On the contrary, the farmers who have attended our markets steadily, have never seen a time when beef, pork, veal, poultry, butter, eggs, cheese, &c. commanded as high prices. It then appears, that the cause is to be looked for in some circumstances not connected with the war, and nothing appears more obviously the occasion of this progressive rise and high prices, than, 1st, the great increase within a few years of nominal money (bank notes); and 2dly, the introduction of sheep so generally into that portion of country that would otherwise have supplied beef and other meats. From the best account the writer could obtain, there were, in the year 1814, in the hands of 21 farmers in the vicinity of Wilmington, 4,300 sheep, viz. 746 merinos, 2,317 of mixed breeds, and 1,239 common. If we take into view all the farmers in a circle of twelve miles round this town, who attend our markets, it is a reasonable supposition that there are at least 6000 sheep within that circle of country, from which the food of the inhabitants of Wilmington is usually drawn; and, perhaps, it will not be unreasonable to suppose, that there are that number beyond those in that space 10 years ago. Now, 6,000 sheep will consume as much food as 1,000 oxen; equivalent to more than half a million of pounds of beef; and, as few of those sheep have been brought into our market, it is presumed, the necessity of a supply of beef has occasioned an increased demand for other kinds of meat—hence a rise of the price in beef from its scarcity, and of pork, veal, mutton, poultry, &c. from the increased consumption. Another cause may, also, with great propriety, be added—the increased number of laborers and workmen; first, to erect the buildings for the different manufactories that have grown up within 10 years; and, secondly, the manufacturers themselves, all of whom were to be fed from the circle of country upon which the town depended. This state of things will probably experience a change from the progressive advancement of agriculture, and the natural high prices to draw in a larger extent of country to participate in those prices. But in the article of fire wood, a great advance has taken place in the last 30 years, and we may expect a continued rise until coal shall be more generally used, or much more economy employed in the consumption of fuel; for, as the number of the inhabitants of our towns increase and manufactures that require fuel are introduced, the woods of the neighborhood diminish and the expense of transportation is increased.

Less than thirty years since, oak fire wood was more readily procured at from 175 to 200 cents per cord than it now is at 600; which exhibits the necessity of increasing economy in the use of it, and the introduction of coal or turf; of which latter article it is said great quantities may be had in New-Jersey nearly opposite to the town. Our coal must come from Virginia, unless discovered within carting distance, of which there is a feeble hope entertained, grounded on reports that specimens have been discovered in various places within 10 to 15 miles.

With respect to the general health of Wilmington and its vicinity, it is expected to introduce some statements and observations which, it is presumed, will be found interesting, and the writer would be gratified had he the means of entering into comparisons with other towns of the United States, as regards health and longevity.—One general remark may be made as regards length of life in America, on which great prejudice, or great error and misinformation appears to exist—the result, perhaps, of the closest speculations of some European system builders:

An European traveller examining into our population, may be surprised, perhaps, to find so few old persons, compared with the countries he has visited; and hence, he may be led to conclude that animal life is deteriorated in the “new world,” “recently emerged from the ocean.” But he ought also to reflect how small was the root a century since from which such a weight of years could arise. For if in 1753, (but 62 years since) the population of all the British colonies in America, amounted to but 600,000 individuals, what good reason could he expect that we should now possess an equivalent proportion of ancient persons for 8 millions of inhabitants that countries in Europe do, whose population has been full, and varied little for two centuries? If we carry our views back full 100 years, we shall, perhaps, find that what is now the United States, did not, at that period, contain more than 300,000 individuals. It is true, that a great number of persons have emigrated to this from foreign countries since that time; but if we admit these emigrants to amount to ten thousand a year, for a century, still it would be improper from these sources to expect as full a proportion of length of life as may with propriety be looked for in countries whose lands have been long cleared, their institutions perfected, and their population full.

to the writers if they could have conveniently obtained the documents necessary to exhibit a statement of the general taxes of the state for seven years, but as that could not be done without more exertion than it was convenient for them to make, they have been obliged to content themselves with the official accounts for 1810 and 1811, which exhibit as follows:

	state tax:	county tax:	poor tax:	road tax:
1810,	12,324 67	18,603 50	11,468 92	11,748 59

Total, $126,302 74

Which is at the rate of 173½ cents to each individual in the state; population at 72,674 persons.

The most distant of the above mentioned establishments from Wilmington does not exceed 9 miles. Their worth, independent of capital employed in the various processes, may be safely estimated at $500,000.

[The editor's thinks this valuation greatly short of what it should be.]

On the subject of the rapid growth and extension of the cotton and woollen business in the United States, we may mention, that a few weeks since persons from various neighborhoods around Wilmington, met at the house of the writer of this note, and, conversing on this matter, they could, from their own personal knowledge, name thirty manufactories for either wool or cotton, within twenty miles. Many of them are small, it is true; but if the business is supported, will be extended.

Intelligent persons have doubted the propriety of introducing large manufacturing establishments into the United States, on account of their moral and physical effects upon the persons employed in them. Leaving this question for abler writers, we shall here only notice the advantages that might arise, in a pecuniary point of view, from bringing into complete operation the whole number of cotton and woollen manufactories we have mentioned. It is well known, that in this country, (generally, it is presumed) children, from their birth until they are of an age to go into apprenticeships (say 14 or 16) render little service to their parents: this is more especially the case in towns. But it is this description of persons who are required in cotton and woollen works, and their wages vary from $1 25 to $2 50 cents per week.

Taking $2 as the average weekly allowance for each person, and reckoning on 19,000 cotton spindles at 20 children to each 1000, will give us, for 45 weeks of the year, $34,200

And for 6 woollen mills, by the same rule, for 120 children, 10,800

One hundred children setting cards, at ten cents per day, for 300 days, is 3,000 which is a large sum for a small district of country, obtained from a class of citizens who have generally yielded little or nothing to the community.

To obviate, in some degree, the disadvantages that a long continuance of children in manufactories is likely to produce, from a want of education and a knowledge of those domestic arts and comforts that seem almost essential to future welfare; besides the liability they are subjected to of a contamination of their morals,—we take the liberty of suggesting the propriety of an interference of legislative authority to oblige the owners of manufacturing establishments to provide a certain portion of literary education for the children they employ, and that no apprenticeship, to the cotton spinning merely, shall exceed four years. To compensate the manufacturer for the expense that would necessarily arise from such a provision, his mill-property might be exempted from taxation, and his workmen from military service.

It is not a little surprising to what importance a business that a few, very few years since, was unknown in this place, has grown up—we mean the machine-making business for woollen and cotton. In the year 1814, the five shops in Wilmington and at Brandywine employed 64 hands—four other shops within a few miles of the town kept 44 hands in employment. The wages of these persons cannot be estimated at less than thirty thousand dollars per annum.

A card making establishment on improved principles was brought into operation in Wilmington in 1814, that employed more than 100 persons, men, women and children.

The streets of Wilmington run parallel and at right angles with each other, their direction nearly N. E. and S. W. and N. W. and S. E.

There still remains within the borough a place of worship erected by the Swedes, who were the first settlers on the Delaware; the date of its erection, as appears by iron figures attached to the wall, is 1698.

Mails for the eastern and southern states close every day in Wilmington; one for the peninsula, between the Delaware and Chesapeake, three times a week, and for other places at other times. Two, and sometimes more stages, pass through the town to and from Philadelphia and Baltimore every day; one comes from and returns into the peninsula thrice a week; one to and from New Castle every day, and four leave the town, six times in the week, for Philadelphia. Three packets belong to the town that trade to Philadelphia, and a steam-boat is running in part of a line of steam-boats and stages from Baltimore, through Elkton, Christiana Bridge and Wilmington, to Philadelphia.

The main post and turnpike road from Philadelphia, westward, crosses the Brandywine, about 25 miles above Wilmington; from that point there is 300 feet of fall to the tide water; this being but about one half the length of the stream and several valuable branches entering into the main river.—From what is already known, it is presumed that not less than 150 water works for various purposes are erected on them.

Wilmington receives a principal part of its water for drinking and culinary purposes by means of pipes from two springs; one within the town and one without the borough. The water is good.

A view from the town-house of Wilmington presents a rich and variegated scene; from east to south the eye ranges over the flat lands and meanderings of the Christiana, Brandywine and Skilpot; the Delaware, enlivened by vessels, and the sombre woods of New Jersey; in every other point the scene is enriched by a perpetual succession of hills and vallies, clumps or bodies of wood, orchards, farm-houses, gentlemen's seats of different character and materials, and at very different elevations.

Though the neighborhood of Wilmington abounds in high lands, in some parts hilly and broken, we have few mineral substances to notice.

The rocks over which our rivers fall at the head of the tide, we believe to be of the hornblende species, of various character; decomposed felt spar, graphic granite and mica, are occasionally met with. But the most valuable material of the mineral kingdom known to abound in this neighborhood, is a very fine clay, much in demand for glass works; and for that purpose is transported every year to New Jersey, the eastern states, and Pittsburgh and its neighborhood, in considerable quantities. The principal bed of this material is in the river Delaware, near New Castle, under tide water. But valuable clays abound on the Christiana, White and Red Clay creek and Brandywine; and which may, at no distant period, furnish a principal ingredient in important manufactures of American porcelain.

The owners of the Brandywine mills have nine sloops of from 40 to 60 tons burthen, that are employed in the business of the mills.

The first mill below the post road on the Brandywine was erected about the year 1759.

The exports from the district of Delaware have for many years been inconsiderable. Heavy losses sustained by our merchants during the wars of the French revolution, and the vicinity of Philadelphia, where commercial business can be carried on with greater facility, may be assigned as the causes why the trade to foreign countries is at so low an ebb.

The exports of this district (and nearly the whole from Wilmington) for the year 1811, was—

Domestic articles	$76,945
Foreign do.	11,678

The tonnage of the district for the year 1810, was 8,192.

ON THE PROBABILITY OF HUMAN LIFE, IN THE MIDDLE STATES, PARTICULARLY AT WILMINGTON IN THE STATE OF DELAWARE, AND ITS VICINITY.

That there are regions where diseases of various appearances and names are more common, or more fatal, than in others, is a fact of which, we presume, there can be very little doubt; yet, it is almost as certain that, on this subject, a great body of prejudice exists. Opinions embraced in youth, especially those in favor of our own country, are eradicated with difficulty; hence we behold, in many writers, the most absurd contradictions, and in travellers unconquerable prepossessions, denouncing large sections of the earth for blemishes that, if they exist at all, are local, and justly applicable to confined districts only: innumerable examples might be adduced, but the most general prejudice, of this nature, is, perhaps, that of the northern, or cold, climates being the pre-eminent residence of health and long life. These erroneous ideas seem to have been early interwoven in the minds of northern Europeans; and the same distempered fancy strongly operates, at present, in many parts of the United States; so that if the truth be made known, if it be declared that as much, or more, good health and longevity prevail to the south of the Hudson as to the north of it, that truth would scarcely be credited; yet such, we doubt not, is the fact.

It would not be difficult to point out some of the causes that have served to create and nourish those prejudices; but the limits prescribed to this essay do not permit a full discussion, in this place. Suffice it to say, that heat is the principle of life and strength (as it may be of destruction) and, that, when unaccompanied with extraneous and poisonous matter, it is seldom found, on any part of our globe, in a degree injurious to the human species: thus we see the Spaniard is a superior being to the Laplander; so is the Carib, the Creek or Cherokee, to the Esquimaux; and it is from these children of nature, on whom the elements have their fullest effect, that our conclusions should be drawn, as to the influence of climate on the body. It is true, that much perfection is often found in cold countries; but it is found because heat is created and maintained by artificial means.

It therefore appears safe to conclude, that in every climate, where man is furnished with sufficient warmth, takes proper exercise, and is supplied with plenty of food that is palatable to him, he may enjoy that degree of health and longevity which is compatible with his nature; though, as before mentioned, there are local properties which, joined to manners, give some districts a decided advantage over others; but that those properties are not marked by the degree of latitude, nor always by the temperature of the air.

How far the favorable requisites are possessed at Wilmington and its vicinity, embraced in the following statements, the diligent enquirer may be enabled to determine. But, it should be premised, for the consideration of the European, especially, that with the same degree of health in the United States as in Europe, there ought not to be at present, near so great a proportion of old persons here as there, where the population has long been nearly stationary. For example, let the age required be eighty years: then, a country which eighty years ago had seven millions of inhabitants, and has about the same number, at present, should now have seven times as many people of eighty years old as are in the United States; because, 80 years ago, there was not here a stock of more than one million (probably not near so many) from which they could be drawn: And such ought to be the disproportion between this and the old settled countries, were it not for two reasons; first, because we have received more emigrants from abroad, who had previously attained mature age; and secondly, as it respects the eastern and middle states, because many of the youth and middle aged remove to the south and west, where, for the same reason, the proportion of old persons is smaller than here. Yet, on the whole, such an old settled country should have, in proportion to their numbers, several times as many octogenaries as we.

In some countries, the long establishment of certain associations, and the official reports of proper officers, render the subject of which we are treating, comparatively, easy; but in this, where, except in cities, no general account is kept; and where, from the nature and variety of our religious institutions, and our emigrating habits, the object is more difficult to obtain than in any other civilized nation, we must, at least for some time, be contented with the few scraps that individual industry may produce.

Twenty years ago, when the borough of Wilmington contained about three thousand inhabitants, an account was taken of the names and ages of such of them as exceeded sixty years old; these were found to be one hundred and fifty-two in number, viz. 74 males and 78 females, and a record has been kept of the decease of such of them whose death has been ascertained, amounting to 112—fifteen removed into distant parts of the country, and we have no account of them; and twenty-five are known to be living. We give the following list and record shewing the lot of each individual in the order recorded, viz.

The first column shews the several ages of those who were living in the year 1794; the second shows the condition, as it respects life, death, or uncertainty; the third shews the ages at which those who are known to have died, departed this life; and the fourth shews the present ages of those who are known to be living.

Some information on this subject, was, in the year 1794, furnished the editor of Carey's edition of Guthrie's Grammar, published about that time in Philadelphia; but, though drawn from the same source as the above list, yet there is some difference between them; whether this difference has arisen from the haste with which that statement was given, being then not completed, or from some misconstruction of the copy, we cannot now determine:—However, the above is the result of considerable time and care; and is believed to be as correct as any thing of the kind can well be.

It may be necessary to mention, that in the foregoing, and all the subsequent statements, no fractional parts of a year is either added or deducted.

It then appears, that in 1794, of a population of 3000 persons, 152 had attained the age of 60 years and upwards; of whom 63 had attained the 70th; of whom 21 had attained the 80th; of whom 12 had attained the 85th; of whom 4 had attained the 90th; of whom one was in the 95th, one in the 99th, and one in the 101st year.

That, of the 112 who are known to have died, 46 attained the 80th year; of whom 26 attained the 85th; of whom 12 attained the 90th; of whom 3 were in the 91st, two in the 92d, one in the 94th, one in the 95th, two in the 96th, one in the 101st, and one in the 103d year.

That fifteen, viz. five in the 61st, one in the 64th, one in the 65th, one in the 66th, one in the 67th, one in the 68th, three in the 70th, one in the 87th, and one in the 91st year, having removed to distant parts of the country, no account has been received of them.

And that, twenty-five are known to be still living, viz. five in the 81st, two in the 82nd, four in the 83d, five in the 84th, two in the 85th, two in the 86th, three in the 88th, and one in the 91st year.

How far this statement may exceed, or fall short of the experience of other places, or parts of the world, we do not, at present, undertake to determine; nor do we know, precisely, the method which calculators, in Europe, have generally followed to ascertain the probability of life in various places on that continent. But in certain publications, we have seen on that subject, there appears something unintelligible when they tell us that in most places in Europe, considerably more than one third of those born, die before they arrive at the age of ten years, and in some places even five-twelfths before they are five; and when the census of every large city, there, shows that in such cities, the deaths always exceed the births, often greatly; we say that it is difficult to comprehend how the chance of life there is as great, at the time of birth, as it is here, where not one-third die in the first ten years; and where even in large cities the births far exceed the deaths. Yet it would appear from a table lately published by "The Pennsylvania co. for insurance on lives, &c." that at the birth of a child in Philadelphia the expectation of long life is rather less there than in some other places named, although the latter are subjected to the great mortality of children already mentioned; and though after passing the middle age, it seems we have a decided advantage. Until these difficulties be removed or explained, we may reasonably suspect some uncertainty in the mode of calculation, or some sinister views in forming the result.

Of the European writers, several have extricated themselves from the shackles of prejudice, when treating of the Americans; among these are Brissot de Warville and Baron de Humboldt, both of them practical and recent travellers; and who, besides these advantages, were, in other respects, as well qualified to judge as those who, without having moved from the closets of their own country, have libelled the men of the western or American continent.

The first named of these writers, in the warmth of his zeal to do justice to the effects of freedom on man, has, indeed, in many instances, bestowed praises too unqualified, both on many persons and things in the United States; yet, generally, his principles are excellent; and we believe his observations are founded on fact and reason when he decides that the people of the United States live longer than those of Europe. The tables of mortality that he collected in the eastern states (where there seems long to have been some attention paid to the subject) and the physical and moral causes advanced, being sufficient to authorise such an opinion.

The paucity of data with which we in this part of the United States, are furnished, does not enable us to give an account of the annual births and burials of the whole population of any district, there being no public record of the kind; nor does it appear that any of the religious congregations of this place (Wilmington) except that of the society of Friends has such record; therefore to that society alone we confined all the instances we shall hereafter particularize.

Whether examples drawn from a particular society should be considered as a standard by which we can form conclusions justly applicable to the whole community, there may be less difference of opinion than in the application; for prepossession seems to exist in almost every thing; some having represented that body of people as longer, and others as shorter lived than their fellow citizens: If however, we may make any inference from the statements already given, and about to be given, it will be in favor of the former opinion; for though, in the year 1794, that society did not form one-sixth of the inhabitants of the Borough, yet of the 152 persons mentioned, 49 were either actual members of that society, or had been educated in their manners; and of the 25 known to be living, 13 are of that character; and though this society forms but a very small speck among the other families of the earth, yet the writer of this essay does not know where he could find among the latter, any example corresponding with, or equal to some of the former, as it relates to general long life enjoyed by the children of the same parents. Hence we rather conclude that the bills of mortality of the society are too favorable for a general rule.

The congregation of the said society resident in Wilmington and its neighborhood consists, at present, of 657 members; of whom 176 are under sixteen and 160 above forty-five years old, of whom sixty-three are above sixty; of whom eight are above eighty. Within the last six years, viz. from 1808 to 1813 inclusive, there have been but eighty-one births, and fifty-one deaths; of the latter twelve are under ten, and four had reached the 80th year and upwards.

The small number of either births, or burials, and also of youths under sixteen, when compared with the general result of population in the United States, may, in part, be attributed to a circumstance that happens, not unfrequently, viz. that of young persons marrying contrary to the established order, in which case they become disunited from membership, at a period the most likely to add to the numbers of the community; but this circumstance, though it must have considerable effect in reducing the number of births, and of youths under sixteen, does not so materially affect the list of deaths, as the disowned members generally return to the society before their decease. Another, and perhaps, the principal cause of so small a proportion of births as one to fifty annually, is to be found in the unusual proportion of those who are beyond the meridian of life; which, in this instance, constitutes nearly one-fourth of the whole, instead of about one ninth, which appears to be the common ratio, and it is presumed that the proportion above sixty is still greater.

The next example, we are possessed of, is also of a pretty general character; embracing persons of various ages, and may, perhaps, serve as a basis for calculation respecting the neighborhood and people from which it is drawn.

In the year 1757 a marriage was celebrated at a meeting of said society, at Goshen in the county of Chester and state of Pennsylvania (fifteen miles north of Wilmington); the instrument was signed by the parties and sixty witnesses, of lawful age, viz. three between 16 and 20; twenty-one between 20 and 30; six between 30 and 40; fifteen between 40 and 50; twelve between 50 and 60, and three above 60 years old. In the 30th year after marriage, the husband, wife and six children (all they ever had) and twenty-nine of the witnesses were living; in that year the husband died. In the 40th year, the widow, all her children and eighteen of the witnesses were living. In the 45th year, the widow, all her children and fifteen of the witnesses were living. In the 55th year, the widow, all her children and eight of the witnesses were living; in that year the widow died; and now in the 57th year, all the said children and six of the witnesses are living.

During the 54* years and upwards, that this worthy matron lived the mistress of a family which, probably, averaged eight or ten persons, no member of it, nor any individual in it died, her husband excepted.

When Brissot de Warville was in the state of Massachusetts in 1794, he noticed a fact which (if correct) is remarkable. He says that in 1765 "a Mr. Temple died at the age of 100, leaving four daughters and four sons, of the following ages, 86, 85, 83, 81, 79, 77, 75, 73," but though such a number of aged sisters and brothers is remarkable, it is still much more strange that a man should have so many children almost as old as himself! Therefore, until further information on the subject be received, the strongest presumption must exist that there is some error in the statement.

Of the cases we have alluded to, as having, within our knowledge, no parallel, we shall mention the following. They do not consist of a list of centurians, but of general exemption from premature death, which, we conceive, should be considered as better evidence of health, than any instance of an individual whose existence may have been protracted to double the usual period of human life: they are drawn from the families of the first, or very early, settlers in Pennsylvania.

Daniel Hoopes and Jane Worrellow were married in the county of Bucks, Pennsylvania, in the year 1696, whence they soon afterwards removed to the county of Chester, near the waters of Chester creek and Brandywine, a few miles northwardly from Wilmington; their children were, Grace, born 1697, died 1721, aged 24 years; Anne, born 1698, died 1704, aged 6; Mary, born 1700, died 1765, aged 65; Hannah, born 1702, died 1750, aged 48; Joshua, born 1704, died 1769, aged 65; Jane, born 1706, died 1789, aged 83; Anne, born 1707, died 1730, aged 23; Daniel, born 1709, died 1790, aged 81; John, born 1711, died 1795, aged 84; Abraham, born 1713, died 1795, aged 82; Thomas, born 1714, died 1803, aged 89; Elizabeth, born 1716, died 1803, aged 87; Stephen, born 1716, died 1762, aged 46; Nathan, born 1718, died 1803, aged 85; Walter, born 1719, died 1720, aged 1; Sarah, born 1720, died 1794, aged 74, and Christian, born 1722, still living, aged 93.

This family of children, though numerous, is not, in that respect, singular, they having been surpassed, numerically, in many instances; but we are not acquainted with any precedent of an equal aggregate longevity in any other family of children born of one marriage; the said aggregate already amounting to one thousand and thirty-five years, and one of the children still living; nor are we acquainted with any other instance where eleven brothers and sisters averaged eighty years; nor of any other example of so many being alive at the same time, as that their ages added together would make six hundred and twenty-two years, as was the fact with respect to those in 1789; nor where seven children were living ninety-nine years after the union of their parents, as was the case with these in 1795.*

To this instance of general and aggregate longevity, one other of the same character, shall be added from the same neighborhood, and occurring nearly at the same time, (viz. commencing about the early part of last century) when, probably, there were not two thousand inhabitants within ten miles around them.

John Cope and Charity, his wife, had eight children, and no more, viz. Hannah, Samuel, Mary, John, Joshua, Nathan, Caleb and Joseph, all of whom were living in 1813, at the average age of eighty years.*

Should this brief essay reach the next generation, it may afford an opportunity to compare, in some degree, the effects of simplicity of manners with those of luxury on the human body. The octogenaries, of whom mention has been made, though nearly all possessed of considerable estates, were brought up in a plain, simple manner, eating the food and wearing the apparel, produced on their fathers' or their own farms. No balls, no theatres, no public spectacles or amusements were frequented by them; their common practice was manual labor; and their pleasures consisted in piety, plenty, health and domestic concerns. At this day, those manners are not entirely extinct, nor do we expect they ever will; but the inroads of luxury have made prodigious alterations, and, no doubt, will make greater. The consumption of whiskey, tea and coffee now forms a striking contrast to former habits, as they relate to aliment; and in many other respects the difference is not less. Labor is dreaded or despised, not only by the giddy youth, but the proud parents also endeavor to screen their children from that salutary medicament. Let us, say they, make one son a lawyer, one a physician, one a merchant or pedlar—any thing, rather than a ploughman or smith; any thing, rather than labor: this disposition seems to be the fashion of the day; the moral and political consequences of which we know must be greatly injurious; as to its physical effects, time may determine. Should future generations continue, or increase, beyond the present time, in what is called luxury, and still furnish, in proportion to the existing population, as great evidence of health and long life, as we have now recorded of the last age, then it may be doubted whether, in that respect, manners have any influence; but if a defalcation should be evident, then let the friends of their country, let parents and legislators exert themselves, by precept and example, to recover the good that has been lost; for, assuredly, the improved state of the land cannot be hurtful, nor will the increased numbers of its inhabitants, if morals, civil liberty and plenty obtain, have any injurious effects on the health and stamina of mankind.

*"To teach mistaken man, these blessings are entailed on temperance, a life of labor, and a mind at ease."

* It is also an extraordinary, though a fortuitous circumstance, that so many children of the same parents should have lived in three centuries; these, in the aggregate, having occupied six years in the 17th; were living through the whole of the 18th, to the amount of 1006 years; and four of them passed into the 19th century, in which they have already, jointly, lived twenty-four years.

London, August 10.—The following particulars respecting the embarkation of Bonaparte on board the Northumberland, have been received from a source entitled to every credit, and we give them to the public as authentic.

The Bellerophon and the Tonnant sailed from the bay of Plymouth on Friday; but we do not imagine that it was to prevent the application for a writ of habeas corpus. The fact is that the concourse of boats were so great, and the danger to which they were exposed (several lives having been lost) that government thought proper to order the Bellerophon to a greater distance. The process, of which so much has been said, was nothing more than an ordinary subpoena from the court of king's bench, procured by some person, who had a cause pending in that court and who amused himself by citing as witnesses Napoleon, Jerome and admiral Villamez. The Northumberland left Portsmouth on Friday also, and on Sunday arrived off Torbay. General Bertrand was the first who came on board the Tonnant, where he dined with lord Keith, and sir Geo. Cockburn. Sir George explained to him his instructions with regard to Bonaparte; one article of which was that his baggage should be examined before it was taken on board the Northumberland. Bertrand warmly protested against sending Bonaparte to St. Helena, when he desired and expected to have lived in peace in England, protected by English laws. Lord Keith and sir George did not enter into a discussion on this point. After dinner, they accompanied Bertrand on board the Bellerophon. Before their arrival, they had taken from Bonaparte his pistols, and all his arms. Those who were not to accompany him, were sent on board the frigate Eurotas. They shewed a great unwillingness to be separated from him. Bonaparte took leave of them individually; Savary and L'Allemand were, however, left on board the Bellerophon.

When lord Keith and sir George Cockburn came on board, Bonaparte was on deck ready to receive them. After the usual salutation, lord Keith addressed himself to Bonaparte, and requested him to say at what hour he proposed to go on board the Northumberland. Bonaparte protested with the greatest vehemence against this act of the British government.

"He had not expected it—he could see no reasonable objection to his residing in England, in tranquillity for the remainder of his days." Lord Keith and sir George Cockburn made no reply. An English officer, who stood near him, observed that if he was not sent to St. Helena, he would be sent to the emperor Alexander. "God keep me from the Russians," replied he, shrugging his shoulders and addressing Bertrand.

"At what hour to-morrow morning, shall I come, general, and accompany you on board the Northumberland?" asked sir George Cockburn. Bonaparte appeared somewhat surprised at hearing himself addressed simply as general, but replied "at 10 o'clock." Bertrand and his lady, Savary, L'Allemand, count Monthon and his lady were near Bonaparte; sir George Cockburn asked them, if they wished any thing before they sailed? Bertrand replied, that he wanted twenty packs of cards, a backgammon board and a set of dominos. Madame Bertrand required some articles of furniture. One of the French officers, nephew of Josephine, complained that they had not kept their word with Bonaparte, who expected to reside in England with his suite. Bonaparte asked lord Keith's opinion; who merely replied, that he must obey the orders he had received from his government. Bonaparte requested a second interview; lord Keith refused, observing that he could give him little satisfaction, inasmuch as his orders were peremptory, and it was impossible to make any change in the sentence which had been announced to him. An officer who stood near observed, "had you remained one hour longer, you would have been taken and sent to Paris." Bonaparte turned his eyes upon the speaker, but made no reply.

Sir George the next morning very early went on board the Bellerophon, to inspect the baggage of Bonaparte. It consisted of two services of plate, some articles of gold, a superb silver toilet set, books, beds, &c. &c. &c. The whole was carried on board the Northumberland at ten o'clock. At half past eleven lord Keith came in the Tonnant's cutter on board the Bellerophon, to receive Bonaparte and those who were to accompany him. Before his arrival, and afterwards, he conversed with captain Maitland and the officers of the Bellerophon. He then went on board the cutter, and again took off his hat to them. Lord Keith received on board the cutter the following persons: Bonaparte; Bertrand, lady and 3 children; the count and countess. Monthon and child; count Lascasses; Gen Gourmand; 9 men and 3 female servants. Savary appeared much to dread the idea of being given up to the French government, after repeating that the honor of England would not suffer him to be sent to France.

At noon the cutter came alongside the Northumberland. Bertrand was the first who went on board; Bonaparte followed him. As soon as he came on deck he said to sir Geo. Cockburn, "I am under your orders." He bowed to lord Lowther and Mr. Littleton who were near the admiral, and said something to which they replied. He asked one of the officers in what corps he served. The officer replied, "In the artillery." "I sprang from that service" (je sors de ce service) Bonaparte briskly replied. After taking leave of the officers who accompanied him from the Bellerophon, he went into the cabin, where besides his principal attendants, were lord Keith, admiral Cockburn, lord Lowther, and the hon. Mr. Littleton. Lord Keith took leave of him and went on board the Tonnant; lord Lowther and Mr. Littleton remained and had a conversation of nearly two hours with him.

The Bellerophon, the Tonnant and the Eurotas returned to Plymouth bay on Tuesday. The Northumberland cruised off that port the whole day, although the wind was favorable. It is supposed that they are waiting the arrival of the Weymouth, which was to bring them supplies the following day.

Marshal Brune—The following are some of the details in relation to the death of Marshal Brune. He arrived on the 2d of Aug at the Avignon at 10 A. M. The new prefect arrived the same day, some hours before, and had alighted for a little while at an inn where the Marshal stopped. Some persons were apprized of the arrival of the Marshal at Avignon and others who had recognized him, formed a circle around his carriage. They suffered him to change horses quietly, the Marshal would perhaps have even set out without accident, had he not wished to wait for some papers, which had been carried to the superior commander of the department. The tumult in the mean time increased; Mr. Brune, uneasy, went to the house of the Prefect, to shew him his passport, signed by the Marquis of Riviere. The Prefect advised him to abscond and promised to send him his papers, they descended together. The Prefect, although he was not yet known to the people in that capacity, came to make himself known to the people, and in the midst of the insulting language which they heaped upon the Marshal to reproach him for his former conduct and his recent transactions in the South, he with difficulty procured an opportunity for the Marshal to pass in his carriage without receiving violence. He thought himself safe; but a moment after, his carriage was stopped upon the ramparts and his life was threatened anew. They assailed his retinue with stones and cut his horses to pieces. The marshal then demanded of the prefect, who came in haste, with the members of the council, permission to enter the city. He was conducted to the post-house. There, the prefect not having an armed force at his disposal, aided by some peaceable citizens, defended the door of this house in person. He employed to appease the anger of the people, prayers, solicitations, promises, threats—nothing availed. Those without demanded the death of the marshal with loud cries. The prefect promised in vain that he would conduct the marshal to prison if they would respect his life; all was useless. A battalion of troops which arrived could not re-establish order; the effervescence was at its height; already they began to break the gates with axes; the vociferations redoubled. For more than four hours the prefect defended the life of the marshal with unheard of courage; the multitude crowded towards the door, before which he stood with all the magistrates, the commandant of the department, some officers of the national guard, and the armed force which they had assembled. Three times they were driven off—thrice they returned in spite of the bayonets and threats which were directed against them. At this moment they heard the discharge of a gun, and persons came to announce that the marshal had killed himself.

Some hours after they wished to carry the body to a Chapel; but it was impossible to restrain the people, who seized it and threw it into the Rhone. [Paris paper.]

ZURICH, AUG. 4.—Count Talleyrand, minister of France, informed the assembly, by a note of the 28th, of the arrival of different persons of the family of Bonaparte, and others implicated in the late revolution in France, in the environs of Geneva. Their stay in Switzerland will produce great inconveniences to the two countries, and his excellency desires that the diet will not grant a residence to these individuals. This note will be communicated to the cantons, who will be requested not to receive those persons whose presence will compromise the confederation.

Many cantons in Switzerland have ordered the arrest of all the persons who have arrived from France, and are suspected of having quitted their country in consequence of the happy revolution which has changed its fate.

Berlin, July 25.—It will be remembered, that marshal Davoust wrote a letter on the 30th of June, to prince Blucher and the duke of Wellington, in which he desired a suspension of hostilities, on the ground that gens. Firmont and Bubna, had already agreed to an armistice. To this letter field marshal prince Blucher returned the following answer:

From my head quarters, July 11.

It is a mistake, that all causes for war are removed between the allied powers and France, because Napoleon has abdicated the throne; he has done this only conditionally in favour of his son, and the resolution of the allied powers excludes from the throne not only Napoleon, but all the members of his family. If general Firmont has thought himself authorised to conclude an armistice with the general opposed to him, that is no reason for us to do the same. We follow up our victory, and God has given us means and the will to do so. Do you, marshal, take care what you do, and do not again plunge a city in ruin; for you know what the enraged soldiers would allow themselves if your capital were taken by storm. Do you wish to bring down upon yourselves the curses of Paris, as you have those of Hamburg. We are resolved to enter Paris, to protect the well disposed against the pillage which they are threatened by the mob. No secure armistice can be concluded except in Paris. You, marshal, will surely not misconceive our situation with respect to your nation.—For the rest, marshal, I must observe that if you wish to negotiate with us, it is strange that you should detain, contrary to the law of nations, our officers who are sent with letters and packets.

According to the usual forms of established civility, I have the honor to call myself, Mr. Marshal, your servant, BLUCHER.

Bourges, Aug. 5.—Marshal McDonald, duke of Tarentum, on the 1st inst. took at this place the command of the Loire. He has published the two following papers.

Order of the day.—The army is informed, that the marshal duke of Tarentum, appointed by the king to succeed his excellency the marshal prince of Eckmuhl, (who has asked and obtained his recall,) has arrived at the head quarters at Bourges.—His excellency to-day takes command of the army. The camp marshal, baron Hulot, appointed chief of the staff, is also arrived and has assumed his functions.

The present organization of the army is provisionally maintained, with the exception of the following modifications: gen. Decambre, chief of the staff of the first corps, receives and transmits orders. Gen. Bertreux commands the 4th corps; and gen. Lefebvre the 3d. The infantry of the guard is commanded by the gen. count Morend, and the cavalry by gen. Guvot. The corps of the left wing is commanded by gen. Ambert.

Signed

MACDONALD.

PROCLAMATION.

Soldiers—I have arrived among you; I feel a pleasure in finding myself among my old companions in arms. The misfortunes brought upon our fair country and the burdens which she bears, can be alleviated by order, discipline, subordination and a free and loyal submission to the king; his heart rent by the calamities which weigh upon his subjects, has need of comfort; he wants to know that his people, who inhabit the banks of the Loire, of the Allier, of the Rhone and of the Cher, do not suffer any thing more than the inconveniences which are inseparable from so great an assemblage of troops.

Soldiers—in occupying myself with your welfare, I ought to diminish at the same time the burden of the military lodgments; I am going to extend the army: carry into your cantonments the ancient spirit of fidelity, of devotion and of attachment for their legitimate sovereigns which distinguished so eminently the French character. Let our arms henceforth be consecrated to the defence of the king and his throne.

In acknowledgement for the hospitality which you receive from your countrymen, offer them your arms in their agricultural labors; you will merit (by this conduct) the kindness of the monarch and the esteem of your fellow citizens.

(Signed)

MACDONALD.

CHRONICLE.

The late storms. Many of the newspapers published in Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut and North Carolina may be said to be filled with accounts of the ravages of late storms felt on the coasts of these states. An attempt at particulars would fill the half of our sheet! The damages are incalculable. The water in many places rose as much as ten feet above its former greatest height, and ships, in many instances, were driven into the midst of the houses and gardens. The entire coast as it were from Boston to New-London, both inclusive, with the shores of Long Island, as well as those of North Carolina, (the last by a storm previous to that on the eastern coast) present thousands of instances of the desolation of the hurricane. Ships wrecked; houses blown down; orchards and forests prostrated; fences torn from their footing, &c. are constantly to be met with. Many houses have been literally blown to pieces! The loss of lives by shipwreck, the falling of chimneys and the power of flood, has been very considerable, and some of the cases are peculiarly affecting. “The verdure of the earth, (says a letter from New-London) the foliage of the trees, and every kind of vegetable, has the appearance of suffering a severe frost.” The storm to the eastward was on the 24th ult. When it was over, the windows of the houses in Salem were found covered with a fine salt, which, it seems, was conveyed from the ocean through the air; and the leaves of the trees, from this cause, as is supposed, are curled and crisped as with a general blast. The same effect has been observed several miles back.

Twenty-six houses were blown to pieces and washed away by the sea at Stonington! The loss at Providence, R. I. and its vicinity, is said to be as much as $5,000,000! The water was 14 feet higher than it had ever been known before—many ships are on the tops of the wharves, or in the streets of the town! The buildings destroyed are estimated at 150! All round the town is to be seen broken buildings and vessels, mingled with cotton, soap, candies, grain, flour and every other article of merchandize you can mention, together with household furniture. Many people have lost all their property—and a number have lost their lives! All the bridges near the town, one of which was very extensive, are swept away. At Newport, also, the storm was severely felt—a whole column of a newspaper is filled with a list of houses, ships, &c. destroyed, and several persons were swept away by the flood. The Boston papers have three columns of matter to describe the effects of the hurricane in that town and its vicinity. It contains a list of 60 or 70 vessels wrecked, sunk or otherwise injured—the whole neighborhood is covered with the ruins of houses, trees, &c. &c. To give an idea of the force of the storm and of the damages suffered at New Bedford, we may mention that about 100 chimnies were thrown down, and seven or eight persons were known to have lost their lives. The windows were covered with salt water, and the trees that remained standing were turned black. Large stores, with their valuable contents, were dashed to pieces and swept away—ships were driven on the wharves and into the streets, and one smaller vessel thrown, bottom upwards, a considerable distance beyond the usual boundaries of the water. At Cape Cod, every vessel there, to the amount of about 20, went ashore. At Fairhaven several houses were swept away, and some vessels driven into the streets—no lives were lost at this place. Newburyport also suffered considerably. The streets were impassable by fallen trees, roofs, &c. The body of the storm seems to have been felt between Boston and New-London, but for considerable distances on both sides beyond them, much damage was done. At Marblehead, 14 vessels went ashore and bilged—one man was killed. At Portsmouth, eight or nine shared the same fate. At Providence the third story of a house, a considerable distance from the usual boundary of the water, was perforated by the bowsprit of the ship Ganges. Many other places have, in like manner, suffered; and the loss is, probably, beyond precedent in the United States. The storm on the coast of North Carolina commenced in the night of the 2d of September, and its ravages were great indeed—but do not appear to have been so extensive as to the eastward. But the coast “is covered with wrecks.” On the 1st of August there was a hail-storm at Salem, which, in 10 minutes, broke upwards of 130,000 panes of glass! At St. Bartholomews the equinox did great damage. We have a list of about thirty American vessels, besides Swedes, Danes, &c. that were driven ashore and totally lost or otherwise damaged. They chiefly belonged to the eastern states—of four Baltimore vessels at that time in the harbor, three rode out the gale, and one went ashore, but was afterwards got off without damage, and has since arrived.

The destruction of meeting houses was exceedingly great, along the eastern coast.

In the midst of this war of elements, the Constitution frigate, emblematical of our political condition,—by the will of Providence, and the care of those who had charge of her, escaped uninjured.

Indian Treaty. A treaty has been concluded between Messrs. Parish and Granger, commissioners on the part of the state of New-York, and the Seneca nation of Indians, and ratified by governor Tompkins, by which a cession is made to the state of the islands in the Niagara river. The consideration is, one thousand dollars already paid, and an annuity of five hundred dollars, annually forever. The ceded islands are thus described in the Buffalo Gazette:

“The islands ceded are, Square Island, opposite the mouth of Conjockety Creek, 3-4th of a mile in length, and a quarter of a mile in breadth, containing some excellent meadow, and but few trees:—Strawberry Island, about a mile below, containing wild meadow, and about the size of Squaw Island: Grand Island, commences three miles below Black Rock, and extends to within a mile of Schlosser, 12 miles long and from 2 to 7 broad, well timbered, level, and said to contain an excellent soil; there is, however, on the island a large cranberry marsh—no improvements of any consequence:—Navy Island, lies partly between the lower end of Grand Island and the British Shore, is supposed to be within the boundary of Upper Canada, because the branch which passes between Grand Island and our shore, united to that which passes between Grand and Navy islands, are superior to the third branch of the river which passes between that island and the Canada shore—the question of territory will doubtless be settled by the commissioners of both governments—this island is about 3-4ths of a mile long and 100 rods broad, and has been somewhat cultivated:—Goat Island, divides the falls of Niagara, 1-2 mile long and some 60 or 80 poles broad, it is rocky and covered with very shaggy timber, and accessible only at a single point. We consider this a good bargain for the people—and if the people would sell such portion of their lands on this frontier, as could be advantageously settled, it would have great effect in opening and improving roads on the Niagara river, and which would also greatly relieve the industrious inhabitants on the frontier, whose means of living have been straitened by the devastations of war."

Maryland election—The general election for members of assembly took place on Monday last. The returns are greatly in favor of the republicans, who have gained eleven members in the house of delegates, and reduced the federal majority to a solitary vote in joint ballot for governor, &c. admitting that much abused Alleghany, (not yet heard from) shall return all federal members; which is very doubtful—and one member from this county will give the republicans a like majority. Last year the federal majority in joint ballot was twenty-three. But let Alleghany return what it may, a large majority of the people of the state will be represented in the house of delegates by a minority of the members—thanks to the rotten-borough-like system by which the delegates are appointed.

Mediterranean squadron—We have several recent arrivals from the Mediterranean, confirmatory of the accounts heretofore received of the treaty with Algiers. The despatch vessel for the United States left the squadron on the 7th of July, and fears are entertained that she is lost. Com. Bainbridge, in the Independence, arrived at Carthage on the 12th of August, and was about to proceed to Tripoli, where Decatur was; to whom, it is said, he had despatched two schooners to order his return home. The frigate captured was restored to the dey to prevent his assassination—but he is to pay all the expenses of the expedition, restore all persons and property captured of us, and withdraw all claims for tribute hereafter!

Ridiculous article. We insert the following from a Halifax paper of September 16, merely because some may have heard of the rumor, and to say it is impossible to be true:

"Decatur in his passage up the Mediterranean, sent his boats into the bay of Gibraltar, and by some means procured 200 British seamen; an account of this being sent by the governor to lord Exmouth, his lordship demanded their restoration, which being refused, he blockaded the American squadron at Carthage!!!!"

Joseph Bonaparte has returned to the vicinity of New York, and taken the seat formerly owned by lord Courtenay, on the banks of the Hudson. It is said he has sent to France for his family.

By a Carthagena paper of July 21, it appears that the "legitimate" army from Spain had arrived at Santa Martha—but the patriots did not appear to fear them. The forces of the republic of Grenada, at Carthagena, is said to be 14,000.

Carthagena had not been attacked on the 17th August, nor was an attack feared. Measures had been adopted to expel the "tyrant's" forces from St. Martha; the "patriots" were coming upon them from the mountains of the interior.

Guyana appears in complete possession of the patriots. The Spanish commander Dato was completely defeated by the patriot chief Saraza, near Calabozo; by which, besides the destruction of their enemies, the republicans obtained upwards of 500 muskets and a great quantity of ammunition.

Extract of a letter, received from an officer at Detroit, dated, 9th Sept. 1815.

If the British have given up the right of search at sea, they have in this quarter commenced it on land. A few days since, several British sailors deserted, and landed about ten miles from this place. Two officers and a boat's crew followed, landed and examined several houses, and at length got one man, and sent him on board—placed sentinels on our highway, one of which fired at a citizen. The citizens flew to arms, arrested the officers and men—but agreed that one officer should be retained until the man taken was returned. The officer is now in our fort. I understand a civil prosecution is brought against him—col. James will not deliver the prisoner taken.—Phil. paper.

The Steam boat Fulton, (says the New-York Columbian) it appears, has now made 134 trips to and from New-Haven, through Long Island Sound, without losing a single passage during the time on account of the weather. One trip was lost by an accident to her boiler; and once or twice, a day has been lost (as in the late gale) by a storm or other circumstances, but made up again in the course of the week. Such regular, swift and long continued sailing is without example on the sea coast: and the great question, whether our sea board can be navigated by steam, a fact which was deemed impossible a few years since, seems conclusively decided in the affirmative.

DIED, on the 11th of April last, in New-Orleans, WILLIAM P. CANBY, midshipman in the navy of the United States, of a wound received in the action of the 14th December last, between the United States' gun-vessels and the British flotilla, near New Orleans. Mr. Canby was born in Norfolk, (Va.) in August, 1796, and originally intended for the profession of the law; but fired with the exploits of our naval heroes, his active spirit, at the dawning of the war, could no longer be confined to the routine of an attorney's office; he burned to emulate the deeds of our hardy sons of Neptune, and obtained an appointment, as midshipman, from commodore Shaw, then in command of the New-Orleans' station, where he served on board different vessels, deserving the esteem of his commanding officers and the love of his associates, until the 14th of December, 1814; when, being in gun-vessel No. 23, under the command of lieutenant McKeever, he, in the unequal contest, received from a grape shot a wound in the head, which, after a series of the most acute sufferings, closed his existence. In him the navy has to regret the loss of an officer whose rising merit promised one of its most brilliant ornaments, his family an affectionate son, and his friends an estimable companion.—[Communicated.]

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

No. 7 OF VOL. IX.]

BALTIMORE, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 14, 1815.

[WHOLE NO. 215.]

Hac olim meminisse juvabit.—VIRGIL.

PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, NO. 29, SOUTH CALVERT-STREET, AT $5 PER ANNUM.

The great abundance of materials that continue to present themselves as proper for insertion in the WEEKLY REGISTER, forbids apprehension that we shall ever want useful or interesting matter to fill our pages, assisted, as the current of things may be, by our own industry.

A gentleman at Washington city has forwarded to the editor several numbers of CORBETT'S REGISTER, from which the articles inserted in this paper are extracted. We are indebted to another gentleman of that city for a review of Clerk's naval tactics, an interesting and very pleasant communication, laid off for our next paper—in which, also, we expect to present an important article on manufactures.

We shall proceed leisurely to give many important state papers that have grown out of the late events in Europe.

FROM CORBETT'S REGISTER, JULY 8, 1815.

TO MR. NILES,

Proprietor of the Weekly Register, published at Baltimore, in the United States of America.

SIR—After thanking you for the numbers of your publication, which you have been so good as to send me, I proceed to the subject of this letter, the object of which is to give to the people of the last remaining republic some information, which they might not be able otherwise to obtain, relative to the effects produced, and likely to be produced, by the recent events in France; information which it is very necessary for you to possess; for, time may not be distant, not nearly so distant as you imagine, when you yourselves will feel some of the consequences of the events to which I allude.

This second fall of Napoleon has caused wonderful joy in England amongst the higher orders, and especially amongst the borough-mongers, who have been now, a second time delivered; or, at least, have obtained a respite a second time. The reaction, which will certainly come, may operate against them. But, in the meanwhile, they get rid of their alarms, which were, a month ago, greater than at any former period.

The boasting here is beyond all conception.—Though the fact is notorious, that the Prussians and the Belgians were fighting on our side against the French; though it is notorious, that we held a vast superiority of numbers and of means of all sorts, we talk here, as if the victory were wholly our own. Two hundred thousand pounds, at the first slap, has been voted to the "great lord," as the Spaniards call him. What did you vote to Mr. JACKSON, who won a more decided and more glorious victory at New-Orleans? Burke, with his pension in his pocket, calls nobility and honors the CHEAP defence of nations; and so they may in countries whose people do not receive money along with the honors. But, this grant of money, enormous as it is, appears to be only a beginning. A proposition has been made to make a grant to the duke of York, as commander in chief of the army, he having, in that capacity, provided the army for the duke of Wellington to fight with. He has been paid a pretty good salary for this, to be sure; but this, it seems, is not enough. It is therefore, now proposed, or, at least has been proposed by a member of parliament, to give him money on account of the success of the army.

You will ask, what takes place in this respect, when we get beaten; as in the case of Plattsburg, Lake Champlain, Lake Erie, New-Orleans, &c. Why, we hold our tongues. We do not talk about the matter, except to praise the valor of our troops for a day or two. Indeed, the country people in England, and a great many of the towns-people, never know any thing of such defeats. The London newspapers, which alone have any very wide circulation, are employed in the spreading of falsehood and the suppressing of truth. The country newspapers, with very few exceptions, are the mere gutters, through which pass a part only of the fifth of the more copious London sewers; but it is, if possible, the worst part. When the news of your grand achievement at New-Orleans arrived, it was at once asserted, that WE had gained a great victory. Details even were published. The same was repeated, with trifling variations, for a week. Thus the country papers had time to play their part. The victory was believed in, from one end of the kingdom to the other. At the end of a fortnight, out slipped the account of the defeat in the middle of a Gazette, stuffed up with advertisements and promotions. We could not accuse the government of not publishing it; but, in fact, the mass of the people never either saw it, or heard of it; and, to this hour, there is not a man in the village, in which I am now sitting writing, who does not believe, that we gave you a hearty beating at New-Orleans. In short, the mass of the people in this country know less of the affairs of the nation than any people that I ever heard of.

At present, however, it would be unreasonable to expect us to show any thing like moderation. Not only do our newspapers approve of the proclamation of Louis XVIII. in which he talks of punishing traitors; but, they are preparing their readers to expect a direct interference, on our part, in the regulating his government, and even in the choosing of his ministers. We are told, in so many words, that we have a right to demand the death of some of the "rebels;" that we have a right to compel the king to adopt a strong government. In the meanwhile others are proposing to strip the city of Paris of statues and other ornaments to bring them to England, to adorn a monument to be erected in memory of the late victory. There seems to be no bounds to the degradation, to which some of our writers wish to reduce the French people and name. Some demand real, solid securities for the future. This, perhaps, means Dunkirk, before which our Duke of York fought a battle once. Calais, perhaps, too. The demolition of the basin of Cherbourg. There is no knowing where we are to stop. You remember the punishment that our pious King RICHARD I. inflicted on his rebel subjects in the garrisons which opposed him after his return from his crusade to the Holy Land? That, as being the most effective mode of preventing the future propagation of rebels, may, perhaps, appear to the borough-monger writers as the mode to be adopted towards the French people upon this occasion.

That there will be bloody vengeance taken now, there is no doubt. The recollection of the battles of Gemappe, Dunkirk, Austerlitz, Marengo, Hulen, Wagram, Eylau, Friedland, Moskwa, Smolensko, the Helder, the capture of Rome, Naples, Turin, Amsterdam, Madrid, Hanover, Moscow, Berlin twice, Vienna twice; in short, the defeats, the humiliations, the shames and the bodily fears of a quarter of a century, and, above all, the exposures of the priests, are now assembling all their force to obtain vengeance. The convention of the Helder, and the convention which gave Maria Louisa to the arms of Napoleon, are now to be avenged. The pope has to get vengeance for his humiliation; and so they have all. But, what are they do? They cannot kill the people of France. All Europe, with more than a million of men in arms and with fifty millions of English money, will replace Louis on the throne of France. But, they cannot remain in France; and, if they do not remain in France, they cannot keep him upon that throne. He is now, as last year, moving along towards the capital under the protection of more than half a million of soldiers, who have made war, and are making war upon Frenchmen, fighting on their own soil, and in its defence. As long as Frenchmen are kept down by the bayonet, he will, of course, remain there; but, how long will that be? He was on the throne last year; but, he was not there six months after the hostile armies had quitted France. To hear him threaten the French, as he did some time ago, with chastisement by foreign armies, 1,200,000 in number of men, was natural enough; but, to hear him now talking of their sorrow at his departure, and of their joy at his return, is calculated to fill one with admiration at the impudence of his advisers. He knew well, that it was under the bayonets of foreigners only that he dared advance; that he, or any of his family, dared show their nose in France; and yet, even while he is following close upon the heels of those foreigners, he boasts of being the object of the love and admiration of the French people! No, no, Louis: you are restored, as you were last year, by foreign bayonets; and the question is yet to be decided, whether those bayonets will be able to keep you on the throne. You have yet a stormy time to pass. The battle between light and liberty, on one side, and darkness and despotism, on the other; that battle, which began in 1789, is still going on. It may rage less fiercely for a time; but, it will not be put an end to unless by the triumph of the former.

As to the conduct of Napoleon, upon the last occasion, it was useless for him any longer to attempt to support his authority as a sovereign; and, indeed, it would have been well, if he had resigned immediately after his return from Elba. This was fully expected by many men in England; and, it appears from his last act that we have heard of, namely, his abdication in favor of his son, that he was only restrained by his foolish attachment to the Austrian and her child! After all his glorious deeds; after all his famous battles; after all his wise acts of legislation; all his magnanimous proceedings; all that he has done in the cause of mankind: after all this, how painful is it to see him vainly hankering after the preserving of a crown to his family! and, which adds to the mortification, to a son which he had by the daughter of a king; and, of an Austrian too! It is melancholy to think of. If it had been the son of some tradesman's daughter! But to risk the freedom and happiness of that gallant nation, who had twice carried him victorious to Berlin and twice to Vienna; to risk the freedom and happiness of this brave people for the sake of the grandson of a king, and that king an Austrian king too, is horrible to think of. If, upon his return from Elba, he had frankly acknowledged his great error; namely, that of connecting himself with the old royal family, and had declared again for a republic in name as well as in substance. If he had done this, and had called for the convention, no power in Europe would have moved against France. But, when men saw, that the emperor was still to remain; that they were again to have an empress to maintain with all her royal progeny; and that they were likely to descend in fee from father to son; when they saw this, they could not possibly feel any portion of the old republican fire warm their hearts. Say what they would, still it was a battle between an emperor and a king.

Then the new nobility. It was impossible to animate a people in their cause. They had suffered under the nobility before. It was difficult to see why a man should risk life or property for the sake of preserving to these gentry their titles. To see these old republicans forming a house of peers, and calling themselves dukes and counts! This was, indeed, no more than a consequence of the imperial part of the plan; but, it could not fail to fill with apprehension all those who wished well to the republican cause, and who recollected that it was under the banners of "liberty and equality," that Brunswick was chased out of France, and that the coalition of kings was covered with disgrace, in the memorable years, 1793, 4 and 5. The truth is, that to defend France against such a coalition all the energy of a republic was necessary in those years; and, it was become now as necessary as ever. But, such energy could not exist under an imperial and aristocratical government. The French people felt no more what they felt in the first years of the revolution. The proprietors were anxious about their land; but that alone was not sufficient.

Nevertheless, in spite of these errors of Napoleon, he is entitled to the gratitude of mankind. He pulled down the Pope, the monks in Spain and Italy, the Inquisition in those countries. He carried light and liberal principles to dark and enslaved nations. He formed a code of wise and just laws; or, at least, he confirmed those which had been passed by the republicans. He was a soldier, too fond of military glory; but, without arms he could not have effected what he did effect in favor of civil and religious liberty in distant countries. Much of what he did will now be undone; but it will be impossible for all the kings and priests in the world, to make men as ignorant and submissive as they were before he marched over the Alps. The enemies of freedom, the black hearted friends of despotism, flatter themselves, that now they shall see mankind as superstitious and as slavish as they were a quarter of a century back. They will be deceived.—They will never again see a touch of the 'holy thorn' sought after in France as a cure for a cancer. The present race of perverse old women cannot live forever, and they will have no successors. The young ones do not, and will not, believe, that holy water will preserve them from thunder and lightning; and, unless they believe this, there is no fear of their husbands becoming slaves. The common people in England believe in an almanac, called 'Moore's Almanac'; they believe, that the cunning people who publish it, have a foreknowledge of events of all sorts, and especially the weather. Many of the farmers refer to this almanac to know when they ought to cut their grass or to spey their pigs. You will hardly believe this, in America; but I, in the face of my countrymen, assert it to be a fact. The men who sell this book find their accounts in it. It is sold by the company of stationers, who serve our rabble, in this respect, in the stead of priests. The people of France are far more enlightened. The pairings of St. Andrew's nails, which used to be a most precious relic, would now be used only as manure in that country. The breeches of Pocomo, so wonder-working in former times, would now fetch only their worth as old rags. Napoleon (and that was his greatest fault) gave, in some sort, a sanction to falsehood and hypocrisy, and imposture, by going to mass. He did not, indeed, compel any body else to go to mass; but his example in this was of evil tendency. The act was, besides, a compromise with fraud.

Still the world owes him much, and particularly for having, by his return to France, left no doubt in the mind of any man, that in the restoration of the old family the French people had no share. It was always asserted that the French people longed for the return of the Bourbons. Louis was called le desiré. But, now it must be clear to every body that he was, and now is, restored by foreign force alone. The case is now too plain to be confused or misrepresented. It is a triumph of kings or priests over republican institutions. None doubt of the triumph: no one can deny that; but, it is not the act of the people of France. They had tried the ancient dynasty before; they had tried the new order of things: the ancient dynasty was restored; and they again drove away the ancient dynasty, which is now again (by this time, I dare say) restored by the means of a combined foreign army, who have defeated the armies of France.

So sensible are the aristocrats of this, that they, even now, are almost afraid of the ultimate consequences of their success. They do not see their way clearly out of the adventure. Are the foreign armies to be kept up in France? Is France to be disarmed? How long can either last? The truth is, France is too extensive and too populous to be long kept down. She is not, and cannot be, loaded with debts. The moral effects of the revolution cannot now be eradicated. It is useless, in short, to restore the king, unless they could also restore the breeches of St. Pocomo, and the virtues of the holy thorn. These and divine right must rise together, or neither can stand for any length of time. The king, who will hardly call himself le desiré this time, has, in his proclamation to his "loving subjects," denied that he ever meant to restore the tythes or the feudal rights; and yet these are of older date than his title to the throne. At any rate, he will never long maintain his throne without them. They are as necessary to his political power as food is to his body; or rather, as swords, guns and powder, are to the army now employed in his restoration.

So you see, that a counter-revolution is not a thing so easily accomplished as many seem to imagine. Your New England noblesse and priests will, I dare say, rejoice exceedingly at this triumph of the kings and priests in Europe: and we, in England, have in some sort, good reason to boast of it; but still, if Napoleon were to be murdered to-day, and all the old republicans hanged up to-morrow, the thing would not be more than a tenth-part over. Foreign armies must remain in France, or there is no security for the king's remaining on the throne. When, then, is this state of things to terminate? Not, at any rate, before another hundred millions are added to the debt of England, and even for years to come, it will be impossible for the allies, upon their principles, to disarm to any considerable extent. The whole of Europe is in a ferment. Light has gone forth, and it is impossible to put it out. Hanging and quartering will do nothing towards it. Men must again believe in the virtues of holy water. That was the main prop of the power of the Bourbons; and, without that they will in vain endeavor to keep themselves long upon the throne without the aid of foreign armies.

How a sensible man in France, quietly settled on his farm, must laugh at all that is passing! He must be highly amused at seeing us taxed anew to the amount of a tenth-part of our possessions for the purpose of forcing him and his countrymen to endure the sway of a Bourbon, a Bourbon desire too! He must laugh to see how we are fretting and fuming, and arming and fighting, and paying away our money to prevent him from being a republican citizen. He must wonder what we are taking all this trouble, and incurring all this expense for. But, if he knew what boroughs were, his wonder would soon cease. If he knew what effect these have in making us so generously anxious about the regularly governing of other countries, he would soon cease to be surprised at our late zeal and our present joy.

You, in America, understand this matter well. I read with great pleasure, in many of your papers, the just descriptions which you give of our motives in these wars. But you may be deceived as to the effect of them. Nations are often ruined while their governments are gaining force. We are screwed up to a war pitch, and, while we are at war, we are strong. You saw how we were enfeebled by the last peace, short as was its duration; and, I assure you, that there is now, in this country, a general dread of the effects of peace. Our situation is this: the taxes on account of the debt and the army and navy are, and must be, so great, that England must be the dearest country in the world. Even this second restoration of the Bourbons will, I should suppose, cost us about four millions of taxes annually, FOR EVER, which alone is more than the whole of your revenue. As to discontents in England, think nothing of them. They are not worth your notice. But, income, ingenuity, industry, will all seek cheap living; and those who have to buy goods will go to the cheapest market. This debt and army will produce a serious change in our affairs, in a short time. We may, possibly, see the French people tolerably ill-treated; but that will not pay our taxes.

By these wars against the French, we have added nearly fifty millions a year to our peace taxes. And, what have we got which we might not have had, if we had remained at peace? The French had then a king; they then had abolished feudal rights; they then had abolished tythes. And have they not done so now? But, the noblesse are now to have their titles. The fools might have had their chateaux and their lands, if they had not run away to join the foreign armies; and now these are sold away from them. What, then, have we gained for our fifty millions of taxes to be paid annually in peace? Ask your New-England right honorables this, and they will tell you, that we have got a great deal; for, that we have got "regular government and social order."

I am yours, &c.

Defeat of the Algerine fleet by the Americans
Our base newspaper writers are so much occupied with enforcing the necessity of cutting the throats of all the jacobins in France, that they cannot spare a moment to think, far less to write, on the signal triumph of America, which her invincible fleet has just obtained over the European pirates. This great achievement of the real sons of liberty against one of the "legitimate monarchs," does not, I dare say, go well down with our corruptionists; but that is a principal reason why I should not lose sight of it. While all the regular governments of Europe were acknowledging their inferiority, by sending annual presents to the dey of Algiers, the Americans fitted out a squadron to annihilate this royal pirate. The Algerine fleet was discovered on the coast of Spain. It was attacked by the Yankee fleet without hesitation. The Americans took the admiral's ship, a frigate of the largest size; drove another on shore and destroyed her; the rest escaped only in consequence of a calm, which enabled them to use their oars. This is certainly a proper method of treating these royal nuisances. But we do not see that this civilized part of the world are disposed to consider them in that light. They have shewn no inclination to assist the Americans in driving them out. Perhaps they are too much occupied at present with delivering France, to think of delivering Europe. However, I am quite satisfied that the Americans are able to do the business without them. I should not be surprised, indeed, if things would take a different turn. I would not wonder, after what I have seen; after the assistance we have given to restore the "schore of Babylon," the Inquisition, and lazy voluptuous nuns and friars to their former power and ease; if a treaty offensive and defensive had been concluded between the Autocrat of Algiers, the Autocrat of Russia, Prussia, &c. &c. and that the Americans were to find themselves involved in a war against these powers, who may probably afford a powerful contingent to their royal ally. But even this will be of little consequence. After the American seamen gave such a lesson as they did to the boasted "sovereigns of the sea," there can be no apprehension as to the result of any war which may occur with the whole maritime force of the world. There is an energy which liberty gives to its champions, that renders its cause invincible when opposed to tyranny; and the extirpation of the royal nest of African pirates, is an act which will be recorded in the page of history to the eternal honor of the American people, while the long endurance of this haughty and barbarous race, will for ever reflect disgrace on the nations of Europe.

Ventilation of Ships.

To the Editor of the Weekly Register.

Reading captain Porter's Journal, and his observations on the impropriety of obliging the crew of a ship of war, at all times, to sleep on the birth-deck—which, I understand, from his description of it, to be a very confined situation, difficult to ventilate sufficiently, or preserve clean; and, in consequence, recourse is had to fumigations, washings with vinegar, lime-wash, &c.—a thought occurred whether the plan that has of late years been adopted for ventilating mines, could not be employed for the same purpose on board of ships of all descriptions, and particularly ships carrying a great number of men; and where a large fire is necessarily and constantly kept up for the purpose of cooking.

Let us suppose the camboose should be so constructed that after the fire has performed the various offices of boiling, baking, &c. the extra heat which passes off by the chimney, shall be made to surround a copper pipe of six inches in diameter, which, at the upper end shall communicate with the external air a few inches above the smoke pipe, and at the lower end with a horizontal pipe of three inches diameter, running from the foremast to the mainmast, and connected with perpendicular pipes of the same diameter, descending along each mast to the main hold of the ship, but with openings into them from each deck—particularly the birth deck.

The effect that would take place from such an arrangement, I conceive, would be as follows:

The air in the pipe passing through the camboose, being expanded by heat, would fly off into the atmosphere, and its place be immediately supplied by that below it, and so in succession;—hence a necessity for a new supply entering the pipes from beneath: First, from that contained in the holds, with which the pipes communicate; but, finally, by a fresh current from the atmosphere passing through the holds to the pipes; and this current may be regulated so as to operate above or below either of the decks as may be necessary, by closing all the openings into the pipes, but those in that hold which it is proposed to ventilate. By such process, the holds of ships, laden with cargoes of perishable articles, may be ventilated, (it is presumed); and, perhaps, by extending the plan so that pipes connected with that passing through the camboose, should run between the ceiling and outside planks of the ship down to her keelson, the timber of ships may be preserved by drawing off the foul air, that is conjectured to be the cause of its decay.

This is a short and hasty sketch for persons of more leisure and ingenuity to improve upon; and if the editor of the Register thinks it worth an insertion in his work, perhaps, it may lead to something beneficial to the public. The preservation of the lives of our citizens on board of ships, and the preservation of the ships themselves from decay, are objects well worthy the attention of the economist and philanthropist.

ON THE SAME—FROM THE SAME.

To the Editor of the Weekly Register.

ESTEEMED FRIEND—As I believed it would be an important discovery if a method could be pointed out for causing a free circulation of atmospheric air through all parts of ships and other vessels, by which means, it is believed, the timbers would be preserved for a greater length of time, and cargoes of perishable articles prevented from decaying so soon as is frequently the case, and the ships, generally, rendered more sweet and clean—whereby the health of the crews on long voyages would be less liable to attacks of diseases arising from confined and foul air,—With a view to these advantages, I suggested my plan to the editor of the REGISTER, with a hope that it would be made public; and persons interested induced to make trial of the means suggested. At the time that letter was written, the concern in which the writer was a partner was about to build a vessel of 40 tons, for the grain and flour trade—and such vessels being liable to perish in a few years, on mentioning my plan to the carpenter he approved of it, believing it likely to answer the purpose contemplated; and we have finally agreed upon the following, which being more simple than the one first mentioned, I hope, (if it appears as important to the editor as it does to me) that it will be published—merely for the purpose of bringing the method proposed to an early trial, as it will require years to determine whether the expected benefit will arise from it or not.

The plan then is—to cut a groove on the under side of the keelson (of a ship for instance) 4 inches wide and 3 inches deep, from end to end—cover this groove with an oak plank one inch thick, and the whole length and width of the keelson—nailing it down firmly—between each two timbers, bore an inch augur hole through the board aforesaid, and we have a communication formed from stem to stern. As the writer believes the camboose of a ship is placed, generally, near one of the masts, a copper pipe of 4 inches diameter, may be inserted into the keelson, communicating with the aforesaid tube, (or groove in the keelson) and passing up the mast, enter the camboose just above the fire, and be carried out at the top of the chimney. Tubes of like dimensions may communicate with the keelson, along each mast, and be carried to the upper side of the under deck, and there closed. These tubes, being substantially boxed up, will interfere very little with any of the business of the ship, and by having openings in them at proper situations, it is presumed that a free current of air would be found to pass through all parts of the ship, when there is an active fire in the camboose for the purpose of cooking.

If such will be the effect, it is conceived that all foul air, usually generated in the holds of vessels and between the ceiling and skin, will be carried off; and if this proves to be the fact, we can scarcely doubt but that they will be rendered more healthy, and their timbers be preserved for a longer time. A great advantage arising from this plan will be—that it will require no attention—the expansion of the air in the tube passing through the camboose, will be a natural effect of using fire in it, and as the expanded air (from the copper pipe) passes into the atmosphere, it will be succeeded by a fresh supply from beneath, pressed into it by the weight of the surrounding air, and thus a perpetual circulation kept up. I will, however, be readily observed that this plan as far as relates to the groove in the keelson, can only be adapted to vessels yet to be built; but it may be equally an object to introduce fresh air into vessels that are already built and in employ. In that case, it will be an easy matter for a ship carpenter to lay a wooden tube along side the keelson, for the copper pipes to communicate with—almost the only difficulty will be, that such tubes will be liable to injury from lading or unlading the ship, and that the copper pipes will not communicate with them so conveniently as in the other method.

Vice-Royalty of New-Granada.

The ministry of Galves was followed by partial insurrections in South America, which gave the first blow to the Spanish settlements on several parts of our continent. When this proud and hypocritical statesman was called to the cabinet, the monarchy was pressed on all sides on account of its engagements with foreign courts, and the people at large expected every thing from his supposed talents. But the public expectation subsided, as soon as Galves discovered his financial plans. Instead of adopting the liberal principles of his own century, increasing the revenue of the crown by giving protection and encouragement to the spirit of individual enterprise, by freeing commerce from so many embarrassments, by exciting the agriculture, he resorted with great avidity to the old means of his hated predecessors—taxes, imposts, estancos, or monopolies, were, indeed, the only resources of his contracted mind.

New Granada was the portion of South America which suffered most during the reign of this minister, to whose rapacious policy must be attributed the slow progress agriculture and commerce has made in those important provinces. Don Joseph Gutierrez de Pineres was the agent of Galves for carrying there into execution his oppressive system of finance. For this purpose he was favored with the commission of chief of the royal court of justice, or regente de la real audiencia, resident at Santa Fe de Bogota. Pineres, thus employed, began without loss of time, to enforce the new regulations. The tobacco, rum and other productions, were monopolized by the king, and alcabalas (internal custom houses) were established every where—the inhabitants being reduced to extreme misery by the weight of the many exactions even upon the necessities of life.

The cotton and woolen manufactories of New Granada had been, for many years, in a flourishing state, the natives having at home all that their wants demanded. Now the manufactories began to decline, and shortly afterwards to disappear. The sugar plantations were daily diminishing—as the planter was obliged to sell his molasses to the king (at the price his officers were pleased to give) on account of estanco on rum. And the cotton estates were also abandoned, as excessive duties had been charged even on the smallest balls of thread made by poor women to support their children.

Such are the causes which preceded the famous insurrection in the province del Socorro. A poor old woman, it is said, was selling in the marketplace of a little town, a ball of thread, when a soldier came to ask the duty upon it; and as the charge was almost equal to the common value of the article, she ran through the place complaining aloud of the tyranny of government. The market was crowded with peasants from all parts of the district, who, enraged at the sight of the distressed woman, cried instantly from all quarters, down with the bad government, and demolished the custom house to the ground. This example was soon followed by the whole province, whose population rose en masse to expel the oppressors.

The rebels, as the Spaniards called them, took the name of Comuneros to distinguish themselves from the partizans of the court. It is to be observed, that the meaning of this word, Comunero, is a citizen who respects the voice of the representatives of the people; as the only popular branch of government in South America were the Comunes or Cabildos, which, for that time, had unanimously joined them in the contest. This was also the same device adopted, but with surprising skill, during the great revolution of Paraguay, which lasted from 1729 to 1733; carried into execution by don Joseph de Antequera, and Castro, knight of the order of Alcantara, member of the Royal Audiencia of Charcas, a native of Peru, and a man of family, genius and learning. The source and progress of this astonishing revolution we shall endeavor to develop in the article on Buenos Ayres.

The Comuneros of Socorro attempted, without loss of time, to possess themselves of Santa Fe de Bogota, as the residence of the vice roy and Royal Audiencia; but almost all the members of the government, frightened at the approaching storm, had rashly fled, leaving a commission to the archbishop Gongora to quell the insurrection. This prelate, who some persons represent as a man of liberal principles, applied all the means in his power to discharge the trust committed to him. We might here enter into details which would reflect not a little light upon this history, but the narrow limits of this memoir hardly permits us to record the principal facts. The arch-bishop left Santa Fe to meet the Comuneros, who, it is said, had already assembled nearly twenty thousand men, not daring to approach the capital, though abandoned to its fate. At last he met them at Zipaguira, where assuming all that air of penitence and austerity which proved afterwards so false, he declared to the chiefs his pacific views and wishes of coming to an agreement according to their claims.

It seems that the proposals made by Gongora were firmly rejected, in the first instance; but finally his insinuations prevailed, having spent some weeks before in Divine exercises, preaching every day obedience to lawful sovereignty. However, the Comuneros did not give up their claims so easily, as they required of the pacificator to make certain arrangements for the future. He acceded to their proposal, and it was mutually agreed to sign a capitulation by which the inhabitants were declared, in the name of the king, free from the new duties, and besides at liberty to cultivate and manufacture whatever they pleased without any embarrassment. The arch-bishop Gongora then appeared on the field of Comuneros with all the pomp of religion, dressed in his best garments, and carrying the holy sacrament in procession, to sign before Almighty God the capitulation in name of his Catholic majesty.—So the inhabitants of Socorro laid down their arms, those arms which they so nobly took up to put an end to the daily aggressions of a most tyrannical government.

Let us now enquire into the policy of the court of Madrid in respect to these transactions. The capitulation having been presented to the king to obtain his royal sanction, he declined to accept it, as no agreement was to be made with rebels. The most insensible observer is, we think, able to form an idea of the extreme distress and affliction to which those inhabitants, now peaceably living under the good faith of treaties, were reduced. Troops were immediately sent to enforce his Catholic majesty's decrees, inflicting severe punishments on the pretended criminals. The arch-bishop Gongora was appointed vice-roy of New-Granada; and he, the same Gongora, was the instrument of the most barbarous and sacrilegious treachery. The friends of this prelate present him in extreme despair and sorrow when he received the royal cedula, manifesting his majesty's displeasure at the late transactions: he is said to have deplored his critical situation with tears.

To notice the future proceedings of the Spanish cabinet in regard to New-Granada, is to record a series of horrors, as revolting to humanity as unparalleled in the history of despotic institutions: the people of whose provinces were considered as a parcel of rebels to be crushed for ever. The king's decrees tended to nothing but to stop the progress of a country endowed by nature with great blessings of climate and soil. The fortifications of Cartagena and Guayaquil were placed in the best state of defence, either against foreign enemies or the natives. The city of Santa Fe was strengthened with a good garrison and strong arsenal. The alarming situation of Quito, whose inhabitants are considered in South America as the best disposed to shake off the yoke of Spain, contributed much to these measures.

The royal government, settled by the force of arms, assumed that imperious tone which commands the obedience, but never gains the affection of a people. The province of Socorro was of course, ruined and desolated, being vexed on account of extinguished rebellion. One of the schemes of the court to accomplish this object, was to order the conquest of the Gulf of Darien, where a Scotch company had laid some years before the foundation of a colony. The archbishop vice-roy placed himself at the head of this enterprize, in which, without attaining the end, he wasted considerable treasure and native troops. But the secret object of the crown was attained: to divert the attention of the inhabitants, and check the rising greatness of these populous provinces.

New Granada was so insensibly sunk into that apathy, which is the natural fruit of oppression, that that important region was constantly declining in importance until the revolution of Aranjuez called the people again to freedom. They declared to all the world their independence from Spain; and the skill and courage displayed in a thousand glorious conflicts, has shown to civilized nations, that they are worthy of liberty—that, in the happy land of Columbia, the human race improves, instead of degenerates—that they deserve the name of Americans, and are able to maintain their political existence.

* * * We omitted to give, in the comparative statistical account of the United States and New Granada, the very important article—slaves.—United States, in 1790, 697,697; New Granada 71,000.—It gives a balance in favor of the free population of New Granada 697,626, without the proportionate discount from 3,950,000 to 2,500,000, which for many years has been the stationary population of that vice royalty.

[Here it was the desire of the writer of these communications that we should introduce a pretty long extract from Smollett's continuation of the History of England, vol. IX. page 460—1, 2, 3, 4 and 5. Philad. edition, giving an account of the British expedition under admiral Vernon and sir Chaloner Ogle against CARTHAGENA, to shew the strength of the place, and quiet the minds of some as to its reported capture by a much less force recently sent from Spain, though its condition and means of defence are much superior to what they were at the time of the British expedition, which consisted of twenty-nine ships of the line, and almost an equal number of frigates, bombs, fire-ships, &c. and a land force of 12,000 men—all which were easily defeated.]

Maryland Election.

The returns are now all in. Alleghany county has 4 federalists—and in joint ballot, for governor, United States' senator, &c. that party has an apparent majority in the legislature of one vote—last year it had a majority of twenty-three votes.

The (Baltimore) Federal Gazette of Wednesday evening last, says—"The certainty that the delegation from the several counties of this state to the general assembly, the immediate representatives of the people, are federal by a majority of one-fifth of the whole number, or one half the number of the democratic delegates, must surely be satisfactory evidence of the true political character of Maryland."

This is a very strange paragraph for a man to make who knows—certainly knows, that the delegates are representatives of the counties of the state, and not of the people of the state—who knows that the minority of the people of Maryland rule the majority.

We are not about to enter into a party discussion, or make out an electioneering case—but this fact, that the minority does govern, is so repugnant to every thing that belongs to the principle of a republican, that we cannot pass it by without reprehension and remark.

In page 111 of the 7th vol. of the WEEKLY REGISTER, there is a neat table shewing the false principles by which the people are supposed to be represented in the house of delegates. The following abstracts from that table, adapted to the state of parties as they stand this year, is interesting—

House of Delegates. The following counties have returned republican members—Hartford, Baltimore, Anne-Arundle, Washington, Queen-Ann's, Talbot, Caroline, 4 each; and the cities of Baltimore and Annapolis, 2 each, 4—

The counties that have returned federal members are—Prince George's, Montgomery, Frederick, Alleghany, Calvert, Charles, St. Mary's, Cecil, Kent, Dorchester, Somerset, Worcester, 4 each

Worcester	12,544	4,910	16,971
Total, federal counties,	131,165	68,404	197,249

We have the following results—

The counties which send only thirty-two members to the house of delegates have nine thousand more [nearly] white inhabitants than the counties which send forty-eight members!

And, taking in "all other persons," forming the gross population, allowing for two-fifths of such, agreeably to the constitution of the United States, the comparative rate of population will stand thus:

The counties which send thirty-two republican members, have a whole population of 183,297—
 Whites 143,269
 Other persons 53,000—2-5ths of whom are 21,000
 164,269

The counties which send forty-eight federal members, have a whole population of 197,249—

Whites 131,165
 Other persons 66,084—2-5ths of whom are 26,000
 157,165
 Leaving even in this way a majority of seven thousand one hundred and four legal persons in the counties sending thirty-two members over the counties sending forty-eight members!
 The counties sending 32 members, paid of the direct tax $83,222
 The counties sending 48 members, paid of the direct tax 68,404
 $14,818

But even these things do not fairly and fully represent the state of the two parties; for the republicans have an actual majority of the votes of the state of Maryland, of from five to eight thousand.

Call you this representation?

The constitution of Maryland calls aloud for amendment. The manner in which the senate is constituted, is, perhaps, even yet more exceptionable than that which regulates the election of delegates—both which, probably, will be the subject of a future essay.

* * * The people of Virginia are even less fairly represented than those of Maryland—as we shall shew by some general tables, before long.

Pittsfield Cattle Show and Fair.

We have on hand several valuable articles relating to the proceedings of this excellent institution, got up and supported by a few enlightened patriots, to encourage home manufactures and productions, and raise up a NATIONAL CHARACTER; some of which we hope soon to have the pleasure to record in this work.

A cattle show and fair (for the sale of domestic articles) was to be held at Pittsfield (Mass.) on the 2d and 3d of October instant. The household manufactures, and all other manufactured articles, with the cattle, offered for the liberal premiums that the society are accustomed to bestow for the most excellent of their kind, were to be delivered to proper persons, appointed to receive them, on the 2d of October, before 11 o'clock, A. M. The following "order of the day" for the 3d, and general "regulations" of the society, we record for present instruction and future reference:

Order of the Day for the 3d of October.

Ladies, who are candidates for premiums, are requested to meet punctually at 10 o'clock, on this day, in the room over the Female Academy. [If any are disposed to have their names concealed, they can do it, by delivering to Mr. Edwards, with the article offered for a premium, a letter, sealed, and containing their name and residence; with any mark on the outside, the same mark to be placed on the article; if unsuccessful, the letter will be returned to them unopened.]

The chairman of each committee of awards will deliver sealed reports of their decisions to the President, at 10 o'clock, A. M. The society will meet at the Coffee-house, and proceed from thence at 11 o'clock, in procession, to the old church; the ceremonies will be as follows:

Vocal and instrumental music, led by col. Solomon Warriner.—A prayer.—An address by the president. Music.

Communication of the report of the viewing committee of agriculture.

Proclamation of the decision of the committee of awards.

Delivery of the premiums to the successful candidates (in person.)—Music.

The society will dine at the Coffee-house, at two o'clock. Female successful candidates are invited to dine with the society.

Auctions will be opened for the sale of animals on the 2d October, at 2 o'clock, p.m. and on the 3d, at 3 o'clock, p.m. for manufactured articles.

By order of the committee of administration,
Wm. C. JARVIS, Recording Secretary.
Pittsfield, Sept. 19, 1815.

The public are reminded, that the following are the regulations of the society relative to premiums.

All articles of agriculture and manufactures must be the growth or produce of 1815. Those of agriculture must be of the growth, and those destined exclusively to females must be of the manufacture of Berkshire county. Each article of domestic manufacture must be accompanied with satisfactory proof that it was manufactured by the person producing it, and spun and wove by females.

Broadcloth (dyed in the wool) and cassimere must be of the manufacture of the New-England states. Animals from any part of the United States will be entitled to premiums. [Those belonging to persons residing out of the state, unless members, will be subject to the accustomed tax of two dollars; those belonging to persons residing in the state will be free of the tax.]

No ox, cow or bull, to be admitted for premiums, which has received a premium; nor any animal, unless satisfactory proof is produced that it was the property of the candidate on and since the 1st May, 1815. Bulls must be brought with a rope or chain, to secure them in the pens.

No animal can be examined by the committee, except in the pens around the elm tree; and the number specified for premiums must be selected and separated by the owner, as no more than the number required can be offered for examination.

Each of these regulations, and those specified in the notice published by the society on the 5th of December, 1814, will be strictly adhered to.

Wm. C. JARVIS, Recording Secretary.

Sheep.

The following extracts from the second report of the Merino Society of Great Britain, may not be uninteresting, at this time, to many of our farmers and manufacturers. The society was established for the purpose of encouraging the breed of Merino sheep in that country—it is supported by a long list of members, among whom are several of great respectability—and at the head of which appears the name of sir Joseph Banks, as president. From the whole tenor of the report which was published in 1812, it appears, that a great deficiency of fine wool for their manufacturers was apprehended, and it was conjectured that it would require at least twenty years before they would be able to supply, by wool of English growth, the quantity annually imported. The state of Spain, since the publication of this report, has been such as to induce a belief, that their flocks have suffered a still greater diminution. Happy, therefore, may we consider ourselves, that the enterprize of a few individuals has secured to the United States this useful animal.—Whether the wool is therefore sought for by our own manufacturers, or those abroad, the rearing of these sheep cannot fail to continue an object deserving the attention of every farmer. An additional inducement for introducing this breed on every farm, will be found in the extracts of the report concerning the quality of the mutton, from which it appears, that the various crosses afford mutton equal, if not superior, to any of their former breeds, and in many instances a decided preference has been given to the Merino mutton. Many proofs of this might be adduced; such are selected, as it is hoped will be satisfactory, and are best adapted, by their brevity, for insertion in a public journal. Editors of papers, who may think this communication of some importance to their readers, are impartially requested to insert it their columns.—Argus.

EXTRACTS.

"The vast importance of our woolen manufactures is demonstrated by the retrospect of a century, not a year of which elapsed without manifesting, that to our ancestors it was an object of the first solicitude. Public attention, till lately, was not directed to the production of Merino wool, and the principal commercial advantages of Spain have been derived from our neglect and want of foresight. The following brief statement of our importations, during the last three years, show the numerous benefits we have conferred on other nations.

	Spanish.	Other sorts.	Total.
1809,	5,046,707	1,799,226	6,815,933lbs.
1810,	8,133,205	2,802,318	10,935,523
1811,	4,290,973	445,324	4,737,297

"The importations of sheep's wool on an average of four years, ending the 5th of January, 1811, amounted to 7,885,567 pounds, and were from that date to the 5th of July, in the same year, as follows:

Germany and north of Europe	44,594lbs.
Portugal	372,681
Spain and Gibraltar	2,147,696
Malta and Levant	49,654
Ireland and the Isle of Man	3,640
Cape of Good Hope	4,318
States of America	7,103
Brazils	12,741
Prize wool	1,198

Total pounds, 3,140,070

"The flocks of fine woolled sheep in Spain, before the invasion of that unhappy country by Bonaparte, were estimated at about six millions; of these a moiety, perhaps three-fourths, are already destroyed, and the remainder daily diminishing by rapine and neglect. From what corner of the earth, then, can the manufactories of this country be supplied with fine wool for the next twenty years? This is a most curious question, and whenever the manufacturers shall be convinced of their real situation for a supply of fine wool, the growers thereof in England will meet with a very different reception from them, from that which they have hitherto experienced. That day is not far distant—we have not at present in this kingdom, a single year's consumption of fine Spanish wool on hand; small quantities are still escaping the ravages of the tyrant, and finding their way through Portugal from Spain to England; but it is too much to expect, that even these adventitious supplies can continue for any length of time."

Indian Eloquence.

From the Western Journal.—On the night of the 14th July the Black Buffalo, principal chief of the Teton tribe of Indians, departed this life at Portage De Sioux. The succeeding day he was solemnly interred with the honors of war. Robert Wash, esq. secretary to the commissioners, has furnished the following speech, delivered over the grave, by the Big Elk, Mahah chief. It is truly eloquent, and is a high evidence that genius of the most brilliant description, is not confined to the civilized world. The speech is pathetic and filled with energy. It is literally given.

SPEECH.

"Do not grieve. Misfortunes will happen to the wisest and best men. Death will come, and always comes out of season. It is the command of the Great Spirit, and all nations and people must obey. What is past and cannot be prevented should not be grieved for. Be not discouraged or displeased then, that in visiting your father here, you have lost your chief. A misfortune of this kind may never again befall you, but this would have attended you perhaps at your own village. Five times have I visited this land and never returned with sorrow or pain. Misfortunes do not flourish, particularly in our path. They grow every where.—(Addressing himself to gov. Edwards and col. Miller) What a misfortune for me, that I could not have died this day, instead of the chief that lies before us. The trifling loss my nation would have sustained in my death would have been doubly paid for by the honors of my burial. They would have wiped off every thing like regret. Instead of being covered with the cloud of sorrow, my warriors would have felt the sun-shine of joy in their hearts. To me it would have been a most glorious occurrence. Hereafter when I die at home, instead of a noble grave and a grand procession, the rolling music and the thundering cannon, with a white flag waving at my head—I shall be wrapt in a robe, (an old robe perhaps) and hoisted on a slender scaffold to the whistling winds, soon to be blown to the earth—my flesh to be devoured by wolves, and my bones rattled on the plains by the wild beasts.

(Addresses himself to col. Miller)

"Chief of the Warriors—Your labors have not been vain—Your attention shall not be forgotten. My nation shall know the respect that is paid over the dead. When I return I will echo the sound of your guns."

It will be recollected that BLACK THUNDER, a Fox chief, has ever maintained a friendly disposition towards the United States. Although, from the conduct of the Sacks and Foxes, suspicion may have alighted upon him, yet no evidence of hostility has yet been discovered or manifested. His conduct seems to have been decided and uniform. On the 20th July the commissioners met some Fox Indians in the council Arbor at Portage; and were first addressed by one of a different tribe. He is said to have trembled like an aspen leaf, scarcely (no doubt from consciousness of guilt) being able to articulate. When he had finished, the BLACK THUNDER rose, and with a firm and manly dignity delivered the following speech. It was addressed to governor Clark, as the organ of the commissioners.

SPEECH.

My Father—Restrain your feelings, and hear calmly what I shall say. I shall tell it to you plainly. I shall not speak with fear and trembling. I feel no fear. I have no cause to fear. I have never injured you, and innocence can feel no fear. I turn to all, red skins and white skins, and challenge an accusation against me.

My Father—I don't understand well how things are working. I have been just set at liberty. Am I again to be plunged into bondage? I know not how or where to turn my head. Frowns are on all sides. I have never forgot what my great father told me. No man has ever been able to change me. You may perhaps, my father, be ignorant of what I tell you, but it is a truth which I call Heaven and Earth to witness—a fact that can be easily proved—that I have been assailed in every possible way that pride, fear, interest or feeling could touch me—that I have been pushed to the last for to keep up the tomahawk against you: But all in vain. I never could be made to feel that you were my enemy. If this be the conduct of an enemy I shall never be your friend.

You are acquainted, my father, with my removal above Prairie du Chein. I went and formed a settlement, and called my warriors around me. We counseled and took our determination, from which we never departed. We smoked, and resolved to make common cause with the United States. I sent you the pipe. I took great pains in sending it, that the Indians of the Mississippi might not know what was doing. I sent it by the Missouri. It resembled this, my father. You received it. My determination was then taken. I told you we were ready to make war—that your enemies should be our enemies, and waited only for the signal. If doing all this is to manifest hostile disposition, I do not know how to be friendly. The things I tell you, my father, because it is a truth, a melancholy truth, that the good things which men do are often buried in the ground and forgot, while their evil deeds are stripped naked and proclaimed to the world.

My father—When I come it was simply to hear what you had to say to me. I little thought I should have to defend myself. If I had been your enemy I would doubtless have taken some caution. I would have come with my excuses all prepared. But having ever held you by the hand, I have no excuses to offer. I consider myself, and wish to be considered in the same condition as before the war. If I had fought against you, my father, I would have told it to you, as those of my nation who have, will be compelled to do when they come—It will be for them to make their own defence in the best way. I have nothing to say but for myself and tribe.

My father—As to what has or may be done in council here, I have nothing to say. It is simply to repeat what I said to my great father, the president of the United States.—You heard it, and no doubt remember it. It is simply to say, that my lands can never be surrendered. I was cheated, basely cheated, in the contract. While I live they shall never be surrendered.

My father—I call heaven and earth to witness, and smoke the pipe in evidence of the truth and sincerity of what I have said. I remember the sentiments my great father expressed towards me. I hope he and you still cherish the same. If you do, I know you will receive the pipe. My only desire is to smoke it with you—to grasp your sacred hand, and claim the protection of the United States for myself and tribe. I hope as the pipe touches your lips, it will operate as a blessing on all my tribe—that the smoke will rise like a cloud, and as it passes away will carry with it all the animosities that have arisen between us.

Ancient naval fight on lake Erie,

OR A PIECE OF WYANDOTT HISTORY.

[Communicated by Stanley Griswold, Esq.]

During my residence at Detroit, I had the following story from the chiefs of the Wyandott nation, (called by the French Hurons) and principally from Walk-in-the-Water, a man of superior penetration and eloquence.

Near 200 years ago, as well as I could recollect, their nation resided on the north shore of Lake Ontario, and the St. Lawrence river. Opposite to them, on the south side of those waters, resided the Senecas. A woman, as happened among other nations, was the cause of a terrible war between them, which terminated in the expulsion of the former from the country. She was the wife of one of the Seneca chiefs, to whom the Wyandott prince took a strong liking, and by stratagem carried her off.

The war immediately ensued, and was prosecuted with great cruelty and slaughter for a long time. At last a final battle came on (upon the northern territory) in which the Wyandotts were worsted and were obliged to fly with great rapidity. The greater part took a course to the west, and their antagonists followed them vigorously till they came to the streights of lakes Huron and St. Clair. The fugitives calculated to pass on the ice, but found it just broken up and then floating down the streight. Their only alternative was to throw themselves upon it, and leaping from cake to cake they all safely reached the opposite shore. Their pursuers not chusing to encounter the risk, returned home.

The nations among whom the Wyandotts now found themselves, viz. the Potawatamies, Ottawas, Chippewas, received them with friendship, and gave or lent them land to settle on. At the solicitation of the strangers, they even went so far as to fit out a fleet of large and excellent birch canoes with a view to meet the Senecas whom they expected on with a fleet from the east. These canoes were chiefly built on the streights and higher lakes, and came to a rendezvous about where Malden now is. It is said they made a grand show. The Senecas not having as good materials, were obliged to make use of log canoes, hollowed out of the trunks of trees. These were far more clumsy and unmanageable than those made of the birch bark; the latter being superior to our best skiffs and may safely brave the surges of the lakes.

The Wyandotts and their allies set out from their rendezvous, coasting the north side of lake Erie till they came to Long Point, within 20 or 30 miles of the eastern end of the lake. Here they made a halt, not deeming it prudent to doubt the point till they had looked around it. For this purpose they dispatched a few men across the point, who happened to meet midway, with about the same number of the enemy, dispatched for a similar object. Each party retreated to their fleet, except one or two Wyandotts, who ascended trees to ascertain the situation and number of their enemy and the nature of their craft, which they found to be logs.

Now a grand manœuvre was set on foot—the birch canoe party proceeded to the end of the point, and in full view of their enemy, put out directly into the lake. The Senecas immediately pursued, and when they had reached about midway of the lake the birch canoes turned upon them and gave them such battle as could not be withstood. All the Senecas were slain but one man, who pretended to be dead, but was afterwards found alive, and was permitted to go home to tell the catastrophe to his nation.

Thus closed the war, and the Wyandotts remained in peace in their new station. This is supposed to have been the first naval action on the lakes.

Several circumstances conspire to gain credit to this relation.

One is the inveterate prejudice and hatred existing between the Wyandotts and Senecas to this day. The cause of this hatred has recently assumed other forms than the ancient war; the former accuse the latter of administering bad medicine, by which they mean a kind of inexplicable witchcraft or conjuration. But since the Genessee country and New Connecticut have been settled by the whites, there has not been much connection between them. The above circumstance, however, may go some way to account for the readiness of the Indian tribes in the Genessee country (or the Six Nations of whom the Senecas are a part) to unite in the present war against the British and their allies. For the Wyandotts are the right-hand men of the British,—though few in number, they are first in council and first in the field, or rather woods, and deservedly so too on account of their superior information and talents.

Again, I have often heard the chiefs of those nations by whom the Wyandotts were so hospitably received and assisted, upbraid the latter, in their anger, of want of gratitude—telling them they were strangers and they took them in, that the ground occupied by them was theirs, &c.

The language of the Wyandotts has no affinity to that of the nations around them: whereas the latter all speak one language, though with considerable dialectic variations; one interpreter serves well for all these, but he understands nothing of the language of the former, nor do these nations understand each other any better than the Europeans and Chinese, unless it be a few words acquired by long intercourse. But the language of the Wyandotts is nearly or quite the same as that of the Cognewagoes, low down in Canada, and also of the Mohawks, as I am told. A remarkable singularity in it is, that it has no labials; their lips are always apart in speaking, and they have many guttural sounds.

Indeed the Wyandotts expressly claim a relationship to the Canadian Cognewagoes, abovementioned, and I know that visits were exchanged between them. What was still more remarkable, they assured me a part of the Creek nation were their relations, and visits had been interchanged with them also. They say, that on their great discomfiture and expulsion by the Senecas, a part of their nation fled down the St. Lawrence, who are now the Cognewagoes; and of the main body who fled westward, some were unwilling to stop in the neighborhood of the lakes, and proceeded on to the Ohio river, where they made canoes and descended southwardly till they obtained hospitality at last among the Creeks. By mingling with them they had not kept themselves distinct like the other branches.

The Wyandotts are all Christian Catholics, while few individuals of the nations around them have emerged from heathenism. This shows the former to have once resided within easy scope of the old French missionaries, whose head quarters were Quebec and Montreal. They now own a large church at Sandwich, nearly opposite Detroit, where the French and they worship jointly. It has a handsome dome, covered with tin, with a considerable bell. The straitened limits of this nation has led them to the cultivation of civilized arts, which is probably the foundation of their superior abilities and influence at present. They build good cabins, till the ground, raise stock, and are generally seen on good horses—still they adhere to the Indian dress. Their settlements are Moguaga, Browstown and Sandusky—names now familiar to the public ear.—Nat. Int.

LATEST FROM EUROPE.

London papers of August 20—Paris dates of Aug. 27.

A London paper of August 19 has the following remarkable paragraph:—"With a view to assure the possession of Canada, in case of a rupture with the United States, the government has given orders to build upon the lakes new ships of war and gun-vessels, proper for the navigation of those waters. Every thing is preparing in England for the arming and equipping of those vessels."

NAPOLEON BONAPARTE.—The following protest is copied from a London paper of August 21 :—"I protest solemnly, before God and before men, against the violation of my sacred rights, which is committed, in disposing by force of my person and of my liberty. I came voluntarily on board the Bellerophon. I am not a prisoner; I am an inhabitant of England.

From the moment I set foot on board the Bellerophon, I was under the protection of the English nation. If its government in giving to the captain of the Bellerophon orders to receive me and my suite, meant only to enslave me, it has lost its honor and sullied its flag.

If that act be put in execution, it will be in vain that the English will boast of their loyalty, their laws and their liberty. British faith will be stained by the hospitality of the Bellerophon. I appeal to history to say whether an enemy, who, after having during twenty years made war against the English nation, comes willingly upon a reverse of fortune, to seek an asylum under the protection of her laws, can give a more convincing proof of his esteem and confidence; but how have the English required that confidence and such magnanimity? They have pretended to hold out a friendly hand to that enemy, and when he committed himself to their good faith, they sacrificed him.

Bellerophon, at sea, August 4, 1815."

American seamen.—The last London papers say, that on the representation of the unemployed British seamen, more than 100 American sailors, employed on board of British merchantmen, had been discharged; and a vessel taken up to bring them to America.

The British minister for the United States had not embarked at the date of our last accounts. It was said he would not proceed on his embassy for several weeks.

The plague appears to rage with great violence in many of the ports of the Levant.

Orders have been given to reduce the navy of Great Britain to 12,000 seamen and 500 marines.

The Paris papers contain amusing accounts of the seizure of Joseph Bonaparte, who is snug near New-York.

It is understood that marshal Ney will be the next victim to the military tribunal established at Paris. Much blood must be shed before the allies will feel content that Louis is the desired of the French people! Drouet, Laborde, Debille, &c. will follow. It is said that marshals Masseua and Ange-reau are members of the council to try marshal Ney.

It appears that corps of Prussian troops are yet entering France! It is asserted that the first and second line of French fortresses will be garrisoned by the allies—never to be restored to their "legitimate sovereign." The allies are not content with Louis' organization of his new army; and he must remodel it.

The duke of Bassano (Marat) has been arrested in Switzerland.

Murat and Thionville are also said to be in custody—but one report says, that the former was set at liberty.

The British are sending out two officers to explore the source of the Niger! This is an act worthy of a great government.

The Plague. It is said 15,000 persons die daily of the plague at Cairo!

Algiers is reported to have declared war against Spain.

Royal couplings. We have it reported that the hereditary prince of the Netherlands is to be coupled with the grand duchess Anne of Russia; and that his former betrothed, Charlotte of Wales, is to be coupled with a prince of Prussia, nephew to the king.

Louis is king of France! The London papers express an unqualified opinion that if Louis is left unprotected by foreign bayonets his "beloved subjects" will instantly drive him from the throne. They speak of large provinces to be cut off from France, and that it will be necessary long to "hold the rod" over that country, by keeping within it large bodies of troops—just to secure its independence! We have an article (too long for insertion this week) detailing the different departments of France which are respectively assigned to the military occupation of the Prussian, British, Austrian, Russian, Bavarian, Saxon and Wirtemberg armies. Louis is hardly a deputy king—and if his tameness, with the outrages of the allies, does not provoke the French people to another struggle, we shall be greatly mistaken. Every drop of blood they shed shall yet be retaliated.

Liberty of the press! On the 10th of August the king of France issued the following decree:

Louis, by the grace of God, king of France and Navarre, to all who shall see these presents, health:

After having heard our ministers, and on the report of our minister secretary of state for the department of general police, we have decreed and do decree as follows:

Article 1. All the authorizations granted for journals till this day, of what nature soever are revoked, and none of the aforesaid journals can appear, unless they receive a new authority from our minister of general police, before the 10th of August current, for the journals of Paris, and before the 20th of August next for those of the departments.

2. All periodical writings shall be submitted to the examination of a commission whose members shall be appointed by us, on the presentation of our minister of the general police.

3. Our minister general of police is entrusted with the execution of the present ordinance.

Given at the castle of the Thuilleries, the 8th of the month of August, year of grace 1815, and the 21st of our reign.

Journal de Paris.

State of France. A letter from Bordeaux, dated August 31, says—"The last advices from Paris are of a very gloomy nature. It is said the allied powers have declared, that their armies shall not leave France, until the whole of the seditious faction be annihilated; they declare that it is necessary for the safety of the king, and the tranquility of Europe that every traitor be punished. This declaration has created great consternation in the capital.

"On the other side, we received this morning, confirmation, that the fortifications of Bayonne have been taken possession of by twenty thousand Spaniards, who entered the city with the white flag. The general opinion now is, that the allies will remain in France, until by their contributions, requisitions, &c. they have so weakened her, as to reduce her to complete impotence, to do any mischief for a long time to come."

Another letter says—"The state of France is at this moment distressing and degrading in the extrema—overrun by a band of foreign troops, composed of almost every nation in Europe, paid, fed and clothed by forced contributions, and their leaders manifesting a disposition to reduce her to the condition of a province; the inhabitants even of this section of the country (who have always been enthusiastically attached to the Bourbons) begin to look upon those allies, who, on their entrance into France, they hailed as their deliverers, as their most dreaded enemies; and from what I can observe, I feel pretty well assured, unless a change of conduct in their conquerors takes place, they will make some desperate effort to throw off the yoke in the course of a very few months."

By latest verbal news from France by the Spartan (says the New York Columbian) we learn that horrible excesses are constantly committed in the departments by the allied troops; that the allied kings declined giving any specific answer to Louis the eighteenth; that they had prohibited the printing of Pouche's report to the king on the deplorable state of France; that the French army had not submitted, but were in the mountains of Auvergne; daily increased by volunteers; that shocking massacres had been committed on the protestants near Nismes, where it was wickedly contrived to hold them up as Bonapartists—1500 are the number said to have been killed—that a Spanish army was marching into France, also!

The duke of Otranto's report is received in town. We hear it was copied, re-copied and privately circulated through France. [We expect to insert it in our next.]

Barbarous expressions.—Before the capitulation of Paris, the London Sun of June 23, published the following: "Massena has been appointed to supersede Bonaparte in the command of the national guard of Paris. Should any attempt be made to defend that city, we trust it will be laid in ruins, as an eternal monument of the retributive justice of Heaven."

Some difference is said to have arisen between the sovereign of the Netherlands and the king of Prussia as to territory. This is mentioned in the London Statesman.

It is stated that the foreign troops (except 150,000 to remain in evidence of the love of the people of France for the Bourbons!) would begin to evacuate that country early in September.

General Kosciusko resides at present in Switzerland.

Paris, Aug. 13.—A letter from Vienna of the 28th ultimo, says—"When the intelligence of Napoleon having surrendered himself to the English arrived here the empress went to Baden to prepare the arch duchess Maria Lousia for this news. She received it with firmness, but shut herself up in her apartments. We are assured that she will soon leave Baden to return to the castle of Schenbrun. She has forbid the persons who attended on her son to inform him of the events which have occurred in France."

August 16. Labedoyere heard his sentence read in prison with great composure. He asked captain Viotti if he had not twenty-four hours to appeal.—On being answered in the affirmative, he said "that is sufficient." We are assured that the documents were yesterday delivered by the clerk to the council of revision, and that its decision will be given to-day. As these proceedings relate solely to forms the prisoner cannot be present.

The first council of war is already engaged with the affair of general Drouet. Marshal Ney, general Debille, and others, will be successively tried by the first and second council.

Marshal Soult, who was apprehended at Mende, has been set at liberty. He has retired to his castle at St. Amand, near Castres, where he is to remain under the superintendence of the minister of the general police, according to the ordinance of the 24th of July.

In taking the inventory of the effects which madame Murat brought to Trieste, there have been found, it is said, 1,800,000 ducats, 20 cwt. of silver plate, diamonds on a very moderate valuation, to the amount of at least 3,000,000, besides a great many valuable paintings and antiques; the latter, it is affirmed, are sequestered, but all the rest is secured to her in full property.

August 27. It is said that the Swiss diet have decreed that the duke of Bassano shall not reside in the Swiss cantons, and that he must quit Berne on the 17th to return to France.

We learn that the siege of Huniguen commenced on the 20th. Towards evening and during the whole night, until morning, a very lively cannonade was kept up from the batteries built around Huniguen. On both banks of the Rhine, for eight days, great preparations both for attack and defence had been made. Many princes will assist at the siege, which will be conducted according to all the rules of art. The archduke Ferdinand, eldest son of the emperor of Austria, and general Barclay de Tolly have hired lodgings at Basle. The commandant of Huniguen has hoisted the red flag by the side of the tri-colored; the same thing has been done at Befort.

London, August 20.—3 per cent. consols. left off yesterday at 56½, 5-8, and omnium at 74.

On Friday a large sum was vested in the British funds in the name of the noted Caulincourt, the duke of Vicenza.

There is every reason to believe that Jerome Bonaparte escaped from France one of the first, and without any accident. He left Paris on the 27th of June, with two plain carriages only, accompanied by a physician in one, while a valet and another person occupied the other. They took the Orleans road, and left the kingdom by the frontier of Switzerland. It is added that the king of Wirtemberg has consented that Jerome Bonaparte shall reside in his states, and that the princess his wife (daughter of the king) is to live with him again.

Some of the private letters by yesterday's mail from Paris assert, that an arrangement has been concluded between the allied powers and the French government, by which the latter is to pay to the former, within a stipulated period, the sum of 600,000,000 francs, towards indemnifying them for the expenses of the war. As a security for the due fulfilment of this engagement, the whole of the northern and eastern fortresses are to be placed in the hands of the allies, and exclusive of the force necessary to garrison the places so delivered up, an army of at least 150,000 more men will remain in the interior of France until the last instalment of the contribution shall have been paid. The French government takes upon itself, in the mean time, the entire burden of subsisting the allied troops, for which purpose it engages to advance monthly the sum of 25,000,000 francs, to be distributed in the following proportion, viz. five millions each to Russia, Prussia, Austria and England, and five millions to be divided among the minor states.

The frigate Eurotas sailed from Plymouth on Saturday, having on board Savary, Lallemand and other persons who were not permitted to accompany Bonaparte to St. Helena. It is said that they are to be carried to Malta.

TRIAL OF COL. LABEDOYERE.

[The following sketch of the trial of the celebrated col. Labedoyere, is copied from a Paris paper of the 16th August—a paper edited under the immediate superintendence of the censors of Louis 18th, for which allowances must be made.]

[TRANSLATED FOR THE BALTIMORE PATRIOT.]

AFFAIR OF COL. LABEDOYERE.

2D COUNCIL OF WAR.

This affair for a long time past had excited the liveliest interest and curiosity in the public mind. Among the spectators were remarked several strangers of the highest distinction: prince William of Prussia, the prince of Orange, the prince of Wirtemberg, &c. and several general officers. The trial commenced at half past 11 o'clock. The charges of accusation were read.

Col. Labedoyere denied that he had held any command in the army after the capitulation; he acknowledged that he remained several days at Rhom, and that he expected to be appointed chef d'etat-major of the 2d corps.

Being asked why he concealed himself in the house of madame Fonterry, where he was arrested, in Paris, he replied that that lady was the friend of madame Labedoyere. He denied that he had ever had any communication with the Isle of Elba during Bonaparte's residence there, or that he had received any order from him whatever. He avowed, that previously to the return of Bonaparte, he did frequent society where political discontent was manifested: and that on some points he entertained similar sentiments of discontent, but not on others.

It appeared by col. L's papers, which had been seized, that he had conceived a design of going to the U. States, and that a Mr. Ouvard had given him two letters of credit, of which one was on a house in Philadelphia—among them was also found a passport granted to him under the name of Huche, by the sub-prefect of Rhom.

The declarations of the witnesses were read.

In an interrogatory which col. L. had undergone, and which was read, he avowed that he did send an officer to meet Bonaparte after his landing, and that on his entry he escorted him with his whole regiment. He confessed that he had caused the Eagle of his regiment to be carried to Grenoble by one of his servants: that his regiment marched out of Grenoble by his orders, himself at the head of it: that gen. Devillers made representations to him, which he did not think himself bound to submit to because he (col. L.) had solely the interest and safety of his country in view. He demanded that every person who might have any knowledge of the facts imputed to him might be heard.

The accused was conducted into the presence of the judges. His stature is elevated: his physiognomy fine and agreeable. He at first appeared pale and somewhat dejected, but his countenance soon resumed an air of confidence: and his public interrogatory commenced.

He states that his name is Charles Angélique François Huchet de Labedoyere, aged 29 years, a general officer.

He acknowledged that he had been appointed by the king colonel of the 7th regiment of the line; and had received a white flag for his regiment, but that not being present when the white flag arrived at Chambery, he declared that he never took the oath.

He declared that he carried out his regiment to meet Bonaparte, and uttered the cry of vive l'empereur. He was asked if gen. Devillers, his superior, did not make representations to him—he replied that he did not yield to them, because the considerations on which the motives of his conduct were founded seemed to him above all personal interest. He desired to be heard before the evidence of the witnesses should be taken which was granted.

He read observations tending to prove that he ought not to be judged by the council of the first military division, but by the council of that division in which the fact took place, and desired that the witnesses on both sides should be equally heard.—The witnesses were called.

Count D'Agout repeats the declaration he had before made, and does it with the utmost reserve. Col. L. questions him if he knew the military measures that had been taken for the defence of Grenoble.—The witness says that he only knew the arrangements made relative to the placing of the artillery.

General Devillers deposes, that he ordered col. Labedoyere to proceed with his regiment from Chambery to Grenoble. The 7th March, about 4 P. M. he learned that the colonel had left the town with his corps and gone to meet Bonaparte; that he hastened after the colonel on the road to Gap and overtook him, represented to him his duty, his oaths, and the interest of his family; but the colonel refused to obey him. The accused reminds gen. Devillers of certain questions he proposed to him at Grenoble, and which prove that he doubted of the efficacy of the measures taken for the defence of that place against an attack from Bonaparte. The general acknowledges the correctness of these facts.

M. Andru, a lawyer of Grenoble, deposes, that on the 7th March he saw col. L. going out at the head of his regiment crying vive l'empereur!—and in the evening saw him in the cortege of Bonaparte, returning at the head of his regiment.

M. Bourcet, of Grenoble, declares that he was not an eye-witness of col. L's defection, but that he heard it spoken of.

M. Gagnon, lieutenant, in non-activity, at Grenoble, declares that colonel Labedoyere lodged at his house, and that a month after Bonaparte's return he found a white flag that had been torn up, the morning after Bonaparte's arrival at Grenoble.

M. Crouy, chasseur royal at Grenoble, deposes that he heard it said, on the 7th March, that col. L. had placed an eagle upon the end of a branch of willow, and had distributed tri-colored cockades to his soldiers. The next day the witness saw that eagle on the square at Grenoble.

The president reads the article of the code which permits him to call in witnesses in virtue of his discretionary power, and they are introduced in the following order.

M. Maximi, royal volunteer at Barreau; he declares that he heard spoken of the defection of col. Labedoyere; adding that on the night of the 7th, being near Beaune, he heard some one from without exclaim, "make way for me, my friends, we have served together: I am colonel of the 7th, and the emperor is there."

M. Randon, of St. Marcel, deputy king's attorney at Grenoble, was not an eye-witness of the affair of col. L.; but some time before that having dined in company with him he heard him give a very equivocal toast; and after the entry of Bonaparte, the circumstance of that toast was forcibly brought to his recollection. The witness adds, that he himself was met by Bonaparte on the 7th March and being recognized was interrogated by him as to the spirit of the people of Grenoble.

The witnesses being heard, the president asks col. Labedoyere if he desires that any others should be introduced; and on the answer of the accused in the negative, the reporter takes up the subject.

He retraces the principal facts of which col. Labedoyere stands charged, with clearness and precision, and supports them by the declarations of the witnesses and the acknowledgment of the accused.

"Thus, says he, col. Labedoyere, forgetful of his oath, went forward to receive the man, against whom he was bound to combat until death, and became his accomplice."

The reporter found the crime to be the greater, as the crimes resulting from it were the more calamitous.

Mr. Bexon presented himself, not as the advocate, but as the counsel of the accused, confined himself to the following observations, and addressed the judges:—"Gentlemen, before I determined to lend any assistance to the misfortune of col. Labedoyere, I endeavored to know him, and to penetrate into the recesses of his soul—I have found there, nobleness and grandeur, and I have thought that his defence could not inspire more interest in the minds of his judges, than when delivered from his own lips."

The colonel rose and read his defence, which appeared to be written in haste upon loose sheets of paper. He protested that he had never betrayed his honor. "If the accusation," said he, "regarded only my life, he who has sometimes led brave men to the post of death would himself again face death like a man of courage, and I would not occupy your attention with the sentiments that have directed my conduct: but my honor is attacked as well as my life, and I am the more bound to defend it, as it belongs not exclusively to myself; I am accountable for it to a wife, the model of every virtue; and shall my son, in the same moment that the light of reason shall dawn upon his mind, blush for his heritage? I feel that I am able to resist the most terrible of blows, if I can exclaim—my honor is preserved.

"I may have been deceived, misled by illusions, by recollections, by false ideas of honor; it is possible that my country may have spoken a chimerical language to my heart."

[The accused declared that he had neither the intention, nor the possibility of denying public and notorious facts, but he wished to justify himself against the accusation of having been engaged in a plot which preceded the return of Bonaparte. He spoke of the virtues of the king and deplored the enthusiasm of the people in his favor when he ascended the throne; but, he said that the faults of his ministers had damped the public spirit. When he wished to explain that gradual discontent which he would have argued in extenuation of his crime, the president observed to him, that he must confine himself simply to his defence, and not enter into political discussions, which were foreign from it. It is not of a political crime that you are accused, said he, but of a military one.]

"How do you expect," replied col. Labedoyere, "that I should combat notorious facts, or disavow public actions? I never conceived such an idea; and since you forbid me to enter into an examination of the political causes that determined the conduct which I have to answer for before you, I renounce all further defence; I will confine myself to the acknowledgment of a great error, and I confess it with sorrow, when I view the deplorable state of my country. My fault is not to have better understood the intentions of the king."

Col. Labedoyere made a tardy, yet an affecting reparation to the monarch, which he terminated with the following words:

"I have shed my blood for my country, and I am

"willing to believe that my death, preceded by my error, will be of some utility; that my memory will not be held in horror, and when my son shall arrive at an age to be fit for the service of his country, that his country will not reproach him with his name."

The firm and noble accent, the modest and manly countenance, and the penetrating tone of colonel Labedoyere inspired all the auditors with one sentiment, which was no doubt equally felt by the judges; with a regret that so many fine qualities, which might have rendered the possessor the pride of his country and of his family, should have contributed but to make him the instrument of an event that has covered France with the most frightful calamity.

After a long deliberation, the president of the council returned into the audience chamber with the visible expression of grief, accompanied by the other judges, and pronounced against col. Labedoyere, the sentence of Death!—One of the motives of the judgment was, that col. L. had not availed himself of the delay of 8 days, allowed by the king to all the accomplices of Bonaparte, within which term they were suffered to return to their duty.

The council of war was composed of BERTHIER DE SAUVIGNY, adjudant commandant—President.

VIOITI, chef de Battalion—commissary reporter.

MAZEROT DE MONTDESIN, adjudant commandant.

DURAND, idem.

ST. JUST, chef de Battalion.

CHEVALIER LANTIRY, captain-adjoint of the etat major.

VISCOUNT GRENIER, idem.

GAUDRIOT, officer of gendarmery—king's attorney.

Note.—col. Labedoyere appealed from the judgment; but the appeal was not admitted—and the sentence was carried into execution.

Conversation—for the year 3815.

James.—I was born, sir, in the island of St. Helena.

Felix.—Indeed! Ah, the name of that place is very familiar. It is celebrated as the place to which the famous Bonaparte was exiled, by certain allied sovereigns, whose names I cannot recollect.

James.—I believe there is, in the Antiquarian Library, in the great city of Madison, on Jackson River, an historical work, which gives some account of those sovereigns. I recollect the name of Alexander of Russia. There was also another potentate, who governed an island between the Atlantic and German Oceans, who had a hand in the affair. That island, now a province, was then a kingdom of vast naval power. It was at that time ruled by a prince regent, which circumstance was preserved from oblivion by his having Napoleon in his immediate custody. More than that I have never heard of him; and his very name appears to be totally forgotten.

STATE PAPER.

Vienna, April 4, 1815.....The undersigned, ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary of his majesty the king of Spain to the congress of Vienna, has the honor to claim that the state of Parma, Placentia, and Guastalla, militarily occupied by Austrian troops, be given up without delay, to their sovereign the infant don Charles Louis king of Etruria, the only obstacle opposed to this act of justice having been removed by the declaration of congress, of the 13th March.—He hopes that his majesty, the emperor of Austria, will give his orders to this effect, and this done, that measures will be taken without the extraordinary delay which therto experienced in this affair, for the restitution of the territory which the French government detached from the duchy of Parma to unite it to the duchy of Modena, and for a suitable indemnity for that ceded to Austria by the treaty of Paris, on the left bank of the Po.

Although the king of Etruria has other rights to reclaim, the undersigned confines himself at present to requiring the restitution of the hereditary states of his majesty as an immediate consequence of the said declaration of congress in its sitting on the 13th of March. By that declaration the powers who signed the treaty of Paris, some of whom also signed the treaty of Fontainebleau, announced in the face of Europe, that the treaty of Fontainebleau, which placed Bonaparte in the Isle of Elba, and gave the archduchess Maria Louisa, the three duchies was broken up by the escape of Bonaparte and his forcible entrance into France.

In truth, the powers who by the treaty of Fontainebleau, gave to the archduchess Maria Louisa, the three duchies, disposed of that which did not belong to them, for military occupation forms no title. But when it was wished to insist on this observation, which admits of no reply, endeavors were made to persuade that it was necessary to turn our eyes from this contravention of the law of nations, to fix them on the inestimable blessings thus procured to Europe, which had been saved, it was said, by that treaty. A single difficulty remained for solution—that of demonstrating that the sovereign of Parma, was under obligation, by any treaty, to devote himself for all the other sovereigns of Europe, and that he ought to lose his entire political existence to preserve that of others, and even to procure them not only immense aggrandizements, but also the glory and happiness of procuring them for princes, their relatives, their allies, or their proteges. Doubtless we must not apply to politics the proverb, that there is nothing new under the sun, for it would be impossible to find a similar example even in the history of the French revolution, though so fertile in extraordinary maxims and deeds. But notwithstanding this, the treaty of Fontainebleau was signed by powers so respectable, and who had deserved so well of Europe, that it was proper to speak of it decorously, though at the same time avowing that it attacked, in regard to the house of Parma, the sacred principle of legitimacy, at the same time that it founded on that very principle the restoration of the French monarchy, or more properly speaking, the safety of Europe, which could never be tranquil or happy while a single legitimate sovereign was not in possession of his states. Now, however, the treaty of Fontainebleau no longer exists, and her imperial highness the archduchess Maria Louisa has no right or title to the three duchies, in like manner as the emperor of Austria has no reason for continuing to occupy them, nor to receive their revenues, while the sovereigns who derived them from their ancestors are wanderers, and owing their subsistence to the generosity of their relatives. As it is high time this state of things should cease, the undersigned requests prince Metternich to lay this reclamation before his imperial majesty, whose love of justice is so well known, that it is impossible the king of Etruria should not obtain from it that which is his due; or that if any unforeseen obstacle prevent his imperial majesty from doing this, prince Metternich will have the goodness to fix an early day for submitting the contents of this note to the congress, the undersigned being unable to believe that the powers who signed and published the declaration of March will refuse to put in execution an essential part of it, a circumstance which would furnish the malignant, and the partizans of the usurper, with reasons for hoping that the same thing may happen as to other matters.

The Spanish plenipotentiary might complain of the strange turn which has from the first been given to his reclamations in favor of the house of Parma. He might remark, that in the conference of the 10th of December, a committee, of which he formed a part, was appointed to discuss the business, and that this committee has never met, a thing unexampled in all other congresses, and even in this one so extraordinary in many respects. That a project having been given by a member of the committee in January, to prince Metternich, he replied thereto by a counter project, which was officially communicated to the undersigned, who accepted it in substance and sent it to his court. That the latter deemed it very extraordinary that it was refused to restore to the king of Etruria the city of Placentia, the only point of the three duchies which Austria claimed to retain, and that because Placentia was, it was said, a military point; as if a power which had 20 millions of subjects had need of military positions against a neighbor who had not 400,000; or as if the treaty of Paris, which was to remain untouched, had not fixed the Po as the boundary of Austria: in fine, that on the occasion of the said counter-project, the undersigned was ordered by his august sovereign to insist on the entire restitution of the three duchies, and to sign no contrary convention, nor the treaty which is to terminate the congress, without this preliminary condition, in like manner as the protest which he made on the union of Genoa to Sardina. But all these observations become unnecessary in consequence of the declaration of the 13th of March and its execution, in as far as it concerns the devolution of the three duchies to his majesty the infant don Charles Louis, speedily repairing the wrongs which his majesty has had hitherto to complain of, will impose on the undersigned the agreeable necessity of keeping silence, both with regard to these facts, and the cause to which they owe their origin.

He begs his highness prince Metternich to accept the assurance of his high consideration.

Weights and Measures.

A BILL (as amended on re-commitment) for ascertaining and establishing uniformity of weights and measures, before the British parliament.

The preamble of this bill sets forth the expediency of having the weights and measures just and uniform; and the confusions or manifest frauds that have resulted from the neglect of that provision in the Magna Charta and treaty of union, between England and Scotland that the same weights and measures should be used throughout the kingdom.

Standard yard—The first clause enacts, that from the 24th June, 1816, the straight line or distance between the two points in the gold studs in the straight brass rod, now in the custody of the clerk of the house of commons, is declared to be the original and genuine standard of length called a yard; and is declared to be the only unit or standard measure of extension throughout the kingdom; that one-third part of the said standard shall be a foot; one-twelfth of such foot an inch; and that the ell shall contain one yard and a quarter of the said standard yards; the furlong 220 such yards, and the mile 1760 such yards.

Computation of superficial measures.—The second clause enacts that all superficial measures shall be computed from the said standard yard, or by multiples or proportions therefrom: the rood containing 1210 square yards, and the acre 4840 square yards, all according to the said standard yard.

Immutable standard.—The third clause for the purpose of providing an immutable standard, by reference to which, if the standard yard should be lost or injured, it might be restored of the same length; and it being ascertained that the standard yard is to the pendulum vibrating seconds in the mean latitude of London (113 feet above the level of the sea, and at the temperature of 64 degrees of Fahrenheit's thermometer), in the proportion of 36 inches to 39, 1847 inches: It is therefore enacted, that if at any future period the standard should be lost, destroyed, or defaced, it shall be restored, by making, under the direction of the lord high treasurer, or the lords commissioners of the treasury, or any three of them for the time, being a new standard yard, bearing the same proportion to such pendulum as aforesaid.

Standard of weight.—The fourth clause enacts, that the standard of weight shall be the pound avoirdupois, the same being equal in weight to 27,648 cubic inches of pure water, at the temperature of 56 1-2 degrees of Fahrenheit's thermometer, and a standard pound avoirdupois shall be forthwith made as aforesaid, of gold, silver, or brass under the direction of the lord high treasurer, or lords commissioners of his majesty's treasury or any three of them; that all measures of weight shall be taken in parts, multiples or certain proportions of the standard pound avoirdupois, viz. 14 of such pounds shall make a stone, 8 of such stones a hundred weight, 20 hundred weight a ton. Each pound to contain 16 ounces, each ounce 16 drams, each dram 3 scruples, and each scruple 10 grains.

Standard measure of capacity.—Clause fifth—This enacts, that both for dry and liquid goods the standard measure shall be the gallon, containing 10 pounds of pure water at the temperature of 56 1-2 degrees of Fahrenheit's thermometer (being 276.48 cubical inches) and that a standard gallon of this size shall be forthwith made of brass, under the direction of the person aforesaid; that all measures of capacity shall be taken from this standard in certain parts, multiples, or proportions, viz. that a quart shall be one-fourth of the said gallon; a pint the half of such quart; and that there shall be 2 such gallons in a peck, and 4 such pecks in a bushel.

The following clause provides that all weights shall be made of brass, copper, bell-metal, or cast iron.

The next clause enacts, that after the 24th June, 1816, all contracts, bargains, sales and dealings in Great Britain shall be transacted according to the legal standards.

The next clause declares, that the forgery or counterfeiting of marks or stamps on weights and measures is felony.

It is provided by the next clause that the former standards of weights and measures shall be destroyed.

The remaining clauses relate to the way in which the penalties are to be recovered—the form of the conviction—that half the forfeiture be to the king and half to the informers, and that persons thus convicted and suffering shall not be otherwise punishable for such offence.

The last clause repeals all the former acts on this subject in detail.

The 24th June, 1816, is the date from which the new regulation is to be established in Great Britain.

The provisions of the bill do not extend to Ireland.

CHRONICLE.

Pennsylvania Election. John Sergeant, esq. the federal and "old school" democratic candidate for congress, in the place of J. Williams, deceased, has been elected by a large majority, in the district composed of the city and county of Philadelphia, &c. The votes in the city were, for Sergeant 3029; for Conard 1511. In Philadelphia county the republican ticket has prevailed.

Maryland Election. See page 110.

Tennessee Election. For governor, Joseph M'Minn 14,980; Robert Weakley 6028; Jesse Wharton 5918; Mr. Foster 3626; Mr. Johnson 2417—all republicans. Governor BLOUNT had served the constitutional term, and could not be re-elected. His conduct during the war has entitled him to the gratitude of Tennessee, and endeared him to all good men in the United States.

Washington, October 11.—The report of the sloop of war Ontario having been despatched to the United States, by com. Decatur, is entirely without foundation. No vessel but the sloop Epervier has been sent with despatches. She was under the command of lieutenant Shubrick, first of the Guerriere, and captain Lewis, captain of the fleet, was on board bearing the treaty with the dey of Algiers. The place of captain Lewis, in the Guerriere, was supplied by capt. Downes. The Epervier passed the streights of Gibraltar on the 12th July, and it is much feared is lost.

It is not true that com. Bainbridge has sent two schooners to order com. Decatur home, as has been ignorantly asserted. On the arrival of com. Bainbridge, a junction of the two fleets will take place, and it is perfectly understood that commodore Decatur will resign his command, and return to the U. States. The last news of com. Decatur, to be depended upon, is that he had proceeded to Tripoli.

There is probably as little truth in the report that the Spaniards had refused to deliver up the Algerine sloop of war captured by our squadron and sent into Carthage. It is much to be regretted that the newspapers publish, without proper caution to ascertain the truth, reports calculated to excite public anxiety, and wring the hearts of wives, children and relatives, and it is requested that they will give equal publicity to these corrections.

Naval Affairs.

[Communicated for the Weekly Register.]

We request the earnest attention of our readers, and especially of those interested for the welfare of our gallant navy, to the following very important letter on the subject of certain matters, perhaps, not hitherto correctly understood. We are assured, from a source of undoubted authenticity, that it embraces a full and impartial view of the present state of the navy department; and, as such, we trust it will merit the attention of all enlightened editors, who think as we do upon so momentous and important a subject.

INTERESTING LETTER

From an officer of the U. States' navy, to his friend, a member of congress, dated

WASHINGTON, 2d September, 1815.

SIR—The apparent want of attention on my part to the important considerations suggested in your letter of the 15th ultimo, I assure you arose not from any feelings of disrespect, but from a sincere desire of obtaining the most correct and authentic information relative to the subject in hand. From the opportunities with which I have been indulged since my sojourning at this place, I flatter myself to have gained a perfect knowledge of the nature of the matters to which you allude, and to be in possession of a sufficient number of facts to place the question upon its true and legitimate ground. I shall, therefore, proceed at once to lay before you the result of my labors with a firm hope, that, while they prove entertaining, they may, through you, invite the attention of those legislators who are soon to assemble, and [we earnestly pray] to decide upon the merits of the case.

The establishment of the board of navy commissioners as a branch of the existing navy department, has, indeed, excited a great deal of speculation; some ascribing to it powers, which, perhaps, do not properly belong to it, whilst others conceive its members to be no more than mere instruments in the hands of the secretary of the navy, possessing no powers whatever except such as are derived from him. Whilst the advocates on both sides are at a loss to define the peculiar duties of each, and the relative standing which they bear to each other, the secretary and the commissioners, from different views and constructions of the law by which the latter were established, and from the guidance of their public actions in obedience to these discordant views and constructions must entertain jealousies and distrusts towards each other; necessarily tending to paralyze their efforts, and rendering one or both useless to the public. For, in all cases where both parties, from incompatible expositions of the act, lay claim to powers which both conceive themselves to be possessed of, by virtue thereof, independent of each other, these deplorable consequences will necessarily ensue. There is certainly a very serious difficulty in giving such a construction to the several sections of the act, as will, without the aid of much confidence and courtesy on the part of the secretary, and much liberality on both sides, permit the commissioners to go into the full discharge of their duties; for you may rest assured that the secretary has no more authority over the commissioners, than the commissioners have over the secretary. The latter have their duties distinctly traced in the various sections of the act aforesaid, and these duties, when necessary, they are bound to perform upon a suggestion to that effect from the secretary, as the mere organ of the president. Consequently, any further interference on his part becomes at once, not alone unnecessary, but highly improper.

The secretary has, in fact, no authority, whatever, as an officer of the government, over naval matters, except that which is derived from the president; while, on the other hand, the commissioners are invested by an act of congress with the execution of certain specified duties, which, when necessary, no power but that from which they derived their authority, can prevent them from performing. They are entrusted with the negotiation of contracts for the supplies of the navy; with the classification, construction, armament, equipment and employment of vessels of war; with the framing of rules and regulations for the re-organization of the navy; and, in truth, according to the emphatical tenor of the act, with "all other matters connected with the naval establishment of the United States." And, although they still hold their respective ranks as officers of the navy, it should always be borne in mind, that they at the same time hold a new and distinct commission from the senate as commissioners of the navy; and, as such, are in no respect whatever amenable to the orders of the secretary, nor in any way, either individually or collectively, subject to his control.

The secretary has, indeed, in a qualified point of view, a superintendence over the operations of the commissioners. He may, for instance, as the organ of the president, require of them, in due form, statements and estimates relative to naval matters; and in these cases, they are bound to furnish them: but here his power and authority ceases. He can give no order—he cannot designate the manner in which supplies are to be furnished, neither can he exercise any control or authority over the classification, construction, armament, equipment and employment of vessels of war; for all this is exclusively vested by the act in the board of commissioners, or else the object of the act is not attained. Hence, it would appear, that by a literal interpretation of the terms of the act, the secretary is left entirely without any duties to perform, and that, properly speaking, his powers are at an end. But, as both the secretary and the commissioners continue still to exist in their official capacities, and as the existence of both naturally requires a continuance of the powers apparently intended to have been invested in them, a construction must be adopted that will tend to conciliate, and to leave in the hands of the secretary that appearance of power which the importance of his situation requires. To this end, it might, perhaps, be proper that the commissioners should take only upon themselves the performance of such of the ministerial duties, invested in them by the act, as are explicitly designated in it; and abandon those stated in a general way, or derived by inference, to the secretary. Let them, for example, attend selely to the framing of rules and regulations for the re-organization and gradual increase of the navy—to the procurement of naval stores and materials, and the classification, construction, armament, and equipment of vessels of war, as well as to the other specific duties detailed in the act; and leave the employment of them, and their officers, to the management of the secretary. This, indeed, appears to be the intention of that unfortunate and ill-timed section at the end of the act; unfortunate, on account of its awkward situation; and ill-timed, as it contravenes an undeniable rule of construction, by valuing and vaguely reserving in a general way what was before particularly granted. Unless, however, some understanding of this kind takes place between the secretary and the commissioners, the former (except he be a man of uncommon liberality) will be an eternal plague to the latter, and greatly retard the public business. For, although without any authority over the commissioners, the offices of both are still so nearly connected, that a daily intercourse becomes unavoidably necessary in order to ensure a perfect understanding of the matters in hand; and when once this intercourse is interrupted, and those sources of information which lead directly through the correspondence of the secretary are cut off, (unless their relative duties were better understood) an almost total cessation in the operations of the commissioners would inevitably follow: and lead perhaps to the perversion of an establishment, created at first to supply that indispensable practical knowledge so long a desideratum in the navy department.

These, I assure you, are not the idle speculations of a theorist. The event may happen as above stated, and, perhaps, has happened already; for it appears to me, that two distinct and independent powers can no more exist in the same office, and in the same concern, than two distinct and independent governments in the same state. Jealousies and bickerings must inevitably be generated, and, after a world of collision and confusion, anarchy ensue. The hope of change might, perhaps, extend their separate existence to a considerable period—as it may that of the secretary and the commissioners until the next meeting of congress: when, if the act be not new-modelled, one, or both, must assuredly be abolished. But, supposing the matter to be reduced to this alternative, let us enquire for a moment which of the two would most probably be of the greatest advantage to the country, and which, therefore, ought to be retained?

I have already had occasion in a former letter to advert to the palpable incompetency of a secretary, as a mere statesman, to discharge the duties of an office in which so many practical accomplishments are required, and to the public detriment which must necessarily result therefrom. To remedy these important defects, congress created the board of commissioners, authorising the selection of its members from amongst those officers of the navy whose rank did not fall below that of post-captain, in order to secure to it that practical skill and experience of which the navy department had so long stood in need. For it was presumed that these solid acquirements were so where so likely to be found as in officers of that rank, and it being the general belief that these officers had frequently distinguished themselves on the ocean for the honor and preservation of their country, there was a well grounded hope that while acting as commissioners, they would not exert themselves less in the perfection of a plan calculated at once to insure the permanent prosperity of the navy, and to extend the means of annoying the enemy. Unshackled, and at ease in their office as on board their ships, this, and in fact, much more might with reason be expected from them. But if hampered by the ignorance, self-conceit, and obstinacy of others, (blemishes, from which few men are exempt) no great calculation of benefit could fairly be deduced from their operations. Relieved from the pressure of these difficulties, and a failure on their part to meet the views of the country, would indeed be unpardonable. Situated as it is presumed the commissioners now are, however, no fair opportunity can be afforded them to shew how far they are capable of fulfilling the expectations of congress, and of the public at large; nor can they, it is believed, ever hope for the arrival of such an opportunity until either the act itself be new-modelled, or the office of the secretary is abolished.

The secretary for the time being, whatever may have been his exertions, (and in some instances I believe them to have been great) has for the most part been found incompetent to the due administration of the affairs of the navy, and thus has given rise to the zealous exertions of all enlightened men in favor of a board of commissioners, whose practical knowledge, confined to naval matters only, would be found to conduct them, on all occasions, with more propriety, facility, and effect, than the talents of one, (whatever may have been his acquirements) whose attention was at times drawn off by other objects connected with the government. It was believed also that, by connecting the duties of the secretary and the commissioners—by uniting their offices—and by constituting the former a member of the board, permitting all the correspondence of the department to pass through his hands, in the same way as that of the lords commissioners of the British admiralty passes through the hands of their secretary, all difficulties would be removed, and the business of the navy be transacted with harmony and advantage. But as this belief has not been realized, and as the matter now stands, it seems almost impossible that unanimity can exist between them—the one arrogating superior, and the other possessing by law distinct and independent powers. For whilst the commissioners justly consider themselves to be rightfully clothed with these distinct and independent powers, they must naturally yield them with reluctance, from a belief that the construction given by them to the law is judicious and correct; and with jealousy, from an apprehension that, as he had claimed the right of controlling all the matters that were formerly controlled by him, embracing in this claim even such duties as were distinctly assigned by law to the commissioners, (the discharge of which he conceived to be optional with him only,) in direct opposition to repeated assurances of a willingness to conduct his official affairs agreeably to a fair construction of the act, the secretary would not shew that cordiality and confidence so essential to the operations of officers employed in similar pursuits. In fact the secretary himself cannot but feel a jealousy of the commissioners so long as they claim powers which he disputes, and which he must necessarily find himself obliged to yield, in obedience to that consistent interpretation of the act, without which, no clear meaning can be attached to its various parts.

Under the existing state of the act, it will be difficult to reconcile these jarring interests. Much will depend upon the qualities of the man invested with the office of Secretary. If he studies his own dignity and importance, his ease and the good of the service, he will no doubt realize his interest in permitting the commissioners to conduct all the affairs of the navy in their own way, reserving to himself only a general superintendence. On matters of importance, it would, indeed, be proper to consult him as the organ of the president, and generally in all other cases where doubts arise in the minds of the commissioners, or when a difference of opinion exists between them. In my view, it appears beyond doubt to have been the intention of congress to regard the secretary only as the organ of communication from the president to the commissioners, and the latter as the ministers to carry into effect the objects of the president in this manner expressed. If this be true, the secretary has then, in virtue of the act, little more than his cabinet duties to attend to; and instead of the drudge of the navy department, may justly consider himself as a high and important officer of government. He should in reality be a man of exalted views, not building his official worth upon an ungenerous interference with the business of others, nor arrogating to himself illiberal or unbecoming privileges. In my opinion, however, it will be difficult to find a person possessed of these qualities, tempered at the same time with that indispensable liberality, so essential to a department of this sort; and though the choice were made with a single eye to that object, there are a thousand chances to one against attaining it.

To conclude—under circumstances, such as I have above detailed, if the secretary disdains to avail himself of the practical skill and theoretical knowledge of the commissioners, while, with equal justice and propriety, the latter hesitate to perform with confidence the duties assigned them, from a want of that needful information which the secretary is in daily receipt of, as well as of that necessary intelligence of the measures adopted and orders given by him, they cannot but pursue a conjectural course. For, most assuredly, if no communications are made by the secretary to the commissioners on these or like subjects—if the affairs of his office are enveloped in mystery, and the commissioners above all others excluded from a knowledge of them—if orders are issued by him to squadrons, single ships, and to officers, without communicating them to the commissioners, or consulting with them upon the propriety or expediency of these orders—how is it possible for the latter to act with any degree of stability or confidence, or to meet with due effect executive views?

Whether or not the services of the secretary are of any importance to the cabinet, I cannot pretend to determine. My knowledge is chiefly confined to naval matters, and from the lights afforded by that knowledge, I consider myself perfectly justifiable in asserting, that while the commissioners exist, there is no necessity, whatever, for his services, be they ever so great, in the management of these matters. If there be a necessity for them in the latter case, and he is capable of duly administering the extensive concerns of our growing navy, then there certainly can be no use in retaining the commissioners: And, in either case, the abolition of the one or the other, must certainly be a saving to the country and an advantage to the service. The department now costs the United States fourteen thousand dollars more than it did formerly, and I will venture to declare, that circumstanced as the commissioners now are, three additional clerks would answer the purpose equally as well, without costing, perhaps, one fourth of that sum. In fact, as harmony would then, in all probability, exist, they might answer a far better purpose.

I am, your obedient.

For the satisfaction of our readers, we subjoin a copy of the act above alluded to:—

An act to alter and amend the several acts for establishing a navy department, by adding thereto a board of commissioners.

Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America, in congress assembled, That the president of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorised, by and with the advice and consent of the senate, to appoint three officers of the navy, whose rank shall not be below a post-captain, who shall constitute a board of commissioners for the navy of the United States, and shall have power to adopt such rules and regulations for the government of their meetings as they may judge expedient:—and the board, so constituted, shall be attached to the office of the secretary of the navy; and, under his superintendence, shall discharge all the ministerial duties of said office, relative to the procurement of naval stores and materials, and the construction, armament, equipment and employment of vessels of war, as well as all other matters connected with the naval establishment of the United States. And the said board shall appoint their own secretary, who shall receive a sum not exceeding two thousand dollars per annum, who shall keep a fair record of their proceedings, subject at all times to the inspection of the president of the United States and the secretary of the navy.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said board of commissioners, by and with the consent of the secretary of the navy, be and are hereby authorised to prepare such rules and regulations as shall be necessary for securing a uniformity in the several classes of vessels and their equipments, and for repairing and refitting them; and for securing responsibility in the subordinate officers and agents; which regulations, when approved by the president of the United States, shall be respected and obeyed, until altered and revoked by the same authority: and the said rules and regulations, thus prepared and approved, shall be laid before congress at their next session. It shall also be the duty of the said board, upon the requisition of the secretary of the navy, to furnish all the estimates of expenditure, which the several branches of the service may require, and such other information and statements as he may deem necessary.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the officer of the said board holding the oldest commission shall preside, and each commissioner shall be entitled to receive in compensation for his services, three thousand five hundred dollars per annum, in lieu of wages, rations and other emoluments, as naval officers, &c. And all letters and packets to and from the said commissioners, which relate to their official duties, shall be free from postage.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act shall be construed to take from the secretary of the navy his control and direction of the naval forces of the United States, as now by law possessed.

Clerk's Naval Tactics.

FOR THE WEEKLY REGISTER.

Amongst the innumerable foreign works that for years past have been reprinted in the United States, the very valuable treatise, whose title we have prefixed above, does not seem to have been thought of sufficient pith and moment to merit even a single edition. We shall find it necessary, therefore, during the course of the ensuing remarks, from the scarcity of British copies on this side of the Atlantic, to avail ourselves of the notice taken of it in the 12th No. of the Edinburgh Review; and shall, moreover, quote promiscuously from the author and the reviewer, distinguishing their words by a different type.

To Mr. Clerk's system of naval tactics, so far as it extends, we are disposed to give our unqualified approbation; conceiving it, in fact, to have been the sole ground-work of those unexampled successes which his countrymen have so invariably obtained over the French. His rules for fighting in squadron, appear to be judicious and correct, and, sanctioned as they have been by the uniform practice of every British commander who had occasion to fight in this way, they would seem, perhaps, to embrace every true principle of naval rencontre, were it not for one fatal omission. Considering the era, however, in which our author wrote,* this omission does not seem surprising. The French and Spanish squadrons laid it down as an incontrovertible rule, almost without exception, never to seek a contest with the enemy, but to make the best of their way to the port of destination; and Mr. Clerk's principles, therefore, are entirely bottomed upon the assumed fact, that Great Britain would always have to engage with a cowardly foe, ever anxious to escape the shock of battle. That he should have anticipated, in some degree, the unexpected manœuvre of the glorious 10th of September, 1813, it would be unreasonable to expect; for, surrounded as his country then was by one continued blaze of naval glory, it is not all to be wondered at, that the thought of defeat never entered his mind. He seems never to have apprehended the adoption of his own system by any but a British officer, nor in glancing his eye across the Atlantic to criticise the actions of Rodney, to have reflected once upon that rising Hercules, destined, at no distant day, to 'cut the line.'

Whether or not, the details of Mr. Clerk's doctrine, were known to the gallant Perry; or whether or not he had ever seen his book, or ever heard one word of its contents—it is a remarkable fact, that in the ever-memorable battle of Erie, this intrepid officer executed, with success, one of the grandest of Mr. Clerk's manœuvres, by magnanimously cutting the enemy's line. In his official despatch, dated the 13th September, 1813, giving the particulars of the battle, he has the following sentence near the close:

"At 45 minutes past 2, the signal was made for 'close action.' The Niagara being very little injured, I determined to pass through the enemy's line; bore up and passed a-head of their two ships and a brig, giving a raking fire to them from the starboard guns, and to a large schooner and sloop from the larboard side, at half pistol shot distance."

The victory that immediately followed this consummate manœuvre, affords another distinguished proof of its excellence; and the capture of the whole hostile squadron, an event that rarely happens, serves to shew its unparalleled effect, as well by the opportunity which it gave to the commodore's vessel of exerting her full force, as to the others of his squadron to overtake and vanquish the enemy's rear. The battle of lake Champlain, like the battle of the Nile, being fought while the American squadron were lying at anchor, presented, of course, no opportunity for the execution of this manœuvre; though we have not the smallest doubt that, had circumstances favored, it would have been executed with the same unexampled success. So that, upon the whole, although Mr. Clerk's system of naval tactics, as it now is, may possibly answer every purpose of the 'royal navy,' while fighting the Spanish and French, it will assuredly not do to combat an enemy who sometimes takes it into his head to seek the contest, and to cut the line, in turn. The old gentleman therefore, (if still alive) will, we fear, be under the necessity of revising his work, and adding thereto an appendix, shewing how to counteract the fatal intention of a daring enemy who shall himself attempt to cut the line, or 'seek the bloody fight.'

As to any remarks of our author, in regard to the principles of single combat, we presume, from his extreme modesty, he would now be a little shy of pressing them upon us; considering the rapid progress we have lately made in this distinguished branch of naval discipline, and the many striking examples we have given of the superior efficacy of our own plan. Whilst we forbear, therefore, to urge any thing on this feeling part of the subject, we shall, for the satisfaction of our author (in case he is desirous of examining some of the practical illustrations of our principles of single combat) take the liberty to refer him to captains Dacres, Carden, Whinyates, Barclay, and many others, who had the unexpected fortune to witness their effects.—And should he in the end be so fortunate as to devise a set of tactics, to counteract the hidden mystery that has hitherto crowned the efforts of the American navy with such uncommon success, he will, as in 1782, have the rare felicity of introducing a new era in the naval history of Great Britain. But, whatever may be the result of his labors, we have great doubts whether he will be able to lay down such a set of rules as shall, upon trial, completely neutralize the force of those measures, which happily introduced a new era on the 10th of September, 1813.

We have but two more remarks to make, previous to the introduction of our author and his friend the reviewer, and these relate exclusively to himself. It is curious that he, being a perfect land-lubber, (as we gather from the reviewer) should have made such important and inestimable discoveries in the science of marine—and it is equally curious and surprising that a government, so fond of patronizing as that of Great Britain always is, should never once have deigned to notice the author of these discoveries in any, even the slightest manner.

"The author proceeds (says the reviewer) in the first part of his work, to a series of demonstrations on the mode of attack from windward, of which, for the reasons already assigned, (the want of plates) it is impossible to give any more than the general result. A single vessel to windward in pursuit of another to leeward, will never bear down, endwise, in a direct line, on the broadside of the other; because she is then exposed to be raked from end to end by the fire of the enemy, and to be disabled from pursuit. She will either bear down astern of the other, and continue the pursuit in a parallel line, till she get alongside; or, having shot ahead, she will bear down athwart the other to intercept her in her course. But a fleet to windward has invariably borne down in a perpendicular, or at least in a slanting line on another to leeward, each ship in a line of battle abreast of the other, till they brought up, within a proper distance, for a close and general engagement from van to rear. A fleet to leeward, formed in a line of battle ahead of each other, and desirous to avoid a general engagement, had therefore full leisure to disable the other during its approach. And when the latter had assumed a situation for close encounter, the former might bear away at intervals while enveloped in smoke; or by making more sail, might shoot ahead, and pour its whole fire into the opposite van, as it passed and wore in succession, to form a new line to leeward, on the opposite tack, where, if the enemy were not already disabled, the same manœuvre might be repeated with the same success. Some idea may be formed of the effect of a raking fire, from the supposition of a column of infantry exposed to the fire of a battery through the whole line. But a ship is infinitely more disabled by the damage sustained in a few shrouds or principal stays, in a yard or topmast, than by the loss of men; and the area which the hull and rigging together present to the shot, appears from our author's calculations to be twenty times larger than the area formed by the decks alone, where the men are exposed."

"If, then," says our author, in concluding this part of his demonstrations, "after a proper examination of the late sea engagements, or rencontres, it shall be found, that our enemy, the French, have never once shewn a willingness to risk making of the attack, but invariably have made choice of, and earnestly courted a leeward position: If, invariably, when extended in line of battle, in that position they have disabled the British fleets in coming down to the attack: If, invariably, upon seeing the British fleets disabled, they have made sail, and demolished the van in passing: If, invariably, upon feeling the effect of the British fire, they have withdrawn at pleasure, either a part, or the whole of their fleet, and have formed a new line of battle to leeward: If the French, repeatedly, have done this upon every occasion: and, on the other hand, if it shall be found that the British, from an irresistible desire of making the attack, as constantly and uniformly have courted the windward position: If, uniformly and repeatedly, they have had their ships so disabled and separated by making the attack, that they have not once been able to bring them to close with, to follow up, or even to detain one ship of the enemy for a moment; shall we not have reason to believe, that the French have adopted, and put in execution, some system which the British either have not discovered, or have not yet profited by the discovery of."

"That such was the new system adopted by the French, to preserve their own ships, while they disabled ours, and such the mode of attack to which the English uniformly adhered, is illustrated by the details of a variety of naval engagements, from admiral Byng's in the Mediterranean, 1756, to admiral Greaves' rencontre off the Chesapeake, 5th September, 1781. In Byng's unfortunate engagement, the British having weathered the French fleet, edged down in a slanting or oblique line to bring the latter to close action from van to rear. The headmost ships suffered a raking fire, and received three broadsides, before they could reach their stations to return a shot. The sixth ship in the line was disabled by the loss of a topmast; and from the interruption which she occasioned to the line, the van was separated from the centre and rear. The van of the French fleet bore away at intervals, amidst the mistaken shouts of our seamen, as soon as it felt the effects of our fire. The centre and rear, by making more sail, poured their whole fire with impunity into our five headmost ships, as each vessel ranged along our van; and as they bore away in succession, they formed a new line three miles to leeward; while our van, which had sustained the whole action, was too much disabled for the fleet to renew such a disadvantageous attack. In Pocock's engagement in the East Indies, two years afterwards, a similar mode of attack, and the same system of defence were employed upon each side, and with the same success. So early had the French adopted a defensive plan, which preserved their own fleet, while it disabled ours, and which, in Byng's engagement, prevented the relief of fort St. Philip."

"Admiral Byron's engagement off Grenada, on the 6th of July, 1779, is described as similar to Byng's in almost every respect. Our fleet bore down from windward, in the same oblique line; but as the enemy kept bearing away, we were unable either to bring their rear into action, or to produce a close engagement in the van. Our headmost ships were either disabled in making the attack, as they received the whole fire of the enemy's line, as each ship of the latter passed and wore in succession, in order to form to leeward upon the opposite tack. The French adhered so closely to this defensive system, that, to avoid all danger of a general engagement, they forbore even to intercept our disabled ships which had necessarily fallen to leeward; and their caution was rewarded with the capture of Grenada."

"Admiral Arbuthnot's engagement off the Chesapeake, exhibits a repetition of the same manœuvres, with this remarkable addition, that the French fleet, which had the weather-gage, being apprehensive of an engagement in that situation, ran down and formed to leeward of the British line. Accordingly, our headmost ships were so much disabled in bearing down to engage, that when the enemy wore, as usual, and formed again to leeward, our fleet was unable to renew the attack. In admiral Greaves' engagement off the Chesapeake, 5th September, 1781, the same manœuvre was practised with equal success. While the enemy's van bore away, their centre bore up in passing, not only to protect their own van, but to pour their whole fire successively into ours."

"The last instance of an unsuccessful attack from windward, which our author has produced, is lord Rodney's engagement off Martinico, on the 17th of April, 1780. His lordship's first design was to attack the rear of the enemy with his whole force. The French admiral, however, discovering the meaning of the signal, wore, and formed on the opposite tack; and the manœuvre, though it was still practicable, was exchanged for a general attack upon the whole line. Notwithstanding the personal gallantry of lord Rodney, and the example of close action given by the Sandwich, the French fleet bore alternately away and escaped; while the English, from the damage sustained in the hull and rigging, were unable to continue the pursuit that night."

After stating that this mode of fighting in general engagements, previous to 1782, was strictly adhered to by the English and French, the reviewer proceeds:

"During the whole war our fleets had invariably been baffled, disabled and worsted, in fact, in every general engagement, without the loss of a single ship on either side, or almost of a man. Our admirals adhered almost invariably to the established mode of attack, and endeavored to obtain a windward position before they began to engage. Each ship steered directly upon her opponent in the adverse line, and brought up, in order to produce a general engagement from van to rear."

We shall now transcribe Mr. Clerk's new mode of attack, both from windward and leeward, as briefly as possible, in the reviewers own words.

"The mode of attack proposed, whether from windward or from leeward, is founded upon the same principle which a skilful general adopts in engagements by land, that is, to exert the chief force against the weakest or most vulnerable part of the opposite line. The impossibility of carrying the whole fleet by a general attack, had been sufficiently proved. Instead, therefore, of bearing directly down to stop the van, of which the result has been generally unsuccessful, and always indecisive, our author demonstrates that a fleet to windward, arranged in three divisions as the service may require, should continue the pursuit, like a single ship, in nearly a parallel line of approach; and should confine the attack to as many vessels as it can reach and cut off in the centre or rear. Admitting even the superiority of the enemy's sailing, the swiftest vessels to windward will necessarily outsail and intercept the heaviest in the fleet to leeward, which last must either abandon its rear, or return to hazard a general and close engagement, which it has endeavored to avoid. But in whatsoever manner the enemy shall attempt to return; whether the whole fleet shall double round in succession, or each vessel shall tack or wear in the line, the time and course required for the execution of the movement, will increase the distance between the van and the centre, and that part of the line which is intersected attacked. If they tack or wear in the line, the ships are exposed to a raking fire, while the windward divisions of the opposite fleet are ready to interpose, and to prevent their junction with the rear. If, anticipating the intended attack upon their rear, as in Rodney's first engagement off Martinico, they should endeavor to avoid it by veering round, in order to pass on the opposite tack, the fleet to windward may either bear down athwart their course, and bring the headmost ships to a close action, or may renew the attack with the same success against the former van, which is now their rear. Or, if they should endeavor to escape before the wind, their retreat must soon degenerate into an absolute flight, in which the slowest vessels must always be overtaken by the fleet in pursuit."

"The mode of attack from leeward occupies the second part of the work. As the course of a fleet in working to windward is in angular lines, if the advantages upon each side were equal, the distance between two fleets working to windward would continue always the same. But the least disaster to the masts and rigging, even of a single vessel, retards the progress of a fleet to windward, lest that vessel should fall to leeward into the hands of the enemy. Every alteration in the wind enables the fleet to leeward to weather the other; and, as these accidents are unavoidable in cruising, Mr. Clark concludes, that, in the course of a few days, a fleet to leeward must fetch some part at least of the opposite line. Were they to meet on the same tack, the engagement might continue while they held the same course; but the fleet to windward, when desirous to avoid an engagement, has invariably passed the other on an opposite tack. Our fleet, instead of continuing its former course, invariably bore away, when too leeward, in order to engage, as it ranged along the opposite line; but the two fleets, as their courses were different, were necessarily separated after a short cannonade. As the two fleets in Keph-pele's engagement off Ushant, passed each other at the rate of five miles an hour, it appears that each ship was engaged for no more than a quarter of a minute with each opponent, and was exposed but for six minutes and a half to the whole of the fire of the adverse fleet."

"Our author's mode of attack from leeward, seems to have been first suggested by the examination of this unsuccessful engagement. If our fleet, instead of beating away when it reached the enemy's line, had continued close to the wind, in its former course, the opposite line must have been cut in twain, and intersected by ours; and either the rear, when thus separated and obstructed in its course, must have been abandoned by the van, or a close and general engagement must have ensued. Mr. Clerk demonstrates, by a variety of examples, that whether the attack be directed against the centre or rear of the enemy's fleet, whether it be made by the van or centre of the fleet to leeward, the portion of the line which is then intersected and cut off from the rest, must be forced to leeward and taken or destroyed. When the attack is made by the centre, the headmost ships bear away as usual, and engage the leeward; those of the centre pierce the opposite line, and stretching to windward, place the enemy between two fires; the rear remains interposed to obstruct the course of the enemy's rear, or the return of their van. When the line is thus intersected and broken, the van and rear present two distinct objects of attack; but, as these objects are not both to be accomplished, the attack of the rear, which is already far advanced, and where the success is certain, is shown to be far preferable to that of the van, which requires a long pursuit."

After stating, that undoubtedly "the first idea of cutting the line originated with Mr. Clerk,"* the reviewer proceeds with some previous extracts from Mr. Clerk's book, to describe the engagement in which the new mode of attack from leeward was first carried into execution, to wit: that of Lord Rodney on the 12th of April, 1782. In this engagement, "the British fleet was still to leeward, and the two fleets were on opposite tacks. The van bore away along the opposite line, and had it been followed by the centre, nothing memorable would have been achieved that day. But the Formidable, the admiral's ship in the centre, kept close to the wind. On perceiving an opening near the centre of the enemy, Rodney broke through at the head of the rear division, and gave the first example of cutting the line. All the consequences predicted by our author immediately ensued. The rear of the French fleet was driven to leeward in the utmost confusion, and torn to pieces by a raking fire. The van and centre, instead of attempting to rejoin their rear, fled in different directions, under a press of sail. The most unbounded praise is undoubtedly due to the gallant Rodney; nor can it detract in the least from his merit, that he was unable to avail himself to the utmost of a mode of attack never practised before. His van, unprepared perhaps to improve the attack, continued to stretch and to tack to the windward, leaving an opening through which the rear of the enemy was permitted to escape. Abandoning the proper object of attack, namely the enemy's rear, the proximity of which would have rendered its destruction unavoidable, he directed the pursuit of his whole fleet against the distant van; and after a chase of five leagues, which continued till sunset, five ships of the line were captured, but the rest were preserved by the approach of night."

We have read in some part of the British "Naval Chronicle," a different story. Lord Rodney, at a dinner one day in Cornwall, is said to have been struck with this idea all of a sudden, as he was sitting at table, and to have demonstrated it to his convivial associates with the cherry stones of the desert.

"From this first execution of our author's system, a new era has been fixed in the history of our naval transactions. During three successive wars, no decisive engagement had almost ever happened, till Rodney, in the execution of our author's system, gave the first example of cutting the enemy's line. Since that period no engagement has ever proved indecisive; and, with the exception of the battle of the Nile, where the French fleet was at anchor, the same manœuvre has been uniformly practised with the same success.

"In lord St. Vincent's engagement on the 14th of February, 1797, to which the perpendicular attack, or attack at right angles* seems to allude, the Spanish fleet, amounting to twenty-seven sail of the line, was discovered at day-break, extending from windward. By carrying a press of sail, his lordship, with fifteen ships of the line, "disregarding the regular system," intersected and cut off the division to windward, of which four were taken before the remainder of the fleet to leeward could return to their relief."

"In lord Duncan's victory off Camperdown, his lordship, on discovering the Dutch fleet to leeward, bore down, not in a line of battle abreast, but in two divisions or perpendicular lines; and his attack was directed, not, as formerly, against the enemy's van, but according to Mr. Clerk's system, against the centre and rear. His own division cut the line between the eighth and ninth ships. Onslow's division passed between the fourteenth and fifteenth ships from the van; and while the former, or perhaps the Venerable and her two seconds kept the van at bay, the rest engaged with the centre and rear. By departing from the customary line of battle, and confining the attack, or the chief force, to a portion of the enemy's line, six ships of the van escaped; but the centre and rear, with the exception of a single ship, were overpowered and taken."

Having thus extracted the most important parts of the article before us, and given a brief detail of Mr. Clerk's principles for the conduct of general engagements, it is but fair that we should be indulged with a word or two in return. The unexpected length however, to which these remarks have already extended, admonishes us to be short; and we shall therefore content ourselves with merely doing an act of charity to the reviewer, by disencumbering him of the subjoined paragraph,—which, however well it might have applied to the seamen of Great Britain in 1805, most assuredly, at this day, can only apply to the brave tars of the United States.

"In contemplating the beautiful simplicity and unquestioned efficacy of Mr. Clerk's system, it is peculiarly pleasing to reflect, that it is constructed upon principles not less congenial than honorable to the character of the nation for whose use it was intended. This system does not consist in any trick or manœuvre, by which courage may be rendered unnecessary, or gallantry decoyed to its destruction; on the contrary, it proceeds upon the proud presumption that we shall certainly beat our enemies if we can only get near enough to grapple with them: and its sole object is to give the valiant an opportunity of fair fighting, to counteract the shifting policy of a wily adversary,* and to ensure a fair field for the display of courage, discipline, and perseverance, in strenuous and decisive contest." D.

Report to the king on the internal situation of France, on the relations with foreign armies with respect to order and pacification—by the minister of general police.—TRANSLATED FOR THE COLUMBIAN

SIR,—The ravages of France are at their height; the allied powers destroy and devastate her, as if we had neither peace nor accommodation to hope for. The inhabitants are flying before licentious troops; the forests are filled with the wretched, who run there to seek out a last asylum—the bravest are about to perish on the fields—despair will soon hearken no longer to the voice of any authority—and this war, undertaken to assure the triumph of moderation and justice, will equal the barbarity of those lamentable and most cruel invasions whose history cannot be recollected without horror.

The allied powers have proclaimed their doctrine too loudly for us possibly to doubt their magnanimity! What benefit can be drawn from so many useless calamities? Are there no more bonds of faith between nations? Would they retard the reconciliation of Europe with France? One of the views of the sovereigns would appear to be to strengthen your majesty's government, and its authority is unceasingly compromised by the state of impotence to which they have reduced it. Its power is even rendered odious by the evils of which it seems to be the accomplice, because it cannot hinder them. Your majesty signed the treaty of May 25 as an ally, and war is waged against you in a manner the most direct.

The sovereigns know the state of knowledge in France; no reasoning, no species of defect, no kind of inconsequence escapes the penetration of this people—although humbled by necessity, they yield to it with courage. Has not your majesty performed for the interest of the powers and for peace whatever depended on your efforts? Bonaparte has been not only dispossessed, but is in the hands of the allies; his family too are in their power, since they are on their territory. The chambers have been dissolved, and speedily there will be none in public functions but friends of peace and duty. The Bonapartists were feared, though none of them can be dangerous any more—your majesty, in the mean time, having granted every thing on this point which the executive could require!

If, having conquered France, it be pretended that it yet remains to punish her, this language (which ought not to be listened to after the promises of the sovereigns) should exact a serious deliberation on all its consequences. Wherefore would they punish us? Is it for us to expiate the ambition of a single man? the evils which it has produced?—We were its first victims—we have delivered Europe from it twice.—'Tis not in foreign countries, it is in France, that terror always troubled his repose, and spite of his power he could never render the war national—instruments are not accessories—and who is ignorant that he who exercises despotic power always finds in the multitude a force sufficient to make him be obeyed? We are reproached with his successes. They retaliate sufficiently by our reverses. What image brought the news of victory to France if it is not that of the conscriptions, which the sword of war went to reap anew? We have saved ourselves like all Europe, by the same woes and misfortunes.

The army has submitted to your majesty, but it still exists. We ought to explain ourselves with frankness on this head—while the army exists it can be attached only to pacification and public tranquility. Its state of union, far from being an evil, prevents mischief from spreading. The return of soldiers to the bosom of the people, will not be dangerous when the conclusion of the war shall leave to the people the means of resuming their occupations and their habits; but before that moment, fermentation is not yet extinguished, nor obedience established; the mixture of soldiers with citizens could not but throw fresh combustibles into the flame—it is too painful to reflect that such a state of things should have no other source than the terror of some cabinets. On the opinion they entertain of the situation of France, depends whether their desires should be accomplished. There is no sacrifice to which an enlightened people will not submit, if they find in it the means of preventing greater evils. Such is the disposition, such the determination of all the French.—Would they [the allies] on the contrary obtain measures of anticipation for unknown plans? It is to demand an impossibility: there is no blind obedience in France.—The powers have hitherto unfolded none of their designs; no one can form an idea of what is to be done, either of the government, or the authority of your majesty, or of the future.

Anxiety and doubt are at their height, and every thing appears a subject of terror in this obscurity—but a single word, and all the dispositions of men's minds would be changed. There should be no obstacle to any measure, if it formed part of a general plan that should offer in its whole scope some encouragement for obedience. Let the sovereigns deign then to explain themselves. Why would they refuse this act of justice? Let them condescend to combine all their demands as so many conditions of the quietness of the people, and let our accession to all their views make part of a mutual treaty—there will then be no more difficulty. The sovereigns perhaps do not fully observe in what embarrassments and what obstructions they place us and themselves. We should have need of good order to second them, and of their explications to establish this good order. Would they have sacrifices who require a peremptory obedience? For that purpose the authority of your majesty must be full and entire. Nothing is possible, nothing practicable, if peace exist not in fact, at least provisionally; and far from being at peace, we experience all the scourges of war.

Let the sovereigns at least bestow some attention to their interests. When every thing will be wasted around their armies, how shall these armies find their subsistence? Is there no hazard in scattering the troops? All the arms are not yet taken away [from the French people] and every man becomes murderous in the hands of despair. With respect to contributions of war, what new sacrifices should they demand, where the soldier shall have destroyed all? As it regards the force of armies, discipline once relaxed is hard to be re-established. Germany has no room to expect but that after a glorious campaign, she will bring back her soldiers corrupted by a spirit of licentiousness, caprice and pillage. Every thing ought to distinguish this war from others, instead of imitating, surpassing, even in France, the excess against which the sovereigns take up arms.—Their glory, will even that be satisfied. We have done whatever they have desired—and on their side, of all that they announced to the world, is it accomplished on a single point?—What a contrast between their performance and their most solemn promises! This is the age of reason and justice, and never has public opinion had greater influence. What can account for afflictions so excessive, after promise of so much moderation? The present war has been commenced to maintain the cause of legitimacy—is this manner of conducting the war adapted to render your majesty's authority more sacred? The allies resolved to dethrone and punish him who made a sport of the calamities of nations; and they exercise on submissive France the same violence, the same inhumanity. All Europe thought that the entry of the sovereigns into Paris would finish the war;—what will they think on learning that it was only then the extravagancies of oppression began, without battles and without resistance? The distresses which they upbraid us for having brought on other countries have never been so great; never—at least, they did not take place when the employment of armies had no longer any other object; and if it were true that we had given such an example of the abuse of force, ought they to imitate it, since they impute it to us as a crime? They well know in the north, they know in Prussia, what energy and public spirit our want of moderation produced in our enemies.—There could be no end to the evils of humanity if alternate vengeance became a right of war; for nations never die.

Will your majesty permit me to insist on a concluding consideration? So long as France shall have any thing to preserve; whilst she shall cherish hopes of sustaining herself as a national body, no sacrifice will be impossible to her, and all the schemes of an equitable policy may yet be executed: but, the day when the inhabitants shall have lost all, when their ruin shall be completed, we shall see a new order of things commence, a new series of events, because there will be neither government or obedience—Blind fury shall succeed to resignation; they will take no council but from despair; they will desolate on both sides; pillage will make war upon pillage; every step of the foreign soldier will be stained with blood—France will have less shame in destroying herself than in suffering others to destroy her. That moment approaches: Already is the national spirit taking this frightful direction: a fusion is forming among parties the most opposite; Vendée itself in this excess of calamities brings her colors nearer those of the army. What part will be left your majesty but to retire? Public functionaries will of themselves abandon their places, and the armies of the sovereigns will then be within the hold of individuals freed from all social obligations. A people of thirty millions may disappear from the earth, but in this war of man against man, more than one tomb will enclose together both victors and vanquished.

☞ It is proper to observe that the preceding report was not permitted to be published in the Paris papers—the allies (who do not interfere with the internal affairs of France!) forbid it!—but it was circulated in manuscript. [ED. REG.]

SPANISH PROCLAMATION.

Translated for the Columbian.

Proclamation of the general of the Spanish army to the Frenchmen of the bordering districts:

The troops of the king, my master, enter the French territory, not to commit hostilities, but to suppress the ferocity of a faction who are not satisfied with the calamities they have occasioned, by which they have compromised the throne of his most catholic majesty and the tranquility of his subjects. In the declaration of the 2d of May, it is said, that the Spanish army should not wage war against France, but the faction which desolates it; that it avows no other conquest than the repose of France herself, in restoring her king, called to the throne by the fundamental laws of the state, whose prostration has plunged the whole kingdom in sadness and bereavement.

The chief of the disturbers of the public quiet is no longer at their head, but his spirit still animates his followers.

King Louis XVIII. is on his throne, but his virtues have not yet completed the conquest of minds, bewildered by the genius of evil. All the declarations of the king, my master, are, that the troops which enter the domains of his Catholic majesty, must neither ravage nor dismember the smallest part of them, but protect and preserve them faithfully, as a sacred trust.

CASTANOS.

The following is an extract of a letter from the Prussian general Ribbentrop, to the prefect of Paris, respecting the Prussian requisitions.

"This measure has been dictated to me by the commander in chief. You and your fellow citizens cannot tax it with injustice, when I remind you of the overtures which I have several times made you respecting the demands of prince Blücher.

"You know that in 1806, 7 and 8, Prussia, under the administration of M. Daru, not only lost its prosperity, but was ruined by the enormous mass of requisitions and extortions to which it was subjected. You know what was done in 1809, 10 and 11, to exhaust the kingdom—nor can I dissemble, that in 1812, though then in alliance with France, several of our provinces suffered treatment of which the most cruel enemy would hardly have been guilty.

"It was in 1813 that we shook off the yoke of tyranny. The victorious arms of the allies delivered France from a dynasty under which that fine country had groaned for so many years.

"The inconceivable efforts which Prussia made to support this contest, after six years of oppression, signalized by all kinds of extortion and arbitrary treatment, put it out of our power to make a suitable provision for the equipment, the pay, and other wants of the armies again called forth to combat Bonaparte and his adherents.

"You pretend that the contribution of 100 millions of francs exceeds the ability of your city. Ask count Daru what Berlin, a city of quarter the size of yours, was obliged to furnish, and you will be convinced it greatly exceeds the demand of prince Blücher upon the capital of France. If we treated your provinces as you did ours, from 1806 to 1812, the contributions to be imposed, according to that standard, might exceed your ability.

"But far from using reprisals, we have hitherto demanded only the reimbursement of the expenses of the war; for the budgets of our financiers have no head for exorbitant impositions levied in foreign countries, such as were found in the budgets of France, previous to the year 1814.

"Last year the conquest of Paris ended the war. In this campaign, the same conquest has been the object of our labors; to attain it, we have been forced to make promises to the troops—not such promises as the French leader made to his army before the defeats on the Katzbach, near Culm, and Donnewitz, which hindered him from performing them; but such as generous conquerors make to modest soldiers, whose welfare they value, and whose courage they know how to appreciate. It is by the contribution that the promises must be fulfilled."

[All this is very well—but the allies said, they merely took up arms to put down Bonaparte, and let Louis be king.]

ORDINANCE OF THE KING.

Louis, by the grace of God, king of France and Navarre, to all to whom these presents shall come, greeting.

The attempts made upon France, have compelled the foreign powers to cause their armies to enter, in order to strike at the enemy of their state. They occupy our territory: these evils would have been prevented, if our voice had been more listened to. But far from our hearts be all recrimination. The sufferings of our people permit us only to think of alleviating them, till the moment, not very distant, arrives, which shall put an end to them. Circumstances are such, that we have not the choice of means, we must embrace that which appears to present the least inconvenience, and to be the most proper to recalling to share the burthens, those upon whom the requisitions have least pressed.

We have, therefore, determined, to establish, provisionally, an extraordinary contribution, distributed among the different departments in proportion to their resources, trusting, that however grievous these sacrifices may be, they will be less so than the maintenance of a regime without order or method.

Full of confidence in the patriotism of the principal merchants, proprietors and capitalists, we desire to associate them to our solicitude for the relief of their fellow countrymen, ruined by events, without intending, however, that the sums which they shall pay beyond their contributive part shall remain definitively charged to them, and only considering them as loans made to give to the extraordinary receipt an acceleration proportioned to the urgency of the necessity.

Considering, that the evil which increases every day will not permit us to wait for the meeting of the two chambers in order to concert with them the measures which must be adopted:

For these causes we have ordained and do ordain as follows—

Article 1. There shall be levied extraordinary, and paid into the royal treasury as a requisition of war, a sum of one hundred millions on the departments, and in the proportions determined by the annexed statement.

2. There shall be added to the contingent of such departments, a fund of non-valeurs not exceeding ten centimes for each franc, by means of which the whole of this contingent may be available to the treasury.

3. The sum which from this fund shall remain disposable, shall belong to the department, and shall be employed for its private expenses.

4. The prefect shall determine as to those unable to pay, according to the opinion of the sub-prefect, and on the report of the director of the direct contributions.

5. The extraordinary charge here referred to, shall be provisionally borne by the principal capitalists, patent-holders, and proprietors in each department.

6. The defensive mode of levying this war contribution, and of reimbursing those sums which may have been paid beyond the contingent, shall be fixed by the two chambers.

7. In order to determine the sum which each capitalist, patent-holder or proprietor is to furnish, a committee shall be formed in each prefecture, composed of the mayor of the chief place, the receiver-general, &c. &c.

8. This committee shall be charged—

I. With apportioning among the different arrondissements the contingent which is assigned to the department.

II. To arrange the individual proportion between the principal capitalists, patent-holders and proprietors.

9. In the individual assessment of the contingent of the other arrondissement, there shall be formed a special committee.

10. Relates to the committees of department and arrondissement.

11. Relates to the time in which the returns are to be made out.

12. The sum to be levied upon each of the principal capitalists, patent-holders and proprietors, shall be paid by four instalments, between the 15th of September and the 15th of November, at periods which shall be determined by the committee.

13. The receivers-general, in particular in their respective arrondissements, shall issue drafts payable at such periods as may be indicated.

14. These drafts, when presented, are to be accepted by the person upon whom they are drawn, and are liable to all judicial processes, the same as in commercial transactions.

15. All refusal or delay in accepting the said drafts, shall be certified by a protest in the usual manner, and which will render the amount of the draft immediately exigible: the recovery thereof to be made by coercion.

16. The receivers-general in particular shall enjoy, for the collecting of this extraordinary contribution, the same fees as for the direct ordinary contributions, the said fees to be charged upon the funds of the non-valeurs.

17. Our minister, secretary of state for finance, is charged with the execution of the present ordinance.

Given at the Thuilleries, this 16th of August, 1815.

(Signed)

LOUIS.

By the king,

Baron Louis, minister of finance.

(Next follows a list of the sums charged to each department respectively. That charged on the department of the Seine amounts to 13,340,000 francs, and that on the Gironde to 5,330,000 francs.

BONAPARTE. From the London Morning Chronicle.—We guarantee the authenticity of the following passages extracted from the conversation that lord Lowther and Mr. Lyttleton had with Bonaparte on board the Northumberland.

In remonstrating against the detention, Bonaparte said, "you know not my character; you ought to have trusted to my word of honor."

One of the gentlemen answered him: "Allow me to tell you, that since the invasion of Spain, there is not a single person in England who does not distrust you and your most solemn engagements."

"I was," replied Bonaparte, "called into Spain by the sovereign."

But not, as I believe, replied the gentleman, to place king Joseph upon the throne.

Bonaparte—I had a grand political system; it was necessary to establish a counterpoise to your power upon the ocean; and, besides, I did no more than the Bourbons had done.

—You must, however, acknowledge, general, that France, under your sceptre, was far more to be dreaded, than France as she was during the last years of the reign of Louis XIV; so much had her power increased.

Bonaparte.—"England, on her side, had become much more powerful."

He then spoke of our colonies and of our requisitions in India.

Bonaparte—"I wanted to regenerate Spain, and to do much what the Cortes has attempted to do since."

He was then called back to the principal topic, and was reminded of the character of the transaction that had put him in possession of the crown of Spain. He made no reply to those objections, but turned the conversation to the subject of his detention, and said, after a discussion of some length: "Well, I am then deceived in relying upon your generosity; restore or replace me in the situation from which you took me." In speaking of the invasion of Spain: "I was," said he, "sovereign at that time; I had the right of making war."

He said of Mr. Fox: "I knew him; I saw him at the Thuilleries; he had no prejudices."

— "Mr. Fox, general, was a zealous citizen of his own country, and moreover, a citizen of the world."

"He wished sincerely for peace," replied Bonaparte, "and I wished for it also; his death prevented peace from being made—The other negotiators were not sincere."

Bonaparte added further: "I do not say, that during twenty years of war, I did not meditate the ruin of England." Then correcting himself, as if he had inadvertently said more than prudence permitted; "that is to say, your humiliation; I wanted to force you to be just towards me."

He appeared neither agitated nor cast down—his expressions, sometimes energetic, were always uttered with calmness, and he gesticulated much less than the French or Italians are accustomed to do.

London, August 20.—When Napoleon first boarded the Bellerophon, he said to captain Maitland, with his usual quickness: Come captain Maitland, suppose we walk over your ship." To this the captain replied, by saying that the decks were then washing, and that the ship was consequently not in a state to be inspected—that he had better wait an hour or so, &c. To this Bonaparte responded: "No, no, captain Maitland, let us go now, I have been accustomed to wet and dry, and confusion, &c. &c. for upwards of 20 years, and I must see her in her present state." He did so, and inspected her with all the alacrity, minuteness, and curiosity so characteristic of him, walking several times over the ship. After this he expressed himself highly delighted with the admirable economy of a British man of war. One day addressing an old marine, he asked him "how long he had served?" The reply was "sixteen years." "Where are your marks of distinction then?" "I have none," answered the marine; Bonaparte shrugged up his shoulders and retired. When lord Keith communicated to Bonaparte his intended removal to the Northumberland, and conveyance in that ship to St. Helena, he appeared very uneasy at the communication, and after a long expostulation, sternly refused to go; but on lord Keith's observing that such was the order of his government and that he hoped he should not be under the necessity of resorting to coercive measures;—Bonaparte replied—"Oh no, no: Your command I must obey! You may take me, but recollect I do not go with my own free will." He then formally protested, in writing, against the act before witnesses. As soon as his baggage had been removed from one ship to the other, the parting scene commenced, which was truly affecting. All wept, but particularly Savary, and a Polish officer (six feet two inches high) who had been exalted from the ranks by Bonaparte. He clung to his master's knees; wrote an affectionate letter to lord Keith, entreating permission to accompany him, even in the most menial capacity, which could not be admitted. Previous to the moment of separation, Bonaparte gave some of his officers, left behind, a certificate to the following effect, which had been first drawn up, at the general request, by general Gorgaud, and then altered by Bonaparte himself, and signed:

"Circumstances prevent my retaining you any longer near me. You have served me with zeal. I have always been satisfied with you. Your conduct on this last occasion deserves my praise, and what I had reason to expect from you. On board the Northumberland, 7th August, 1815. NAPOLEON."

The words in italics were substituted by Bonaparte, for "in my prosperity you have served me with zeal; and in accompanying me in my adversity, you have confirmed the good opinion I had of you. Receive my thanks."

After settling with his followers and domestics, he had about £200 to carry with him. The persons suffered to attend Bonaparte were Bertrand, his wife and children; Montholon, his wife and child; Gorgaud and Las Cases. Among those separated from him were Savary and L'Allemand, now on board the Bellerophon; lieutenant-col. de Planet, M. Manigaut, lieutenant-col. Designe and Sheltz, captains Anteri, Merscher and Poniatowski, besides two other officers and eight servants, on board the Eurotas. Before he bade adieu to capt. Maitland, Bonaparte shook him by the hand, with an air of cordiality, offered him his grateful thanks for his polite attentions, and also his officers, to whom he expressed himself highly indebted. Madame Bertrand's attempt to drown herself arose, it is said, from her understanding, at this moment, that it was intended to deliver up her husband to Louis XVIII. We understand the hon. rear admiral Fleming is to have the command at St. Helena, in the peace, and that he will proceed thither soon after Sir G. Cockburn has established Bonaparte upon the island.

Paris, August 18. The English journals, in stating that Bonaparte tore various papers and threw them into the sea before his removal from the Bellerophon to the Northumberland, make mention of a letter addressed to him by an inhabitant of the United States of America. The same journals have announced, that all the fragments of this letter were found and joined together in such a manner as to throw light upon an important affair, which the English government thinks fit not to make public as yet. Nothing, therefore, is known respecting the contents of this paper; but it might relate to the property which Bonaparte has placed in the hands of a very distinguished person of New England, and which was actually embarked at Havre, through the care of this person, on board the only American ship that was excepted from the general embargo laid for three weeks on the ports of France. This fact, the accuracy of which may be relied on, will sufficiently explain the reason why Bonaparte did not carry with him so much wealth as he was supposed to possess. It is nevertheless known that he made good use of his time during his stay at Paris. It was considered as certain that several waggons, heavily laden, were sent off clandestinely from the Thuilleries and the Elysee Bourbon. Every body was persuaded that these waggons contained bullion and valuable effects; it was added that they proceeded towards the coast, and nothing was more easy, since ammunition was sent at the same time in that direction. This business is, perhaps, worthy the attention of the sovereigns.

Gazette de France.

It is one of the most considerable and important facts, that large bodies of foreign troops are still pouring into France, which seems to countenance certain rumors that that country is to be cut up into small principalities, or divided among the high allies and their adherents—as Russia, Prussia and Austria DELIVERED Poland. Let it be recollected, that they entered that "ancient and venerable" kingdom, which has long stood the "bulwark of religion" against the Turks, with the pretence of restoring its internal tranquility. Whose turn will come next?

By a vessel from Madeira, we hear of the arrival at that island of the Northumberland 74, a frigate, and 7 men of war brigs, with Napoleon Bonaparte on board, on his way to St. Helena, with the 53d British regiment (full complement) as his guard. No person was permitted to board the Northumberland but the British consul, a Scotchman, in his capacity as navy agent. The fleet left Madeira, August 26, having obtained supplies.

Turin, August 5.—The journal of this city publishes the following letters which were intercepted, together with some other papers:

Copy of a letter from Lucien Bonaparte to the princess Borghese.

NEUILLY, June 27.—You must have learned, my dear Pauline, the new misfortunes of the emperor, who has just abdicated in favor of his son. He is about to depart for the United States of America, where we will rejoin him. He is full of courage and calmness; I shall endeavor to regain my family at Rome, in order to conduct it to America. If your health permit, we shall see you there. Adieu, my dear sister; mother, Joseph, Jerome, and myself, embrace you. Your affectionate brother, LUCIEN.

P. S.—I have retired to your fine estate of Neuilly.

Letter from cardinal Fesch to the same.

PARIS, June 28.—Lucien set off yesterday for London, in order to get passports for the rest of the family. Joseph, and also Jerome, will wait for their passports. Lucien has left here his second daughter, who has just arrived from England; she will set off again in a few days. I foresee the United States will be the end of the chase. I think you ought to remain in Italy; but recollect that character is one of the most estimable gifts of the Creator, with which he has enriched your family. Exercise courage, then, and strength of mind, to rise superior to misfortune; let no economy appear a sacrifice. At this moment we are all poor. Your mother and brothers embrace you. Your affectionate uncle, Cardinal FESCH.

Independence of France!

A Paris paper, of August 25, gives the following as "the division of the French departments, to be occupied by the troops of the high allied powers." When it is recollected that nothing is published in the French papers without being inspected by officers of the government, entire reliance may be placed on the facts as given:—

1. Prussian army, head-quarters of field-marshal Blucher de Wahlstadt, Caen. The army will occupy the departments of Finistere Morbihan, Cotes du Nord, Manche, Ille et Vilaine, Calvados, Orde, Mayenne, Sarthe, Eure et Loire, Lower Seine, as far as the right bank of the Seine, Eure, Loir et Cher.

Indre et Loire, Maine et Loire, Lower Loire, as far as the right bank of the Loire.

2. The Prussian army will occupy in common with the English and Austrian armies, the departments of the Seine and of the Seine et Oise, as far as the left bank of the Seine.

3. The English armies and that of the Low-Countries, field-marshal duke of Wellington has his head-quarters at Paris. The army will occupy the departments of the Lower Seine et Oise, upon the right bank of the Seine, Lys Nord, Seine et Marne, Somme, Pasde, Calais Oise.

4. Russian army: head-quarters of field-marshal count Barclay de Tolly, Melun. The army will occupy the departments of Seine et Marne, upon the right bank of the Seine, Aisne Ardennes, Marne, Meuse Moselle Meurthe, Haute Marne, the fourth part, l'Aube, one third.

5. Bavarian army: head-quarters of field-marshal prince de Wrede, Auxerre. The army will occupy the department of the Loiret, and as far as the Loire, Yonne, Nièvre, Aube, the two-thirds Haute Marne, the three-fourths, Vosges.

6. The troops of Wurtemberg, and of Hesse Darmstadt, under orders of his highness the prince royal of Wurtemberg, will occupy the departments of l'Allier, and of Puy de Dome.

7. The Austrian army: head-quarters of field-marshal prince Schwartzenburg, Fontainebleau. The army of the Upper Rhine will occupy the departments of Cantal, Lozere, Gard Loire, Upper Loire, Mouths of the Rhone, Vaucluse, Lower Alps, Var. The army of Italy will occupy the departments of Cote d'Or, Upper Soane, Soane et Loire, Jura, Doubs, Rhone, Ain, Mont Blanc Isere, Ardeche, Drome, Upper Alps.

8. The Saxon troops and those of Baden, will occupy the departments of the Upper and Lower Rhine.

There is not in this, however, any arrangement for the Spaniards, who are pouring into the South of France, most gallantly!

Paris, August 19.—At the moment the king ascended his carriage at 4 o'clock this day, Madame Labedoyere threw herself at his feet, to solicit pardon for her husband. The king answered, that if M. Labedoyere had only offended him, his pardon should be granted; but that all France called for the punishment of the man who had brought upon it all the horrors of war. His majesty was very much affected, and it was to be seen how much he suffered from being obliged to resist the impulses of his heart. The king, who knows how to unite goodness and justice, deigned to promise Madame Labedoyere his protection for her and her infant.

At 6 o'clock, the moment when the king was returning from his ride, the mother of Labedoyere was in the court of the chateau, for the purpose of trying her intercession with his majesty. Seeing that measures were taken for preventing her approaching him, and renewing a scene as painful as useless, she retired. She was in deep mourning.

August 20.—Yesterday evening colonel Labedoyere arrived at the spot designed for his execution, where he fell on his knees and received the blessings of his confessor, who accompanied him; after which he rose, and without waiting for the bandage being placed over his eyes, bared his bosom to the veterans who were appointed to shoot him, and cried out:—Surtout ne me manquez pas—(mind, do not miss me.) In a moment after he was no more.

The cavalry of the army of the Loire has its cantonments in the departments of Tarn and Garonne. This army, which has preserved to France 500 pieces of artillery, was at the time of its disbanding 60,000.

August 12.—Poland has cordially submitted to Russia, agreeably to the provisions of the great treaty of Vienna. Prince Sulkowski has laid the homage and oaths of the army of Poland at the feet of Alexander, as emperor of all the Russias and king of Poland.

The Danish army left Altona on the 31st of July, for France, to join the head-quarters of the duke of Wellington, near Paris.

August 4.—The trial of the Bonaparteau officer, who commanded in Conde, for the murder of the British general Gordon, who carried a summons for the surrender of the place, occasions much excitement. Some palliations of the conduct of this commander having appeared in the Gazette de France, the brother of the general has addressed the following note to the editor:

Paris, August 3, 1815.

"Sir—The military assassination committed on the person of adjutant general Gordon, at Conde, will form the subject of a trial, which will exhibit, in a clear light, the true circumstances which preceded and accompanied that crime. It is in vain that his assassins endeavor to avert public indignation by their misrepresentations. No imprudence was committed by their victim. If he was not accompanied by a trumpeter, it will appear on the trial, that he neither could nor ought to have had one at that moment. Besides, such a circumstance could, at farthest, have only excused their firing upon and killing Mr. Gordon before he entered the town; but having reached the presence of the military chiefs, who dared to condemn him to death, who brought to them, in the king's name, the pardon of their treason, the absence of a trumpeter was a mere defect of form which had received its explanation.

"No, it was a flag of truce sent in the name of the king, to summon Conde to surrender; it was an officer invested with the external signs of his rank, and the bearer of papers authorising his mission, that these cowards massacred. It was a military commission that condemned men to be shot.

"He whom death has thus deprived of the best of brothers, while he stifles his grief, fixes his eyes with confidence on the throne of a monarch as just as good, before whose face the most odious of crimes will not remain unpunished.

(Signed) "JAMES GORDON."

London, Aug. 11.—By advices from Genoa, to the 15th July, upwards of 20 small privateers were out from Porto Ferrajo, [isle of Elba] infesting those seas, and greatly interrupting the trade; two vessels, one from Trifeste to Leghorn, and the other from Leghorn to Tunis, are said to have been captured by them.

The Vry Zee, Riedyke, from Lisbon to the Baltic, has been taken by an Algerine frigate and was carried into Algiers on the 3d of June.

August 20.—It intimated from Brussels, that the expected occupation by the allies, of the second line of the French fortresses (Valenciennes, Conde, &c.) has created a great sensation in the north of France.

From Vienna, it is said that all the armies of reserve have been ordered to march to France; likewise a park of artillery from Olmütz.

August 23.—In the foreign news, in the French papers, under the head of Austria, there is a protest dated Vienna, 11th June, by the mediatised princes (the inferior states formerly comprised under the denomination of the confederation of the Rhine,) against the decision of the congress of Vienna. The protest is couched in the strongest terms of remonstrance, and shows that the great powers composing the confederacy have not satisfied all parties by their balancing decisions. It would appear also that the king of Prussia and the sovereign prince of the Netherlands are likely to disagree about the new partitions. His Prussian majesty has an eye to more of the Belgian territory, than his Dutch ally is willing to surrender, and wants the sovereign prince to get indemnified from France, by the help of England! Modesty and moderation we believe, are not reckoned among the political virtues.

Of the first levy of 100 millions of francs in France to pay for its deliverance, Paris was required to pay 30, and Bordeaux 5 millions—for general use, a five francs may be considered as §1. This requisition has immensely cooled the zeal of the royalists of Bordeaux—but when the second, and the third, and the fourth, and the fifth, and the sixth like payments shall be required—we think they will seriously think of that sort of patriotism that invites insolent foreigners to settle domestic questions of right.

The British ministerial papers are loud in their dictations of what the king of France SHALL DO.—They have designated many persons, by name, who must be executed, and spoken of others who must be expelled from a participation in the affairs of the king's government. Fouche appears, however, to have made a perfect amnesty with those folks.

Catholic emancipation. It is stated that a bill will be introduced into the British parliament giving "unqualified" emancipation to British Roman Catholic subjects in Ireland, reserving to the crown the payment of the clergy. And no doubt the priests, if paid as well, will become as loyal subjects as their protestant brethren—"money does the business."

BATTLE OF NIAGARA.

We have been requested to publish the following letter of general BROWN to generals PORTER and MILLER, and their reply.—Boston Patriot.

Head-Quarters, Buffalo, July 28, 1815.

Major general PORTER, and
Brig. general MILLER,

Gentlemen—Not a doubt resting upon my mind, but that the enemy were defeated and driven from the field of battle on the 25th of last July near the Falls of Niagara, leaving us in peaceable possession of the whole of his artillery, I have upon all occasions so stated. Learning that some diversity of opinion has appeared upon this subject so interesting to the army, I have to request of you, gentlemen, to state your view of this subject. You remained upon the field after I had left it, and know if the enemy did or did not appear when our army marched off; or if a gun was fired for a considerable time before the army moved upon its taking up the line of march, or on its way to camp. I do not enquire of you who were the heroes of this day, or what corps particularly distinguished themselves; but I call upon you to vindicate the fair and honest fame of the army—of that gallant army, which has done so much to exalt the national character. It is believed that no equal number of men have ever done more. Do not permit its glory to be tarnished by the faults or the follies of its commanders. We have none of us any claims to infallibility. The victory achieved was by Americans; and that fact being established is all that concerns the honor of the country or the reputation of her arms.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
(Signed) JACOB BROWN.

ANSWER.

Buffalo, July 29th, 1815.

Sir—In answer to your letter of this date, we have no hesitation in saying that, in our opinion, the character of every incident attending the battle near Niagara Falls, and particularly the mode of its termination, exhibits clear and unequivocal evidence that it resulted in a decisive victory on the part of the American army.

We found the enemy in possession of a commanding eminence, in the centre of open and extensive fields, without any woods, ravines, or other cover sufficiently near to favor our attack; and supported by 9 pieces of field ordnance—from this position they were driven at the point of the bayonet, with the loss of all their artillery. After our army had possessed itself of their position and artillery, the enemy received reinforcements, and made not less than three deliberate, well arranged, and desperate charges to regain them: in each of which he was driven back in confusion, with the loss of many prisoners; but the darkness of the night and the surrounding woods did not permit our army to avail itself as it might under the circumstances of these repeated successes.

The battle commenced a little before sunset and terminated at near eleven o'clock. After the enemy disappeared for the last time, they exhibited evidence of great confusion by distant and scattered firing in the woods, and our troops were drawn up in great order on the field of battle, forming three sides of a hollow square, with the whole of our own and the enemy's artillery in the centre. In this situation we remained for more than an hour.

and in our opinion the troops were in a condition to act with more decisive effect than at any former period of the contest. During this interval we do not recollect to have heard a gun, or seen any other indication of the enemy's being near us; and at the close of it the army retired slowly to camp three miles distant, without any molestation by, or appearance of a foe. We left on the field the enemy's artillery and other trophies of victory, which were at the time of leaving it, and had been for a long time before in our undisturbed possession.

We are, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servants.

(Signed) JAMES MILLER.

To the Editors of the Mercantile Advertiser.

GENTLEMEN—I hand you for publication a letter, which was received in my absence from the country, from his excellency governor Shelby, of Kentucky. Since my return sickness has prevented an earlier attention to its publication. As the sentiments which it expresses are general with respect to our navy and private armed vessels, I conceive it my duty, for that reason, to give it publicity; and it is likewise due to the officers and crew of the General Armstrong, thus to make known to them the approbation of his excellency.

SAM. C. REID.

New-York, Oct. 13, 1815.

FRANKFORD, (Ky.) May 8, 1815.

SIR—The return of peace to our country, upon honorable terms, with a national character exalted in an eminent degree, affords us leisure to review the various conflicts in which that character has been developed.

On the ocean, where we had most to dread, we have found a rich harvest of glory; and the American tars have secured to themselves the admiration of the world. To the officers and crews of our public vessels, much is due; and the nation, through its public functionaries, and in other forms, has fully demonstrated its gratitude. We are not less indebted to the officers and crews of our private armed vessels—instances of talents, skill, discipline and of a determined unconquerable bravery have been manifested by our privateersmen; when their situations might have presented to ordinary minds sufficient inducement for avoiding the contest, nothing but a generous and noble patriotism could have led to such deeds; I have no reason to believe that the nation at large is not fully impressed with the gratitude due to this class of our heroes. But I have regretted that there has been so few demonstrations of that sentiment; you will, therefore, although a stranger to you, permit me for myself, individually, and on behalf the state over which I have the honor to preside, to assure you that the conduct of your yourself and of your officers and crew in defence of the General Armstrong, in the port of Fayal, merits the first applause of the nation, and is duly appreciated by our citizens.

No one conflict during the war has placed the American character in so proud a view.

The baseness of the attack in a neutral port, the overwhelming force of the assailants; the small prospect of success to yourself and crew, and the unparalleled disparity of loss, demonstrated a combination of talents, skill and heroism, seldom equalled, and never surpassed.

I trust our government will lose no time in demanding a fair remuneration of the vessel and her apparel, &c. and that it will be prosecuted with effect.

May you, your officers and crew, long live to enjoy the laurels you so nobly won.

I have the honor to be, with high consideration of respect and esteem, sir, your most obedient servant,
ISAAC SHELBY.

Capt. Saml. C. Reid, late commander of the U. S. privateer General Armstrong.

DEFENCE OF STONINGTON.

The defence of Stonington by a handful of brave citizens, was more like an effusion of feeling, warm from the heart, than a concerted military movement. The result of it we all know, and it afforded sincere delight to every patriot. But the particulars we have never seen so accurately described as in the following concise narrative from the chairman of the committee of defence to the secretary of war, of which we have been favored with a copy for publication.—Nat Int.

To the hon. Wm. H. Crawford, secretary of war.

STONINGTON BOROUGH, Aug. 21, 1815.

SIR—The former secretary of war put into my care, as chairman of the committee of defence, the two 18 pounders, and all the munitions of war, that was here, belonging to the general government, to be used for the defence of the town—and I gave my receipt for the same.

As there is no military officer here, it becomes my duty to inform you the use we have made of it. That on the 9th of August last, the Ramilies 74, the Pactolus 44, the Terror bomb-ship, and the Despatch gun brig, anchored off the harbor. Commodore Hardy sent off a boat, with a flag; we met him with another from the shore, when the officer of the flag handed me a note from commodore Hardy, informing that one hour was given the unoffending inhabitants, before the town would be destroyed.

We returned to the shore, where all the male inhabitants were collected, when I read the note aloud; they all exclaimed, they would defend the place to the last extremity, and if it was destroyed, they would be buried in the ruins.

We repaired to a small battery that we had hove up—nailed our colors to the flag staff—others lined the shore with their muskets.

At about seven in the evening, they put off five barges and a large launch, carrying from 32 to 9 lb. carronades in their bows, and opened their fire from their shipping, with bombs, carcasses, rockets, round, grape and cannister shot, and sent their boats to land under cover of their fire. We let them come within small grape distance, when we opened our fire upon them, from our two 18 pounders with round and grape shot; they soon retreated out of grape distance, and attempted a landing on the east side of the village; we dragged a six pounder that we had mounted over, and met them with grape, and all our muskets opened their fire on them, so that they were willing to retreat the second time. They continued their fire 'till 11 at night.

The next morning at seven o'clock, the brig Despatch anchored within pistol shot of our battery, and they sent five barges and two large launches, to land under cover of their whole fire (being joined by the Nimrod 20 gun brig.) When the boats approached within grape distance, we opened our fire on them with round and grape shot; they retreated and came round the east side of the town; we checked them with our six pounder and muskets, 'till we dragged over one of our 18 pounders—we put in a round shot, and about 40 or 50 lb. of grape, and placed it in the centre of their boats as they were rowing up in a line and firing on us; we tore one of their barges all in pieces—so that two, one on each side, had to lash her up to keep her from sinking. They retreated out of grape distance, and we turned our fire upon the brig, and expended all our cartridges but five, which we reserved for the boats, if they made another attempt to land. We then lay four hours without being able to annoy the enemy in the least, except from muskets on the brig, while the fire from the whole fleet was directed against our buildings. After the third express to New-London, some fixed ammunition arrived; we then turned our cannon on the brig, and she soon cut her cable and drifted out.

The whole fleet then weighed, and anchored nearly out of reach of our shot, and continued this and the next day to bombard the town.

They set the buildings on fire in more than twenty places, and we as often put them out. In the three days bombardment they sent on shore 60 tons of metal, and strange to tell, wounded only one man, since dead. We have picked up 15 tons, including some that was taken up out of the water, and the two anchors that we got. We took up and buried four poor fellows that were hove overboard out of the sinking barge.

Since peace, the officers of the Despatch brig have been on shore here; they acknowledge they had 21 killed, and 50 badly wounded; and further say, had we continued our fire any longer, they should have struck, for they were in a sinking condition, for the wind then blew at S. W. directly into the harbor. Before the ammunition arrived, it shifted round to north, and blew out of the harbour. All the shot suitable for the cannon we have reserved. We have now more 18 pound shot than was sent us by government. We have put the two cannon in the arsenal, and housed all the munitions of war.

London, August 22.—The sentence of the court martial upon the honorable colonel Mullins, has been sent over from Dublin, for the approbation of the prince regent. The trial lasted twenty-six days.

Naval courts martial.—On Monday week a court martial was held at Portsmouth on captain Stephen Popham, late acting captain of the Montreal, in the lakes in Canada, for having, contrary to a verbal order of commodore sir James Lucas Yeo, attacked a flotilla of American boats, in a creek on that lake, which were proceeding from Oswego to Sackett's Harbor, with stores of every description for the equipment of a large ship that was building in the latter harbor. The court determined, that a verbal order had been given to captain Popham not to go into any creek, in his endeavor to intercept the expected boats with stores; but that having unexpectedly found them in Sandy Creek, and having been greedily reinforced, by taking under his orders a division of armed boats, under captain Spilsbury, and in a manner which could not have been contemplated by sir James L. Yeo, he was fully justified in making the attack which he did, under the consideration of the importance it was to the service that the boats should not reach Sackett's Harbor, and therefore, adjudged him to be acquitted.

The court could not forbear stating their regret, that sir James L. Yeo should have used such reproachful expressions in his letter to the admiralty, which stated captain Popham's capture; and also their high disapprobation of the severe imputation contained in captain P's defence against his commanding officer, for having offered himself as a witness in the support of the charges—which it was his duty to do.

A court martial was held on Friday and Saturday to enquire into the circumstances attending the loss of the British squadron on lake Champlain, and to try capt. Pring, the next senior officer after the death of capt. Downie, and the officers under his command for the same. The prosecution closed on Saturday afternoon, and yesterday the several officers would make their defence. It appeared, from the proceedings, that two of the officers who ought also to have been sent on their trial did not appear, viz. lieutenant Rayot, who afterwards deserted to the enemy, and has since been struck out of the list of lieutenants; and lieutenant McKee, whose residence is not known.

Died, in Portland, Me. lieutenant KIRVIN WATERS, of the United States navy, aged 18. The situation of this gallant young officer has been peculiarly interesting. A midshipman on board the Enterprize at the time of her capturing the Boxer, he conducted himself in that memorable engagement as our other naval officers always do, when duty calls and danger is near—with the greatest coolness and intrepidity. He there received a dangerous wound, and, from the disabilities and painful effects of which, lingered until the 26th ult. when he breathed his last. A sympathy for sufferings almost unprecedented, and greater than it could have been supposed human nature was capable of enduring for such a length of time, had attracted around the stranger a very numerous and respectable acquaintance of the young gentlemen of the town. Their friendship and attachment have been strongly rivetted by an amiable disposition, virtuous principles, manly deportment, a mind vigorous and intelligent by nature, and highly improved by education. Their attention towards him in watching over his sleepless nights, and in rendering all the kindness of life and the civilities of social intercourse to his relief and comfort, have been tender, affectionate, and unremitted.—Thus has been cut off in early bloom a young officer of great merit and promise. His feelings of piety and views of eternity were those of a Christian—resigned to the will of his God and depending wholly on the merits of our holy Redeemer for the salvation of his soul.—Portl. Argus. [Lieut. Waters was a native of the city of Washington, and son of William Waters, Esq.]

CHRONICLE.

Commodore Barney arrived at Baltimore from London, a few days ago, with despatches.

Arthur O'Conner has been killed in a duel with a certain Rowan Cashel.

New-York, Oct. 11. It is rumored that the Franklin and Washington, U. S. ships of the line, are to be equipped for service forthwith, and that they will have orders to cruise along our coast for the protection of our commerce, &c.

From the Mediterranean. The Congress frigate, captain Morris, arrived at Carthage about the 9th of August, from Flushing, and proceeded up the Mediterranean with the second squadron, under commodore Bainbridge, to visit the Barbary powers. The squadron consisted of the Independence 74, Congress, 36, Erie sloop of war, Chippewa brig, and the hermaphrodite brig Spark, and sailed from Carthage on the 13th August.

Commodore Decatur's squadron was daily expected at Carthage, from whence that gallant officer, according to previous arrangements, would return to the U. States;

The Dutch fleet, three 7's, 3 frigates and 3 brigs, was before Algiers; but his "highness the dey" seemed disposed to contest his right of impressment with them, though he gave it up so easily to the striped banner.

We fear it is a dreadful certainty that the Epervier must have been lost in some of the late gales. Where is the Wasp?—where the Peacock?

Mr. Giles. The Norfolk Ledger tells us that Mr. Giles will resign his seat in the senate of the United States.

Sir George Murray is appointed, by the British government, governor-general of the Canadas.

New-Jersey election.—The republicans have succeeded in this state with a larger majority than they had last year. Particulars hereafter.

Grand squirrel hunt.—Sometime about the latter part of September, a party of gentlemen in Martin county, North Carolina, twenty in number, ten on a side, killed, for a bet of a "barbacue and trimmings," in two days, upwards of 1370 squirrels; and one gentleman of the party, in particular, killed in one day 74; a number far surpassing any we ever recollect to have heard of before, in the same space of time.

A pirate. By the arrival of the ship Sapor, capt. Rogers, from N. Orleans at Charleston, we learn that the PRIZE carried into that port, was a pilot-boat schr. of about 90 tons, mounting one 12 pr. on a pivot; had been out cruising for 15 days without any commission. At the time of the U. S. schooner Fire Brand heaving in sight, the schooner took her to be a merchantman, and fired two shot into her—the Fire Brand had also taken a ship from the Baratarians (a Spaniard) which had been captured by the Carthaginians, and given up to the Baratarians.

South America. From London papers—accounts from Buenos Ayres to March 25. The Lima army at Chili having seized the property of several Englishmen established there, the British armed their vessels and retook their property, together with a vessel having $400,000 on board, from Callas for Chili. They also blockade Valparaiso; and have brought away all the exiles the Spaniards had sent to Juan Fernandez and the other Presidios.

An insurrection is said to have commenced in Lima. The Buenos Ayres Army in Peru has been successful over the loyalists. The insurgents of Casco, Angulo and Pinelo, have also been successful. An insurrection has broken out at Arequipa.

LONDON, June 10. A late Buenos Ayres Gazette contains the undermentioned particulars of the dreadful situation of La Paz.—"As soon as the revolution of Casco was known at La Plata, the government ordered an auxiliary force to march to that quarter, under the command of general Pinto y Torre. He proceeded on in the month of August last, took the province of Puno, and the strong fortress of El Desaguadero, and on September 24 entered the city of La Paz. The standard of American liberty was, for the first time, raised in this section of Peru, and the event celebrated with the cordial congratulations of the inhabitants, who hastened to take their oath of allegiance to the new patriot government. Harmony and friendship every where prevailed—when, on the 28th, a most horrid plot was discovered. A general amnesty had been proclaimed and accepted by the European Spaniards, but they beheld the triumph of the Creoles with repinings. Ungrateful for the kindness shewn them, they endeavored to bribe the guards of the barracks and park of artillery to destroy the town, and formed a project to poison the officers. A lighted match was put to the powder kept in the government house, for it to explode at a fixed hour, but timely denunciations prevented the execution of so horrid a design, and saved the town. They were forgiven, and public confidence appeared restored. Soon afterwards, however, a mine was sprung, with a terrible explosion, in the chief barracks, within the Chapitones, and in the ruins of the building 150 persons were destroyed. The inhabitants were roused at this scene of fresh treachery, and sallying forth, seized all the Europeans and traitorous Creoles, whom they cut to pieces in the public square."

Tax on light. A letter from Dublin says, "I have but twelve windows in my house, and I am made to pay for them this year five guineas ($23.33)—and every other tax in proportion." It would be well if those Englishmen, and Irishmen too, who grumble so much about the taxes in the United State, were to proceed to the "fast anchored" isles, and relieve themselves!

TYTHES. We have seen somewhere the following anecdote which occurred in France, before the revolution: "Why," said a bishop, in a tone of authority and reproof to a peasant, "do you not cultivate that field," pointing to a piece of ground unplanted. "I will, sir," returned the farmer with great humility, "if you will secure me one-half of the value I should be compelled to give you, as the profit of my labor."

A Cave. A letter from Sackett's Harbor dated July 22, says—Yesterday I visited the cave that some account of was lately given, about seven miles from this place, a great curiosity. We brought home from it about 20lbs. of ice, where there are large quantities in some parts of the place all summer; and I find to-day that it has so stiffened my hand that I can hardly lift it to my head.

Theatrical. The benefits at Covent Garden Theatre, have been as follows—Miss O'Neil's 650 pounds, Mr. Jones' 600, Mr. Young's 590, Miss Foote's 500, Mr. Emery's 500, Mr. Incledon's 400, Mr. and Mrs. Liston's 400, and Miss Stephens' 300.

Money found. Poole, a farmer of Blagden, Eng. has lately found, while digging in his field, a chest of gold coin, worth 20,000*l*.

Bank of England. The notes of the Bank of England in circulation are upwards of one hundred millions of dollars. The annual tax on which is more than four hundred thousand dollars. But the bank has hitherto paid under the old compromise, (when its issues were small compared with the present) but about one hundred thousand dollars. The subject has, however, recently caught the attention of parliament.

A new bargain has just been made with the bank. It is to pay 3.500*l*. on every 1,000,000 in its bills issued.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

No. 9 OF VOL. IX.]

BALTIMORE, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 23, 1815.

[WHOLE NO. 217.]

Ilac olim meminisse juvabit.—VIRGIL.

PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, NO. 29, SOUTH CALVERT-STREET, AT $5 PER ANNUM.

The present number of the WEEKLY REGISTER contains twenty pages, or consists of a sheet and a quarter—to dispose of sundry interesting articles that were lying over in type. The press of matter is, and always must be, exceedingly great, while we attempt to notice every thing important for present reading or useful for future reference.

Though in some respects we have been baffled in our arrangements for this number, we think its contents will be found more than commonly interesting.

* * The editor respectfully informs the patrons of this paper, that their accounts are made out to the end of the present year and have generally been forwarded to the places where there are regular agents, to which he solicits an early notice: those resident in parts of the country near which there is no regular agent, will please to remit by mail, as usual, and the receipt shall be thankfully acknowledged.

A vigorous attempt is now making to get all our accounts squared up, and the editor appeals to the considerate for a liberal and immediate determination to assist him in accomplishing this very important object—the attainment of which would lighten the drudgery of the common business of the establishment nearly a half! as will very reasonably appear, when it occurs to the mind, that each and every account that remains open and unsettled, is individually charged upon our exertions to close. This is always an unpleasant duty—but it must be done. There is no use of earning money if we do not get it. We assert it, without fear, that, independent of these concerns of the office, more editorial labor is bestowed on the REGISTER than on any other periodical work. “Thou shalt not muzzle the mouth of the ox that treadeth out the corn.”

The agents for this paper are earnestly solicited to urge a settlement of the bills due at their offices, especially when they exceed the amount for the current year.

Sheep and Wool—Books.

“It appears, from the London papers, that lord Sheffield’s Wool Fair was held at the White Hart, on the 26th of July last. Lord Sheffield, in a long speech, urged the necessity of a protecting duty, stating that the growers of wool had suffered much from the vast importations, declaring, that as fine wool would be raised in England as any ever imported, if proper encouragement were given to the growers of the article.”

We have several times amused our readers with references to the book made by lord Sheffield, in 1783, to reconcile his countrymen to the loss of the United States;—in which he undertook to shew, with all the pomp and gravity, “modest assurance,” want of candor, and disregard of truth, that belongs to a lord, that we were, and must continue to be, dependent upon and slaves of England, for most of the necessities and many of the conveniences of life, so far as they belonged to what are commonly considered the arts and manufactures.

The arrivals of several small quantities of wool from the United States, and the reports that must have reached the old man of our progress in the raising of sheep, has roused his jealousy—and he now would prohibit a commodity, by laying a duty upon it, which he prophesied, like one of Baal’s ministers, that it would be impossible for us to have in considerable quantities!—Knowing the temper of that man’s mind and his deadly hatred to America, for giving to his profound “observations” the character of nursery tales, we cannot do otherwise than believe that, in his speech alluded to in the article quoted above, he had entire reference to the import of wool from the United States; which, he sees, will speedily become as famous for raising that article as for raising cotton. For we believe it is a fact, that the importation of sheep’s wool into England has been considerably less than heretofore, owing to the annihilation, as we may say, of many of the Spanish flocks, by the events of the war in that country; which it will take some years to recruit or supply.

In the 9th page of his book (Dublin edition 1784) his lordship says—“In the southern provinces” (his lordship thought it beneath his dignity to call them states, though they had been acknowledged as such by his government) “the wool of sheep becomes of a hairy quality. In the northern it cannot answer well to raise sheep, the land is so long covered with snow; the expence of fodder is too great.”

How lordly true and candid is my lord’s saying!—Now, a common person would have thought that if the north was too cold and the south was too hot, to raise sheep to advantage, there must be a place in the middle that would exactly answer the purpose! But his lordship always disdains the rules that operate on honest men, when he refers to America—his lordly object was, and is, to deceive those he can influence. And we are happy to assure the great man, that, in every state of the union, we can raise sheep to much profit; and that in the west we have also some little tracts of land that his lordship thought must always remain the abode of the deer and the buffalo, where as many may be supported as would supply five Englands with wool. But, with his jaundiced views of America, no doubt his lordship thought it as likely that we should commence manufactories of madmen and ideots, for kings and nobles, as of woolen goods, which are now scattered all over the United States—much less suppose that our country, instead of Spain, was destined to become the great market of the world for wool. The truth is, we have got the “golden fleece,” and the fact is clearly and undeniably proved that the boasted merino of the old world grows larger and becomes more productive in the new. In less than ten, perhaps, in five years, ships’ cargoes of wool, an excess beyond our own wants, will probably be exported from the United States. Our present stock is between ten and fifteen millions of sheep, increasing geometrically. And the wool gathered in the United States, in the present year, may be safely estimated as worth from 20 to 30 millions of dollars—probably more even than the latter.

BOOKS. “All the school and common books (says his lordship) can be sent cheaper from Britain than they can be printed in America.”—And so his lordship gravely supposes that all our horn books and printers must come from England. What truth there was in the assertion when his lordship made it, I neither know nor care—but I will do this: If his lordship will obtain for me the privilege of exporting 100,000 dollars worth of common and school books to England, per annum, free of duties or charges there, I will pay his lordship $25,000 a year in acknowledgment of the favor rendered, and make 20 or 30,000 dollars more for myself. And, besides, I will engage that the type, presses and paper, and every thing else used in the manufacture of the said books, shall be of American make.

Some persons, regarding the quantity of matter only, and esteeming this paper as they do a cheese, by its size and weight, have considered the price of it high; though the fact is, it is the cheapest publication in the world. For example—it contains nearly twice as much, and is as well printed and on as good paper as Cobbett's, for about two-thirds of the price of that work, exclusive of the price paid for the stamp on each sheet, or less than one half of what it really costs the subscriber in England: yet I feel convinced that I nominally make more money on a subscriber than Mr. Cobbett does, though his is really more profitable, from a more general punctuality in payment and a greater patronage.

The Barbary Powers; OR, MORE OF MY LORD SHEFFIELD.

The policy of the British in maintaining the Barbary powers, is clearly manifested in the following extracts from lord Sheffield's book, entitled "Observations on the commerce of the American States," written in 1783—see page 204 et seq. Dublin edit. note.

EXTRACT.

"It is not probable the American states will have a very free trade in the Mediterranean; it will not be the interest of any of the great maritime powers to protect them there from the Barbary states. If they know their interests, they will not encourage the Americans to be carriers. That the Barbary states are advantageous to the maritime powers is certain.—If they were suppressed, the little states of Italy, &c. would have much more of the carrying trade. The French never shewed themselves worse politicians, than in encouraging the late armed neutrality; but notwithstanding their exultation in it at first, it was not long before they were sensible of their bad policy. The league probably would not long have held together; the Danes had already relaxed. It was the part the Dutch were taking in that league that brought on them a war that has neither been very glorious for them, nor advantageous. The armed neutrality would be as hurtful to the great maritime powers, as the Barbary states are useful. THE AMERICANS CANNOT PROTECT THEMSELVES FROM THE LATTER; THEY CANNOT PRETEND TO A NAVY. In war, New-England may have privateers, but they will be much fewer than they have been; they will be few, indeed, if we do not give up the navigation act."

His lordship is still living—what does he think "about and about" the Barbary powers and an American navy now? Let him ask the deys of Algiers and Tripoli, and enquire of bully Dacres and company. If his lordship lives 10 years more—"he shall see what he shall see"—many things about our navy more curious than any of these; though, according to his lordship's notions, we had not, nor could we have, "good harbors" or "good seamen," and our timber was so ordinary that—it would not be worth while to build large ships of it! On the whole, his lordship concludes, "there is no possibility of her (America) maintaining a navy." I guess his lordship now thinks that other parts of the United States besides New England, "may have" privateers! At any rate, he would have discovered it in a very striking manner, if he had been concerned largely in shipping, during the late war.

But the Barbary powers—why, Decatur, with less than one half of the national force detached for the object, has settled the business more gloriously and more honorably than any European had yet done it for his country, with all their navies and armies.—The crescent, like the red cross of England, has done honor to the stripes and stars, in lovely bendings.

Pauper-statistics.

We abstract the following facts from a very long and minute report of the "guardians of the poor and managers of the alms-house and house of employment, of the city of Philadelphia, district of Southwark and township of the Northern Liberties," for the year ending May 23, 1815. ¶ The city and districts thus taken in have a population of about 100,000 souls.

The average of persons maintained by this institution, taken from the monthly reports of paupers under charge, was 735—about 287 men, 334 women and 104 children.

At the commencement of the year there were 619 persons in the house—during the year, 1891 paupers were admitted, laboring under various diseases and imperfections, of whom about 327 died, 1465 were discharged, cured or relieved, and several remained under care, so that the paupers maintained at the end of the year were 718.

It appears that the average of expense of maintaining the paupers was $1 20¹/₂ per week, for each person.

The institution is provided with a variety of machinery for the manufacture of wool, cotton and flax, shoes, some small articles of iron, &c. The profit on these, which includes the labor of the paupers employed therein, was about 3,500 dollars.

In a general statement of the sick and surgical cases that came under the care of the medical department of this institution in the course of the year, the amount given is 2473 persons—of whom 1928 were cured, 73 relieved, 20 eloped, 327 died and 125 remained under charge. This would appear to amount to all the persons that remained in the house at the commencement of the year, or were admitted into it during its period, 37 excepted—but, it is probable, that many persons were under care more than once in the course of the year—as all the persons relieved by the institution are supposed incompetent by labor to earn a subsistence—which, God be praised! any one in the United States, blessed with health and strength and ability to apply these qualities, is able to do.

The principal diseases noticed are—Abscess 53—cured 43, rem. 5; Amenorrhœa 30—cured 26, rem. 4; Atrophy 17—cured 6, died 11; Burns 30—cured 25, died 5; Catarrh 37—cured 35, rem. 2; Consumption 113—cured 15, died 95; Diarrhœa 68—cured 52, died 15; Dropsy 65—cured 34, died 26; Dyspepsia 69—cured 52, died 15; Eruptions 102—cured 97, rem. 5; Fevers, various, 164—cured 139, died 23; Gonorrhœa 38—cured 34, rem. 4; Inflammations, various, 106—cured 94, died 8; Itch 103—cured 103; Mania 65—cured 35, relieved 15, died 10; Mania a Potu 54—cured 49, died 3; Old age 35—died 35; Rheumatism 192—cured 177, relieved 6, none died;

Scrophula 26—cured 7, died 16; Syphilia 197—cured 175, died 5; Ulcers 248—cured 206, eloped 10; Women delivered 50—none died; Wounds 27—cured 25, &c.

Tables like these are of the first importance to assist our studies of the condition in society. A variety of reflections naturally spring up in considering the facts here recorded, but at present we have only one remark to offer—The average number of paupers maintained by the alms-house of Philadelphia (a great city in which distressed objects are always more numerous than they are in a country-district of the like population) was 735—now, taking the average of England and Wales for a criterion, Philadelphia ought to have maintained at least EIGHTEEN THOUSAND persons in her poor houses! This fact is worth a world of comment.

Bonaparte's Letter.

FOR THE WEEKLY REGISTER.

Observations on the allusion made by Bonaparte to Themistocles.

It appears to me that those editors are mistaken who have supposed that Napoleon, in his late letter to the prince regent of England, meant to compare himself to Themistocles, when the latter applied to the great king, Xerxes, of Persia. It is, surely, to be presumed, that Napoleon did not intend to compare himself to a traitor; that he did not mean to avow himself the enemy of France, and the ready instrument of the vengeance of England. And yet, Themistocles was a traitor to his country, and supplied protection from the great king, on the very ground of his readiness to be employed in the service of Persia against the Athenians.

Napoleon, in his letter to the prince regent, and which has been but badly translated, says—"En bute aux factions, qui divisent mon pays, et à l'inimitié des plus grandes puissances de l'Europe, j'ai terminé ma vie politique; et je viens, comme Themistocle, m'asseoir sur les foyers du peuple Britannique; je réclame la protection de leur loi," &c. Here is no offer of aid; no expression of enmity to France. The analogy between his case, and that of Themistocles, at the court of Persia, totally fails; and we must look for some other instance of the Grecian's seeking shelter. This is easily found; and, but for the reasons hereafter explained, there could have been no delusion on the subject.

Plutarch, in his life of Themistocles, after stating his being proscribed from Athens, and his escape to Corcyra, says—"From thence he fled to Epirus, and finding himself still pursued by the Athenians and Lacedemonians, he tried a very hazardous and uncertain resource, in imploring the protection of Admetus, king of the Molossians. Admetus had made a request, which being rejected with scorn by Themistocles in the time of his prosperity and influence in the state, the king entertained a deep resentment against him, and made no secret of his intention to revenge himself, if ever the Athenian should fall into his power. However, while he was thus flying from place to place, he was more afraid of the recent envy of his countrymen than of the consequences of an old quarrel with the king; and, therefore, he went and put himself into his hands, appearing before him as a suppliant, in a particular and extraordinary manner. He took the king's son, who was yet a child, in his arms, and kneeled down before the household gods. This manner of offering a petition the Molossians looked upon as the most effectual, and the only one that can hardly be rejected."

Dr. Goldsmith gives an account of the same transaction, in which he is supported by Thucydides and C. Nepos.—"From thence," (Corcyra) says he, "he fled to Epirus, and finding himself pursued by the Athenians, grown at length desperate, he fled to Admetus, king of the Molossians, for refuge.—Admetus was from home at the time Themistocles came to implore protection; and upon his return he was surprised to find his old adversary who had come to put himself under his protection. As soon as the king appeared, Themistocles took that monarch's young son in his arms, and, seating himself amidst the household gods, informed him of the cause of his arrival, and implored his clemency and protection. Admetus, surprised and moved with compassion at seeing the greatest man of Greece an humble suppliant at his feet, raised him immediately from the ground, and promised him protection. Accordingly, when the Athenians and Lacedemonians came to demand him, he refused absolutely to deliver up a person who had made his palace an asylum, in this firm persuasion that it would afford him safety and protection." He proceeds further to note, that the king, finding himself unable to protect his illustrious guest, favored his escape in a ship which was driven on the coast of Persia by a storm. Here the Grecian avowed his treason and enmity to Athens, and actually accepted the command of the Persian army against Greece.

After the perusal of these extracts, the reader will probably wonder at the ignorance or malice which would make Napoleon compare himself to Themistocles, at Persia. He asks of the prince regent what Themistocles had solicited of Admetus, safety and protection; and he uses a remarkable expression, "m'asseoir sur les foyers"—literally, "to seat myself at the fire-sides"—or, emphatically, "to seat myself among the household gods." The allusion is very happy, and the expression is one which must have made its way to the heart of a generous man. But the Christian prince regent of England possesses ideas of magnanimity somewhat different from those entertained by the barbarian and pagan king of the Molossians.

I suppose that the notions of the English editors, from whom many of us benighted Americans receive all our knowledge, were manifold and various when they undertook to mislead the public on this subject. Some of them may have been stung to the quick by shame, at the contrast between Admetus and the prince of Wales, and were willing to divert enquiry from the right point. Others, possibly, felt humbled at the mistress of the ocean being compared to an obscure nation of barbarians; and these would compliment their regent by making Bonaparte estimate him as high as the world had the great king. Others again were willing that the soldier of fortune should have a few more blemishes beside those which naturally belonged to him, and these would place him in the most disgraceful of all attitudes, that of a perfidious traitor offering his assistance to his country's worst enemy. Napoleon is bad enough, but he deserves "fair play" and is entitled to the common right of being understood as he intended.

A BACK-WOODS-MAN.

Near Lake Ontario, October, 1815.

Naval Affairs.

The subjoined letter comes to us from the same respectable source as that in the WEEKLY REGISTER of the 21st inst. under this head. We think it merits equal consideration and attention from the important information it affords on the subject of the navy and dock-yards in the United States, and from the extensive reform and consolidation which the writer urges in relation to these establishments, so far as they have already been formed. It is unquestionably a subject of the highest importance under the present circumstances of the world, when so little respect is paid to the rights of nations, and a disposition seems manifested of putting to flight every vestige of freedom. To be sure, the broad Atlantic happily separates us from the deluging tyrannies and oppressions of the old world; but we dwell upon its shores, where the withering blast of monarchy may extend its fury and lay us waste, unless, with due care and in due time, we attend to and nurture the infant Hercules that may drive off and punish the marauders. It seems now universally agreed that a considerable augmentation of our naval force is expedient and necessary, as the best means of keeping evils at a distance far more extensive than any that can arise from the monies being levied on the people to create and support it. All the danger we have to apprehend must come from the sea-coast, and it is there we should be first prepared to meet the foe. The force of numbers, aided by native valor, and that desperate courage that springs up when a man's fire-side is assailed, may do much, and sometimes suffice for the service expected on shore; but to combat on the ocean with probable success, requires much preparation and a careful organization of our means—which, with the blessings of heaven, every one says, are adequate to humble an enemy, exalt the national character, in which is national strength, and give glory to the American name.

ANOTHER INTERESTING LETTER,

From an officer of the U. S. Navy to his friend, a member of congress, dated at

WASHINGTON, Sept. 12th, 1815.

DEAR SIR—I regret that circumstances have prevented me from returning an earlier answer to your enquiries respecting navy yards. Much may be said upon the subject, and I am under no small apprehension that what I am now about to state, will not, perhaps, contain all the needful information which in your letter is required. I shall set out, however, with the undeniable proposition, that, considering the present state of our navy, of all the yards at this time belonging to the department, none are of real use but the one at Boston. This may appear a bold assertion, but I am quite confident that before I lay down my pen, I shall be able to satisfy you of its truth.

It is well known that the yards at Portsmouth, N. H. and Boston, are the only yards possessing a sufficient depth of water for the accommodation of the largest class of ships, and that those at New-York, Philadelphia, Norfolk and Washington, cannot be approached, at all times, even by frigates, with their guns and stores on board. While that at Portsmouth is deemed to be useless, on account of its vicinity to the one at Boston, the latter certainly must be preferred to all the others, not alone for the numerous advantages it can invariably derive from its adjacency to a rich and populous city, affording ample means for protection, equipment and supply, but more especially for the easy ingress and egress it admits of at all seasons of the year; as was sufficiently demonstrated during the last war. The harbor of New-York is obstructed by a bar, over which frigates can never pass in perfect safety, nor indeed can they pass it at all, except at high water, and with a fair wind.—To my knowledge, vessels of this class, have, more than once, been several days detained from crossing it, solely by the unfavorableness of the wind and tide. The loss of the President frigate is attributed to the injury she received in passing over this bar; and it will not be forgotten, that, while under the command of commodore Rodgers, the situation of this same frigate was at one time extremely critical, being hemmed in on one side by the British 74 Plantagenet and Loire frigate, and on the other by this obstructive bar. On this occasion indeed the wind blew fair, but the state of the tide was such as absolutely to prevent her crossing the bar; and therefore had the enemy ran down upon her, the commodore would have found himself reduced to the alternative either of contending with an overwhelming force, or running the ship on shore. In addition to this, during the winter season no harbor is more liable to be choked up with vast unwieldy masses of ice than that of New-York, thereby rendering it almost impossible at such times to place ships of the line in security. The same objection will apply with equal force to the river Delaware, the shallowness of which connected with the danger and difficulty of its navigation, and the utter impracticability of approaching the yard at Philadelphia in a frigate, with her armament and provisions on board, render it as unfit for a naval station as the Hudson at New-York.

The yard at Norfolk is incommoded by the same obstructions as those at Philadelphia and New-York, with the exception of ice; but on the other hand again, no vessel can proceed to sea with the same wind which carries her from the yard, and therefore, to prepare a ship for sea, it becomes unavoidably necessary to moor her in Hampton Roads, and there to receive her provisions and water on board, from lighters—a method which, besides its productiveness of extraordinary trouble and expense, necessarily exposes the ship, while thus situated, to the attack of an enemy in possession of the Roads. And this enemy, moreover, when once in complete possession of the Roads, has it wholly in his power during the continuance of hostilities to prevent the sailing of any ship equipped at Norfolk; a fact clearly established in the case of the Constellation frigate.

The tedious and difficult navigation of the Potomac, relieves me from the necessity of offering any further objections against the yard at Washington. It has in truth been approached by frigates, but no one has yet ventured to suggest that by any means, it could be made useful for ships of the line. As a building yard, it no doubt should claim attention, being under the eye of the navy commissioners, but as a place for ships to resort to for supplies, equipments and repairs, it is, in my opinion, of all others the worst calculated.

The yard at Charleston, S. C. we all know to be accessible only for sloops of war of the smallest class and lightest draught of water, and even then, not in perfect safety. The danger, as well as difficulty, in crossing the bar at the harbor's mouth, are too notorious to require any further explanations from me; I shall merely observe, therefore, that, like Norfolk, it is totally unfit for a naval station.

These are all the regular navy yards in the United States, but besides these there are other establishments of a similar nature, which, though unauthorised by law, are not less expensive, and perhaps most of them not less useless than some of the regular yards we have been describing. Of this description are the establishments at New Port, R. I. at Baltimore, at Wilmington, N. C. at St. Mary's, at New Orleans, and at Tchifonta. The intent of the one at Baltimore, I am, like many others, unable to conceive—Those at Wilmington and St. Mary's were instituted merely to answer some temporary purpose—that at New Orleans was designed for the use of the flotilla and small craft on that station; while that at Tchifonta is at present occupied with a view to the construction of a block ship for the protection of Lake Ponchartrain.

The seven regular yards were established to meet the demands of our navy at a time when it consisted of frigates, sloops, and smaller vessels, and the six lesser ones were intended mostly for the accommodation of gun-boats, galleys, &c. but not one of them was intended originally for the convenience of ships of the line. It fortunately happens, however, that the yard at Boston can be so improved as to answer every purpose, notwithstanding it was established, like the others, at that era of our navy when ten or twelve frigate and a proportionate number of smaller vessels, were considered as large a naval force as the country could conveniently maintain, and as large as its necessities would require—before the construction of ships of the line was conceived; and, in fact, before the creation of a respectable naval force had become the favorite object of the people, when shallow waters and a difficult access were considered essential to the safety of our ships from inimical attacks. These ideas have, however, since been entirely exploded; the navy of the United States has at this day, assumed a higher and more important character, and we are already enabled to enumerate amongst our ships of war, some whose size and draught of water, prevent them from approaching more than one or two of the yards to which I have above adverted. Hence it becomes necessary to establish others on a more extensive scale; and as a yard adapted to the accommodation of ships of the largest class, will equally as well accommodate those of the smallest, we have only to construct two or three of this description, and at once to abandon all the others; for no one will admit the necessity of keeping up at an enormous expense, two kinds of these establishments. If an English philosopher cut a large hole for his cat and a small one for his kitten, it is no reason that we should follow his example.

The place now occupied as a navy-yard at Boston is well calculated for the purpose, and when supplied with dry docks and some few additional buildings will be admirably fitted for the accommodation of ships of the line. Vessels of the largest class may at all seasons of the year with a fair wind cast off their fasts from the yard wharf, and without being under the necessity of letting go an anchor, may proceed direct to sea; and whatever may be the force of the enemy, it is totally impossible for him to blockade the harbor during the rigor of the winter season, so as effectually to prevent the sailing of any vessel. These observations apply with equal force to the site of the yard at Ports Mouth, but, as I before remarked, its vicinity to the one at Boston renders one or the other entirely useless, and of the two that at Boston should be preferred.

The next eligible spot for a yard of the proper kind is at New-Port, R. I. Nature has there formed one of the finest and most capacious harbors in the world; free from all obstructions by ice—easy of access to the largest ships—difficult to blockade—of a central situation—secure from all external attacks, and at all seasons of the year it has a free and open egress to the ocean. New-Port may be so fortified as to defy the whole united power of the British navy, and our ships of war lay at the same time in perfect security within sight of the ocean. A yard at this place, provided with dry docks and all other necessary conveniences, would be capable of accommodating the largest ships we may ever build, and, when defended by the necessary fortifications, would be conducive at the same time to a great and most important national benefit. For, besides preventing an enemy from possessing himself of a position that in all respects would be of great advantage to him and highly injurious to us, we should be enabled to avail ourselves of it as an effectual protection for the navigation from thence to New-York, Long-Island Sound and the Vineyard; and thus prevent a few hostile frigates from cutting off the communication by water between our southern and northern states. Indeed no place in the world, I will venture to say, offers greater facilities and advantages for a naval establishment; and a neglect to occupy it would be most unpardonable.

A third eligible site for an extensive navy-yard will be found at York river on the Chesapeake.—During the revolutionary war, line-of-battle ships proceeded up this river as high as York-Town, which can as effectually be protected by batteries as any other place, on account of the favorable situation of the adjacent heights and projecting points. Ships of the greatest draught of water may proceed even above York-Town without being impeded by obstructions of any kind, and the same wind which brings them within the capes will take them to their anchorage before the town. In like manner the same wind which wafts them from York will at all seasons of the year carry them directly out to sea, with no ice nor any other dangers to encounter them in their course. In addition to the safety of its harbor, no vessels can pass up the bay nor even enter the capes without the knowledge of ships at York; and there can be no doubt but that a naval establishment at this place, constructed upon a proper scale, would not only be adequate to its own protection (and from its vicinity to the sea be extremely difficult to blockade) but in proportion to the force stationed there, would also afford protection to the bay and southern coast. Will it now be credited, that with six ships of the line and as many frigates stationed at York, the city of Washington and Havre-de-Grace could be laid in ruins—Alexandria plundered—Baltimore attacked—and both shores of the Chesapeake ravaged by two or three ships of the line, a few contemptible frigates and small craft, and a handful of mercenary troops? York-Town, when once properly defended by an extensive naval depot, would always present an insuperable barrier to the passage of any hostile force above it; while to attempt a blockade of it, without the aid of supplies from the borders of the Chesapeake, would require a force more than double the quantum of that stationed there.

But since the British have taught us that the Patuxent may be ascended by ships of the line as high up as Benedict, some spot on that river has been spoken of as a suitable one for a yard of the proper kind. It is only necessary to enquire, however, in what manner ships of war lying in the Patuxent could give any sort of protection to the Chesapeake? In York river they will be invariably in sight of the bay and in the neighborhood of its capes, but in the Patuxent they will be just about of as much service as if they were anchored at Baltimore or at Washington. The towns on the bay might be reduced to ashes—its shores desolated—and the enemy beyond the reach of chastisement, before our ships in the Patuxent could clear the river's mouth.

There are other objects, however, to be taken into consideration in making choice of a proper site for a navy-yard, independent of the security it may be made to afford to ships of war against external attacks. Let it never be forgotten that ships can not only protect themselves but afford protection to others. We have only to select suitable sites for the yards, and to make them the regular rendezvous for all our ships of war, and you may rest assured that when thus disposed they will be able to extend their protection from one extreme of our coast to the other. A small fleet at Boston, another at New-Port and a third at York-Town would require little other protection beyond what they could afford in themselves. An idea however seems to have prevailed among many that ships of war in port are not in a state of defence and require the aid of land batteries to protect them. This is a mistaken idea; for it should not be forgotten that ships of war are themselves batteries, and strong moving ones too, and that when attacked by an enemy (which must always be by a similar species of force) the latter can have no advantage whatever over them except that which consists in a superiority of numbers. Even in this case, unless that superiority be beyond all reason, his advantage will not be great when we take into consideration the many peculiar circumstances by which we can profit in laying proper plans of defence and in practising various stratagems of warfare. Macdonough was attacked while at anchor in an open road-sted by a force greatly superior to that under his command, and yet gained the most unexampled success without any protection or assistance from land batteries on shore. And in fact, what may be the force of the enemy on our coast, if we can keep him employed in this way, it would be far preferable to any other course of measures which would leave him at liberty to desolate our wealthy sea-board, spread consternation amongst its inhabitants, and utterly paralyze our commercial efforts.

In giving you my thoughts on the subject of selecting proper sites for navy yards, I have only designated three, as I consider that number fully adequate to supply the wants of our navy, were it even as large as that of Great Britain. But in its present state two would be all-sufficient; though, were three required, there certainly can be no places pointed out more suitable than those I have before alluded to, to wit, Boston, Newport and York-river: because these three possess, respectively, exclusive of all other advantages, the one indispensable requisite, without which no spot in the universe would answer the purpose, viz. *a sufficient depth of water, at all times, to admit the approach of ships of the largest class. All the other yards and establishments might be sold, buildings erected, dry-docks established, and all the other necessary conveniences prepared for an extensive and profitable accommodation of our navy. It may be objected, however, to these three places, that they have not a sufficient rise of tide for dry-docks. In answer to this it is only necessary to state, that where streams of water exist locks may be constructed, and that where no streams exist steam-engines can supply their place.

When navy yards were first established in this country, the navy, although a great favorite of the government, was not so with the people; and hence it became necessary to resort to all practicable measures for the purpose of thoroughly reconciling them to bear the expence of a few frigates. The establishment of navy yards was one of these measures. For they were induced to believe, from a knowledge of the views of the government in selecting the sites, that the money expended in the support of these frigates would, to a certain extent, return into their pockets through this channel, very naturally considering the equipment and repairing of ships as fit objects for them to profit by; and, as it might be expected, from the prevalence of this ungenerous opinion, many frauds and peculations have resulted, highly prejudicial to the general interests of the United States. These, however, are not the only evils that exist, even at this late day. The enormous expence unavoidably incurred in maintaining ten useless establishments on the Atlantic, and three others, equally useless, on the lakes, swallows up, annually, a large proportion of the funds appropriated for the service of the navy. At each of these places, be they ever so small or insignificant, there are regularly stationed a captain, or commandant, one or more lieutenants, sailing-masters, marine officers, surgeons, pursers, midshipmen, master's-mates, boatswains, gunners, carpenters, guards, sailors, landsmen, &c. &c. all on full pay, and hanging, like so many dead weights, around the neck of the treasury purse. All these are not only entirely useless to the navy, but, worse than all, by exhausting an incredible portion of our ways and means, they retard the progress of its improvement, and almost totally prevent its augmentation. To illustrate the truth of these remarks, I subjoin an estimate of the annual expence of one of those establishments, selected, not from amongst those at which ships have been mostly fitted and refitted, but as one of the least importance amongst those at which not more than two frigates have been repaired in the course of some years. This estimate is founded upon official papers and not upon vague surmises and conjectures; it may, therefore, be considered as accurate and employed as such. It may, indeed, excite some surprize that so many officers should be attached at one time to this unprofitable establishment, but it should be known that stations of this sort are most commonly sought for by such officers as are averse to engage in, or feel themselves incompetent to conduct enterprizes requiring talents and discrimination. The navy department, therefore, placing as little confidence in the acquirements of these officers as they themselves, by way indulging their inclinations and relieving itself from their importunities, locates them at these inferior establishments whereat it is presumed they can do no harm, and where it is expected they will do little or no good; and thus these establishments become gradually clogged with the most idle and least valuable members of the service. I do not, by any means, intend to embrace in this last assertion all the officers attached at present to the several yards, because some of them I know to be officers of great merit; and, moreover, in general, the utility of a yard bears a due proportion to the abilities of the officer who commands it. Upon the whole, however, these unnecessary establishments are, at best, mere sinks of the funds of the navy; they are fair game for a host of speculators and others, who constantly prowl about them, and watch every opportunity to take advantage of the government. And, as the duties required in them are in some cases carelessly attended to or neglected, and the situations connected with them are mostly solicited for the sake of convenience, we ought not to wonder that in some instances, those attached to them were accessory to, and interested in the impositions practised on the government.

*I would beg you to notice particularly, that there is but one objection, absolutely necessary to urge against the adoption of a site as a suitable one for the permanent establishment of an extensive yard; to wit, the want of a sufficient depth of water at all times to admit the approach of a ship of the line. Whenever this objection holds good, the question is decided at once; for the objection is an insuperable one.

For these extensive evils there is an infallible remedy; and, although the subject is not adverted to in your letter, I shall endeavor at some future opportunity to give you an idea of my plan in effectually applying this remedy. I may add, however, that the chief ingredient of this remedy is an immediate reduction of the number of yards.

I am, your obedient.

Estimated annual expence of the United States' Navy Yard at Norfolk, as far as the same could be ascertained:—

PERSONS.	Pay, rations, &c. per annum, including fire wood, house rent, &c
1 Captain, commanding	$3,420
1 Captain	1,900
1 Master-commandant	1,358
1 Lieutenant-commandant	1,056
1 Lieutenant	753
1 Surgeon	782
1 Sailing-master	662

1 Blockmaker	1,000
1 Sailmaker	1,000
1 Armorer	600
1 Mast-maker	800
1 Cooper	800
1 Boat-builder	900
Laborers—say,	1,000

22,297

A navy agent, whose income is, 2,000
A store-keeper 1,200

3,200

Seamen, O. seamen, &c. not less than 10,800
A detachment of marines, consisting of a captain's command, 9,176

19,976

$45,473

To which may be added for house rent, fire wood, candles, stationary, furniture, &c. for commissioned and warrant officers, who cannot be accommodated in the yard, 2,000

$47,473

Some of the yards undoubtedly cost less annually to support them than this sum; but it should be recollected, at the same time, that the one at Boston, that at New-York, at Philadelphia, and at New-Orleans, cost much more. Taking this sum, however, for a data of the annual expence of one yard, the aggregate annual amount required to support the thirteen yards, or naval establishments, on the Atlantic, together with those at Erie, Sackett's Harbor, and lake Champlain, will be $759,568.—

Now, deducting from this the annual expence of the three yards hereinbefore recommended, according to the foregoing calculation, to wit, $142,419, (a sum far beyond that which will be actually required for the maintenance of these yards when they come to be properly organized) there will remain to be appropriated, annually, for other purposes, the sum of $617,149. And as the hull, masts and spars of a 44 gun frigate cost $95,000, therefore, by a reduction of the yards, according to the plan proposed, there will be saved a sum sufficient to build, annually, six frigates of the largest class.

Internal Improvements.

FROM THE PENNSYLVANIA REPUBLICAN.

Statement of appropriations made by the legislature of Pennsylvania since January, 1809, collected from the laws and official reports.

In 1809.—	Downingtown & Ephrata turnpike	$10,000
	Hamburg academy (a lot was also given by the state to this academy)	1,000
In 1810.	Greensburg academy	2,000
	Somerset do.	2,000
	Gettysburg do.	2,000
	Carmichael's town do.	2,000
	Bedford do.	2,000
	Roads and bridges	4,900
In 1811.—	Butler academy	2,000
	Meadville do.	1,000
	Chester do.	2,000
	Williamsport	2,000
	Perkiomen turnpike	7,500
	Appropriated to sundry roads, under act of 2d April 1811	20,000
	By act of the same date the following appropriations were made, viz:
	Great western turnpike	350,000
	Turnpike from Northumberland to Waterford	200,000
	Downingtown & Ephrata turnpike	15,000
	Milford and Oswego turnpike	10,000
	Harrisburg bridge	90,000
	Northumberland do.	50,000
	Columbia do.	90,000
	M'Call's do.	20,000
In 1812.—	Western turnpike, the northern route	100,000
	Centre turnpike	15,000
	Perkiomen do.	7,500
	State prison (including by act of 2d April 1811, 5,000)	39,000
In 1813.—	State arsenal	15,000
	Wayne county academy	2,000
	Athens do.	2,000
	Orwigsburg do.	2,000
	Bustleton do.	500
	Venango county do.	2,000
	Improvements of certain creeks	1,100
In 1814.—	Lehigh academy	2,000
	Indiana do.	2,000
	Mifflin do.	2,000
In 1815.—	Lewistown do.	2,000

In addition to the foregoing, the state increased her stock in the city banks, by investing therein nearly $600,000, since the first of January 1809.

Our infant manufactures also received a share of the attention of the legislature, by loans of money where they promise success and usefulness.

The improvements of the state since 1809 is further evidenced in the passage of more than 40 acts for turnpikes and about 20 acts for bridges exclusively of those of McCall's, Columbia, Harrisburg, and Northumberland, over the Susquehanna; 5 of the 20 are for bridges over the Schuylkill, 3 over the Delaware, 2 over the Monongahela, 1 over the Alleghany, 2 over the Juniata, 1 over the Susquehanna, and some over creeks.

It may not be improper to add the expenditures by Pennsylvania during and on account of the late war, also derived from official reports:

In 1812,	$32,700
1813,	92,770
1814,	470,000

In addition to which the state paid its quota of the United States direct tax for 1813 310,600

The state also loaned the United States 300,000 dollars, to enable her to pay our militia.

The appropriations for erecting the public offices at the seat of government (about eighty thousand dollars) and appropriations for many other purposes have been purposely omitted; as the principal object of the foregoing statement is to shew those for roads, bridges, &c.

This research has given me much satisfaction, and I conceive will be read with pleasure by every Pennsylvanian. For although much more might and ought to have been done in improving our state, the attentive observer will see that in the last six years, there has been a spirit and disposition in our legislature in favour of improvements, never before exhibited.

The participation by Pennsylvania in the measures of the late war, is also a source of great satisfaction to its citizens.

Interesting Letter.

FROM CORBETT'S REGISTER, AUGUST 5.

To the people of all parties in the United States of America, on the necessity of their being prepared for the defence of their country.

BOTLEY, July 29, 1815.

Before this reaches you, you will have heard of the great events which have taken place in Europe. These events, if you seriously look at them, will convince you that it is high time for you to betake yourselves to the means of making your country a durable asylum for the oppressed of all nations: a safe abode of freedom. This is, in no way, to be done, but by arming yourselves; by keeping yourselves constantly armed; by being, at all times, ready to enter the field of battle; and this state of preparation is to be effected only by wise organization.

If you look into our newspapers of a fortnight past, you will see, that they have now openly and unreservedly promulgated principles, according to which your country might be laudably invaded, your cities laid in ashes, your women violated, yourselves robbed and murdered, even in the hour of peace. You will see, that they recommend the perpetual imprisonment, or the murder, of NAPOLEON, who has given himself up as a prisoner of war, whose victories were never stained by cruelty or insult to the captive, and to whose clemency so many old reigning families owe the preservation of that power, under the combination of which he has, at last, fallen. You will see, that they recommend the murder of every man, who has distinguished himself by his exertions against the horrible feudal and ecclesiastical tyranny formerly existing in France. You will see, that they almost literally thirst for the blood of every man in France, who has done, or who is suspected of wishing to do, any thing to preserve the liberties of the French nation. You will see, that, now Napoleon is wholly unable to act against the kings of Europe, these men are directing their malice against all that they think likely to oppose their views of universal oppression. You will see, that, as the king of France does not appear disposed to shed blood, and to strip the people almost of their very skins, these men are urging the allies to take the work into their own hands. You will see, in short, that they have now undisguisedly avowed, that England and Europe can never be safe, while one particle of freedom is left in France; while any thing but misery and slavery are left in that populous and extensive country.

We are not to believe it possible, that these savage, these murderous recommendations, will be followed; nor, if followed, are we to believe, that the wishes of these fiends in human shape would be accomplished. We are not to believe it possible, that any king, or any minister, will entertain the wish, much less attempt the deed, of making neighboring, or rival nations, wretched "for a century," lest their growth and prosperity should endanger his power and means of living in splendor. We are not to believe it possible, for instance, that any king, or minister, of England, will ever entertain the horrid wish of "putting you back for a century," that you may not be able to cope with him. But while you actually see that there are public writers, even in this country, who not only openly avow such wishes, and that too, with respect to America, as well as with respect to France, ought you not to think it possible, that, in some part or other of the world, sooner or later, the principles of these men may possess the minds of those who may be able to endeavor, at least, to put them into execution?

These writers are men of great weight in the world. You have seen the numerous instances, in which they appear to have been the dictators of faction in mighty affairs. Their writings are never to be despised. They are always to be attended to; and, I beseech you, to attend to them. They hate you mortally, chiefly because you are really free, and because you exhibit to the world the great example of order, tranquility, prosperity unparalleled, under a government of such mildness and cheapness. They are men of excellent memories: revenge is never extinguished in their breasts; from the same motive that they now recommend the murder of the great and generous conqueror of the continent of Europe, they would, if they had the power, tear your bodies to pieces. Be you assured, that these men will die, without having felt one single moment of solid satisfaction, unless they see your political institutions destroyed, your country made a heap of ruins, and yourselves reduced to the most degrading slavery.

While you know, that such passions are existing in the world; while you see, that the human mind may be so brutalized, so corrupted, and so hardened against the feelings which nature inspires, it becomes you to guard your liberties and your lives—to begin betimes to prepare for their protection against the acts to which such passions may finally lead. And, let not any party amongst you suppose, that these men, if they could stir up an enemy against you, would make any exceptions in favor of that party. Until they saw half a million of the allies in France, they were applauding the royalists, and urging them on to cut the throats of their republican countrymen. But, now, they make no distinctions. It is now France that is to be punished; it is now, not Napoleon, but the Jacobins; it is

France that is to be "put back for a century." Only think, for a moment, of the means that must be used to accomplish such a purpose. Only think of the pillaging, the murders, the acts of devastation, which are necessary even to afford a chance of effecting such an end. Only think of the rancor, the bloody-mindedness, that must have engendered such an idea. These men now applaud the federalists, whom they call the "sound part of the people."—But, if they could urge any power to invade you, the federalists would soon find, as the royalists in France now do, that it is against the whole country, against the prosperity and happiness of the whole nation, that their hatred is directed. Now and then, when thrown off their guard by some particular cause of exasperation, they confound in their abuse, both parties under the name of "the American;" and, I have been not a little amused at reading, in a Boston federal paper, serious, but very plaintive, remonstrances upon this score, stating, "that it is unjust in these our writers to confound the different descriptions of Americans thus: that they ought to discriminate: that they are right in venting their hatred against the democrats; but, that they should recollect, that the federalists are a very good and respectable sort of people, lovers of order and religion, and that, besides, they actually fight the battles of these writers in America." Let these malignant men only be able to stir up the means of doing you mischief, and the authors of these humble wallings will soon see, that their hatred, like the bullet, is no respecter of parties or persons. Before the allies were in France, they told us, that all the "sound part of the community," (keep this phrase in mind) were decidedly in favor of the king, and especially the "good and respectable Bourgeoisie." But, now they announce to us, with delight, the sums of money and the masses of food and drink, which, as they tell us, the allies are compelling the "sound" as well as unsound to pay. They tell us, with particular satisfaction, that the "honest old marshal Blucher," is quartering his soldiers upon the people of Paris: that is, upon the "good and respectable Bourgeoisie," who were so hearty and faithful in the cause of the king. This is the treatment they approve of as to the royalists in France; this is the way, in which they turn round upon their friends there. And, would they not do the same towards their friends in America?

I will here insert a passage from the TIMES newspaper, and one from the COURIER, under the date of the 28th July, 1815, in order to give you a specimen of the views of our leading public prints. And again and again, I beseech you to mark well their conduct: for I tell you, as, indeed, you must know, that they are not singular in their way of thinking. We will first hear the COURIER:

"We have been given to understand that the conditions which the allied sovereigns think it necessary to dictate to France in her twice captured capital, will be made known in a few days. One of the French papers on Monday announces that the treaty of Paris is to be maintained; that of course the territory of France remains untouched—that there are to be contributions imposed for the expences of the war, all participation in which, it is understood, have been renounced by two of the powers, (we trust we are not one)—that the allied troops will soon retire, except about 150,000 Russians, who will evacuate the country by 25,000 at a time, in proportion as the French army becomes re-organized; that the emperor of Austria has declared, that wishing to avoid all cause of jealousy or umbrage, he will not leave a single Austrian corps in France.

The journalist then concludes with compliments to the magnanimity of the allied powers. Magnanimity! call it rather fully; but we do not and cannot believe them to be capable of throwing away in this manner the advantages they have gained, and of sacrificing their duty to their subjects. Leave the French territory as it was! and thus leave her the power again to disturb the repose of Europe! endanger Belgium! for will any man say she can be secure whilst France keeps her northern fortresses?—The paragraph, therefore, in the Paris journal cannot be correct. The following arrangement, we hear, will be found to be nearer the truth:—The immediate disbanding of the army of the Loire by the king—an ordinance to that effect may be expected in a day or two. Why not extend the decree to the other armies of France?—The raising another army comprised of men that have proved their fidelity to the king—The delivery en depot to the allies of the strongest fortresses till this new army is raised and ready to act—Eight millions of francs as an indemnification to the allies of their expences; (800 millions would not indemnify them.)—The punishment of the principal offenders to be left to the prudence of the king. If such be the principal outlines of the new arrangement, we can only say that they will be any thing but satisfactory. A new army may be faithful and loyal to the king—and the king may be pacifically inclined; but suppose he should not; suppose his successor should not; suppose he should be forced to follow the warlike impulse of the nation. The real, wise, and sane policy is to reduce the power of France; that is the only way to prevent her from disturbing the peace of Europe. It is with nations as with individuals. Who of US, after being HUMBLD BY AN ENEMY, IS NOT ANXIOUS TO BE REVENGED OF THAT ENEMY? We should insist upon the surrender, or at least the razing, all the northern fortresses of France: we should make her give up the spoils of Louis XIV. Why not bestow Lorraine upon Austria, and Alsace upon Prussia? Lastly, every one of her pictures and statues should be removed."

Pray mark well the words which I have put in large capitals. Mark the words: "who of US, after being HUMBLD BY AN ENEMY, IS NOT ANXIOUS TO BE REVENGED OF THAT ENEMY?" Mark these words, write them, engrave them, in your minds; never lose sight of them for a moment. They speak to you, and that, too, with a voice of thunder. But to turn to France. You see, now, they are for acting as if the king—aye, as if the Bourbon king was their enemy. He was every thing that was good, till the allies got possession of the capital, many of the fortresses, and a large part of the territory of France; before that time, these men only wanted to get rid of Napoleon, that disturber of Europe; but the moment France was in their hands, they could no longer trust even the king. They now, as you see, wish to dismember and cripple and even destroy France. They now cry for the destruction of the power, not of any men or any party, but the power of France herself.

Let us now hear the editor of the TIMES of the same date. After calling upon the government to murder Napoleon; after asserting, that, if he be not publicly put to death, Despard was murdered, he proceeds thus:—

"It is considered, what effect the knowledge of his being in existence must necessarily have on the disaffected in every part of Europe? They will think, and think with truth, that the allied sovereigns are afraid to touch the life of a man who has so many adherents and admirers. This, of course, will increase the number of his adherents and the fervor of their admiration. If, in the depth of his degradation, their idol can inspire respect, if the cultivators of religion, and virtue, and loyalty, are forced to bow down before the splendor of his crimes, even when under eclipse, what must they do at the happy moment, when he bursts forth again from behind the cloud—a moment towards which his followers will look with more devout anxiety than the Indian does to the first dawning of a day, marked by astrology as the most fortunate of his life. Indeed it must be granted that the extraordinary escapes which this man has had from the hands of justice are well calculated to create a kind of superstition in the minds of those who have been already dazzled by his fame. He trusts himself to those whom he has most injured, as Daniel braved the fury of the lions, or as the three brethren walked through the fiery furnace—and our folly, our cowardice, works the miracle of his safety!—As long as he lives, therefore, treason and rebellion must be every where at work. His escape, his release, his re-appearance must be constantly expected. Instead of an infamous criminal, he will be considered as an injured prince unjustly kept from the embraces and salutations of a longing people; and when at last he breaks prison (which sooner or later he undoubtedly will do) his return will be more triumphant, and his power more firmly consolidated than ever. He is to be guarded by an English regiment. But the whole regiment is not always on guard—is it imagined that an English sentinel alone can neither be bribed nor eluded? In the English army, too, it may be asked whether there are none of those weak and unreflecting men, who admire during successful crime? To speak plainly is it not a known fact, that many even of the English officers are personal admirers of Napoleon Bonaparte? Most of these young gentlemen (for it is of the younger sort that I speak) have no better reading than the Morning Chronicle or the Edinburg Review, or some other worthless production, in which this monster is usually described as the first of Heroes, the great captain of the age, &c.—It is no wonder that such studies should dazzle their imagination, and confound their moral sense: and we may be assured that as long as Napoleon Bonaparte lives, this very serious evil will go on increasing."

Now, can you suppose, that a monster, like this writer, who would commit a deliberate murder in revenge on a man for being an object of admiration, would not, if he could, gladly cut all your throats, men, women, and children? The fears that the wretch feels and describes are a proof of the falsehoods of his accusation; for, if Napoleon's deeds were such as he asserts them to have been, what reason can there be to take away his life lest so large a part of mankind should still feel an interest in his fate? He would have Napoleon murdered, not because he has done that which has made him an object of hatred and contempt; but because he has done that, which has made him an object of love and admiration. Having thus disposed of Napoleon, he comes to the French army, the whole of whom also, he seems to wish to see disposed of in the same bloody way.

"The first point," says he, "and without which all others would be nugatory, is that the army of the Loire, whatever may be the terms on which the king might be disposed to accept of its submission, shall be disbanded; an intimation to that effect will, we have some reason to suppose, be published in a day or two. If the troops give up their arms, disperse and retire, as they will be required to do, their past rebellion, atrocious as it has been, will be overlooked; but should they obstinately persevere in their criminal conduct, we suppose that they themselves can hardly wish to be forgiven; a preponderating force will be sent against them. Indeed, that this army got together by treason, led by the traitor himself into the field, and there defeated, should think it possible that it can co-exist with any regular and legal government, is incredible. Our great doubt as to the effectual execution of this article, results from the character and habits of the men; they are chiefly without homes, inured only to camps, garrisons, battles, and familiar with no other hopes than such as are incident to those courses of life, plunder, advancement, or what they term glory; so that it is next to impossible that such men should ever learn to limit themselves to the sober expectations of TRANQUIL LIFE."

So that, if these men now attempt to prevent the absolute and entire conquest of their country they are not to expect to avoid being hanged; and, if they lay down their arms and are willing to disperse, they "have no homes," and it is impossible, or next to impossible, that they should ever return to tranquil life. At once ruffian and hypocrite! He knows well that, if that army could be completely annihilated, France would have no chance of salvation. But let me beseech you to recollect what these men formerly said about the persons composing this same army. While Napoleon was leading this army to victory; while this army was following him over Europe, these writers bewailed their fate. They were then poor unhappy youths, dragged from the fire-sides of their fond and respectable parents, tied hand and foot, and thus carried to the army and compelled to fight. Oh! how these writers "pitied" them and their parents! Aye, that they did, from the bottom of their souls! Vile hypocrites, and they now call these same persons robbers. They say that they are "without homes," and recommend the massacre of them, it being next to impossible, that they should return to tranquil life.

And, do your federalists imagine, that they would be put in possession of power, if these men could stir up a conquering enemy against you upon their principles? If once they saw your country overrun, your government put to the route, they would that very moment talk of the whole of you in a lump. They would call every thing folly, "criminal weakness," short of the utter ruin of your country. Nay, have you not already had a specimen of their moderation? Before the victories over Napoleon last year, they always talked of "the sound part" of you. They only wished to defend our rights, and to live upon good terms with you. They said that the "sound part of the people" were with them; and that the war party were a French faction, who hated England because she was the great "bulwark of religion." Do you remember how they changed their tone, all in a moment, when they heard of the fall of Napoleon? Do you remember that they then said that no peace could be made with JAMES MADISON—that no treaty ought to be signed, except at the headquarters of the English army in the heart of the United States? Do you remember how soon they dropped all distinctions in their invectives, and called for the flogging of "the Americans?" Do you remember that they insisted, that no peace should be made with you, until your political institutions had been subverted, until your civil and political state had been destroyed; until that "mischievous example of successful DEMOCRATIC REBELLION" had been done away? Until this was effected, they said that there could be no safety for the regular governments of the civilized world. Not a word did they then say about the sound part of the community; not a word about the federalists; not a word about "the good people in the eastern states;" not a word about Mr. Otis or the other Ministers, whom they used to praise. They looked upon the conquest of your country as sure; and they were preparing for calling aloud for the "punishment" of you all. It was the "mischievous example of the success of democratic rebellion" that they wished to destroy. And were not the federalists democratic rebels as well as the rest? All your presidents and all your governors were, according to these men's views of the matter, "democratic rebels." What reason, then, could they have to suppose, that they were, by these writers, intended to be spared any more than the rest of the people? In all other praises of "the sound part of the people" they were actuated by the desire of obtaining the aid of the federalists in rendering your ruin more certain and more complete.

Two months have not passed over our heads since these writers were applauding the sending of arms and ammunition to the royalists of La Vendee, whom they called brave, faithful, religious, and whom they urged on to exterminate the jacobins, as they called them, who were opposed to the Bourbons. Now, because the Vendean does not seem to relish the total conquest, the dismemberment, and utter ruin of their country by foreign armies, they confound them with the army of marshal Davoust; they lump them along with the other parties; and, even accuse them of ingratitude! They are called ungrateful to England, because they do not appear inclined to aid in the despoiling even the king of his territories; even that king, to fight for whom they received their arms and ammunition! But, what is this more than they had before done with regard to your federalists? When they saw notices of the meeting of the Convention at Hartford, they chuckled with delight.—They cheered them on. They applauded the conduct of the promoters. But, when the convention broke up, with merely agreeing to an application to be made to the several states to join them in demanding a reform of the federal constitution, our writers turned round upon them with reproaches of all sorts:—"What!" said the Times newspaper, "is THAT ALL! We expected a division of the union to be declared at once; or, at least, the impeachment of Madison and his associates. These convention-alists are men of no vigor. Why do they not, like the brave Vendeans, take up arms and co-operate with our naval and military commanders? This was what we expected. Or, at the very least, we expected the neutrality of the New-England states to be declared. As things now stand, these states ought no longer to experience our forebearance, seeing the ingratitude with which our past forbearance has been paid."

Was there ever impudence like this heard of before? Is not this insulting the feelings of mankind? And, what humiliation must it have been to Mr. Otis and others, to have been the objects of such men's praise! I do not impute to the Hartford convention the base design of aiding in the subjugation of the country, and in the destruction of freedom amongst men; but if we take the then circumstances of America into view, it is impossible to deny that they intended so to embarrass the general government as to compel it to do what would have been disgraceful, at least to their country, in order to sink their rivals and raise themselves upon their ruins:—and this was, to say the least of it, carrying party spirit to an unwarrantable length. There is no doubt in my mind, nor in that of any man of information that I have ever conversed with on the subject, that it was the encouragement held out by the conduct of men in the eastern states, which prolonged the war after the peace of Paris; and, indeed, it was that encouragement which, more than any thing else, produced the war. I hope that those men will now take warning. That they, like the Vendeans, will now see, that the praises bestowed on them by our writers, are only upon the presumption, that they are ready to cut the throats of their countrymen and to aid in the subjugation of their country.

If I were asked why these writers of ours should be such implacable enemies to the freedom and happiness of mankind; why they should desire to stir up war, internal strife, and all manner of evils, against every nation, where freedom is enjoyed, I might answer, that I am not bound to shew the cause of their abominable wishes, having so clearly shewn that they have those wishes. But, the cause appears to be this: they see, they feel, that the weight of the taxes in England, joined to other causes, must, if the world be left quiet for years, produce a great degree of decline in this country. These men have, for many years, been bawlers for war. They now tell us, that the war has been crowned with glorious success; but they foresee that peace to us will be not what peace usually has been. They saw that the peace of Paris instead of crowding our ports with ships and goods, and filling our streets with the bustle of trade, produced a calm, a stillness, as to trade, truly gloomy. They saw that our own people flocked to France for comfortable living. They saw enterprising tradesmen and manufacturers flocking to America. They saw the houses in and near London untenanted. They every where heard of the decay of trade and ruined farmers. They saw that without a law to raise the price of corn, the taxes could not be paid by either landlord or tenant.—They saw, in short, that the war had created the cause of impossibility to live in peace; while France on one side, and America on the other, held forth the temptations of liberty and abundance. And they saw, which, observe, was not the smallest object of their terror, that the landlords and tenants, in almost every part of the country, complained of the hardship of tythes, and pointed out the example of France, where tythes had been abolished. They know that we have about forty-five millions of pounds, or 180 million of dollars, a YEAR, to pay in taxes for ever, being the interest of the debt, instead of the nine millions of pounds, or thirty-six millions of dollars, which we had to pay on this account before the war. They see, that in consequence of the increase of industry produced in France by the revolution, and of our burdens produced by the war, the French are able to sell in our markets at much less than half the price that we must sell at, or must leave the taxes unpaid. They see all those things. They are seized with a panic, that the "tight little island" will become as desert as that on which Captain LAKE put the poor fellow Jeffries, who was saved by the kindness of one of your countrymen; and, in the rage, inspired by their forebodings, they would, if they could, render every other country too miserable for man to live in. They do not recommend the reducing of the army to what it was before the war. They know that this would not answer their purpose. They might recommend the reduction of the navy; but, then, you stare them in the face.—The civil list is indispensable. They would recommend to wipe of the debt; but, then, the whole system crumbles to atoms. Their last resource is, the hope, by their writings, to stir up the means of making other nations still more wretched.

The state of this country, as regard the means of enjoying happiness, may be pretty correctly estimated by this one fact: namely, that a notice has been given, in the house of commons, that a measure will be produced early next session, to lay a tax upon the property of all persons, who shall go to reside out of the king's dominions, from which tax those residing in them shall be exempt. I do not believe it likely for such a law to pass; but, after what we have seen, I do not pronounce it to be impossible. At any rate, the idea has been seriously enough entertained to produce its mention in parliament. Reflect, then, for a moment, on the means which must be used in order to assess such a tax: reflect on the immediate superintendence which it would give the government over the person of every man of property: reflect on the vassal-like degradation to which it would reduce us: reflect on the passions, which such a state of restraint would engender; and, then, form to yourselves an idea of the desperation, which must have been the parent of such a proposition.—The truth is, that the amount of the taxes is now so great, that all but the immense fortunes are sinking under the weight; and that, too, with a rapidity that is quite astonishing. The necessities of the government require so large a part of every man's income and earnings, that numbers are seeking the means of escaping from the demand. Taxes, when excessive, must create paupers; because they go on pressing the whole of the people downwards: and, of course, those who are but just above the poor list, are forced into it. It has lately been stated in parliament, and that, too, by GEORGE ROSE, that the beggars, the common beggars, in the metropolis alone, have increased to thirty thousand! Equal to nearly half the whole population of Philadelphia, when I lived in it. This fact appears to have been stated by George Rose as introductory to a measure for putting a stop to the evil. But how? Would he send the beggars to the country? We are overstocked already. Observe, trifling as is this village, scarcely a day passes without bringing one, and generally more, beggars to my door. The vagrant act warrants us in taking them before a justice and having them punished. But, who will take the trouble, even if he wishes to do it? Thus they are left to wander about. They swarm over the country like the vermin upon their own bodies; and are produced by causes nearly similar. I have here stated two striking facts; my authority is the parliament itself. I state them here, in the face of the country, and I thus invite contradiction, if that be possible. Let me, in this place, observe, however, that I do not look upon myself as bound to refrain from making use of the press of America, when I shall think, that I ought to state truths, which I dare not state here:—but, I never will send to that press any thing, which even a federalist will not say, that I ought to be permitted to publish in any part of the world. I write with the strong desire of being read. I see several millions of readers on the other side of the Atlantic. I know many facts, many arguments occur to me, which I am anxious to convey to the whole world if possible; and, if I am forbidden, under enormous pains and penalties, to convey them through the press of this country, is there any reason why I should not convey them through the press of a country where the prohibition does not exist, and where any one is at liberty to contradict, or to canvass, all I may say? The French and English writers, who used to have their works published at the Hayue, at Amsterdam, at Geneva, or elsewhere abroad, were never regarded as guilty of foul play; but, on the contrary, were, by every lover of truth, applauded for the zeal which urged them to resort to their method of overcoming the obstacles to its promulgation.

To return now to the cause of the malicious efforts of the writers, of whom I have so often spoken, and to draw your attention to whose efforts is the principal object of this address. This cause appears to me to be the apprehensions which the present state of England excites, joined to a hatred of the very name of liberty and revolution, contracted by these illiberal men ever since they heard them associated with the name of Frenchman. This, I am well convinced, is the real cause of their rancor against France and America, both of which, as they constantly show, they would gladly see utterly annihilated. Whether there be OTHER PERSONS, who entertain the same apprehensions and wishes, I must leave you to conjecture. But, I know that they do, because they discover the fact by their words. They have said, that America must be put back for a century. They have called the attention of the government to the growth of your navy. They have said, that, if it be not strangled in its birth, it will be dangerous. They actually proposed to make you give up all your ships of war, to stipulate never to build another, and never more to cast a cannon or a ball.

You will laugh at this; but I beg you not to laugh at it; or, at least, to do something else besides laugh. In the whole extent of the world, it may happen, that their principles may find the means to work up some power to assail you. Therefore, I say, be on your guard. Peace is what you ought to desire; but, it is peace accompanied with safety. To preserve peace you must always be well prepared for your defence, at least. The navy you will not neglect. Its increase is not dangerous to your freedom; or, not in the way or degree that a larger standing army would be considered to be dangerous. It is the necessity of adopting, now in the hour of peace, an efficient system of internal defence—defence of your territory and homes, that I am anxious to impress upon your minds. A large body of soldiers, by profession, you cannot have without destroying your liberties. You must all be prepared to march from your immediate homes; and all be able to make a skilful use of your arms.

MR. JOHN CARTWRIGHT, who is generally called major Cartwright, from his having been a major in the Northamptonshire militia, who quitted the service, as a lieutenant of the navy, in the year 1775 or 1776, because he would not fight against the cause of freedom; who, to the age of 75, has persevered for 40 years, and still perseveres, in unremitting endeavors to obtain a reform in parliament; this venerable patriot, beloved by all who know him for his gentle and amiable manners, and honored for his talents and integrity even by those who are the enemies of his political principles, seeing the danger of invasion on the part of France, in the year 1803, and seeing the government in great consternation as to securing the means of defence, republished a work which he had published some time before, entitled ENGLAND'S ARMS, a copy of which he sent to all the members of the royal family, to all the ministers, and many other men of weight in the country. To this work, a copy of which is sent to Mr. Mathew Carey, of Philadelphia, I beg leave to call your attention. In some of its details it cannot be adopted by you, on account of the difference in the division in the territory and of the civil authorities of the two countries. But, its object being to put the country in a situation to be able, at all times, to defend itself against any enemy, however numerous and valiant, without a standing army, and without regular soldiers; its basis being the duty of arms-bearing inseparably from the right of representation in the legislature, it appears to me, that all its principles and all its out-lines are exactly suited to your case.

In the hope that what I have said may awaken amongst you some portion of that serious reflection which the subject demands, and in the stronger hope, that you will derive great and useful information from the work of Mr. Cartwright, I remain your friend,
WM. COBBETT.

P. S.—Since writing the above, the peace between America and the Algerine dey has been announced as a report. Perhaps your commodore had authority to make peace. Certainly, with such a power, cannon balls are the best negotiators. Whether the pirates will abide by the treaty or not, if it has been made, your government has done itself great honor in the affair. This event will not, however, give satisfaction all over the world. Algiers was a sort of cur to be set on as occasion may require. However, you have broken his jaws, and made him retire to his den for the present. This is truly a noble use to make of naval power! It cannot fail to enhance your fame, to give pleasure to your friends, and to add to the mortification and vindictiveness of your enemies. I do not believe the news. But, if true, here is another thing which Mr. Madison has accomplished previous to his being “deposed.”

Foreign Articles.

We have several late arrivals from Europe. The details and documents are interesting; but accident prevents us this week from giving them so liberally as we desired. The chief things are noted below, and in the next paper we expect to bring up whatever may be useful and necessary to the history of the times.

LATEST NEWS.

London papers of the 6th September.

From a review of these, it appears to be settled in Europe that a foreign army of 150,000 men is to remain in France, and occupy the principal fortresses. This is said to be one of the conditions of the treaty of peace with England, of which lord Stewart was the bearer to the court of France, where he had arrived.

Contributions to the amount of six hundred millions francs have been levied on the French people for the support of the foreign troops.

The demand for British manufactured goods in Yorkshire, Manchester, and all manufacturing towns, was great beyond example, and at enhanced prices.

French funds—5 per cent. consols. 62f. 60c. bank actions 1023f. 75c.

English funds—3 per cent. consols 62—omnium 5,00 prem.

Two reports on the interior state of France, connected with the conduct of the allies, have lately appeared in the French papers, and have excited unusual interest.

An unsuccessful attempt has been made to assassinate the duke and duchess of Angouleme.

The hon. Mr. Bagot (son to lord Bagot) appointed minister plenipotentiary to the United States of America, is detained at present from embarking.

Several of the French Bonaparteans generals were under trial—Some had been ordered into exile; and Savary and L'Allemand had been ordered to Malta.

General Turreau had surrendered himself to the French government.

The Spanish army demanded possession of the town and fortress of Bayonne in the name of Louis, though the white flag had been flying there a considerable time! What deliverers! But they were told they should enter only by force. At the persuasion of the duke d'Angouleme, they retired to wait the orders of fool Ferdinand. Louis, it appears, had given orders to keep them out of his “good city” of Bayonne. But the kings of the king at Paris will settle the matter.

A Paris paper of September 1, gives us reason to believe that a treaty has been ratified by the allies respecting France. It is again said that the sovereigns were about to leave France. Huninguen has surrendered.

The British military peace establishment is to be kept up at 205,000 men—“to preserve the balance of power in Europe!”

The British authorities in the French island of Guadaloupe, have absolutely refused the export of colonial produce from thence to neutral vessels.

The customary bulletin reports Old George as usual—“without any abatement of his disorder.”

A letter from Paris, dated Sept. 2, says—“Horrible atrocities continue to be committed in the south. On the 25th ult. there was an action between the rebels and an Austrian regiment. The latter had 13 killed and wounded. The former had 60 killed and 3 made prisoners, who were immediately ordered to be shot.”

American lakes.—London, August 27—Sir R. Hall, lately returned from Canada, proceeds again, immediately to that country, to supercede com. Owen in the command on the waters of Canada, where government intends keeping up a respectable establishment in future.

The British are reducing their navy very rapidly. It said that 80 vessels only will be retained in commission.

Marshal Ney was to be tried by a court martial, of which marshal Mouney was appointed president. He declined to serve, and therefore was cashiered and imprisoned. Jourdan was then called upon to preside. Ney has probably been shot.

Louis has issued a proclamation respecting the great excesses in the South, and calling upon the people to be quiet, &c. France seems entirely unsettled—the courage of desperation we think is gathering itself for a struggle more bloody than any that has yet happened. A conspiracy is spoken of that had for its object the capture, by the French people, of the allied sovereigns—and something like it may happen. In several parts they have resisted the seizure of their arms by the foreigners. May they keep them to punish their oppressors and regain liberty to Europe! Whatever were the objects of the allied powers at the beginning of their association, each one of them has now all the hideousness that attached itself to the ambition and profligacy of Bonaparte, without any of those great traits of magnanimity that marked his progress. Will they remember that he was at many capital cities; at *Vien*na, Berlin, &c. &c. &c.? Yes—they will remember to revenge his misdeeds, but not to imitate his moderation and forbearance. Many times had he his foot upon the very neck of Austria and Prussia, and could have crushed off the head—but he did not.—“Let the devil have his due.” When we look at things fairly we must say, that Napoleon, with all his crimes, had not an equal in true greatness among all the kings of Europe.

Important British orders in council, dated August 17th, relating to trade with the United States.

“From and after the date of this order, until six weeks after the commencement of the next session of parliament, there shall be paid on the importation into this kingdom, from the territories of the United States of America, in vessels of the said states, of any goods, wares or merchandize, being of the growth, manufacture or production of the said territories, the same duties of customs that are payable on such goods, &c. when imported from the said United States in British, and no other or higher duties of customs; and it is hereby further ordered, that, on the exportation of any goods, &c. the growth of his majesty's territories in Europe, from this kingdom to the United States, in vessels of the said states, there shall be paid the same duties as are by law payable on such goods, &c. when exported to the said states in British vessels, and none other or higher duties; and it is hereby further ordered, that on the exportation from this kingdom to the United States of any goods, &c. of his majesty's territories in Europe, in vessels of the said states, there shall be paid and allowed the same bounties as are paid and allowed on such goods, &c. when exported to the said states in British vessels."

LONDON, Aug. 17.—The number of American mercantile agents lately arrived at Liverpool from the United States, exceeds all precedent. Fifteen stage coaches now run daily from that port to Manchester, and in general return heavily laden with cotton goods of every description.

London, Aug. 29. Upland cotton, 1s 8d to 1s 10d.—New Orleans do. 2s to 2s 2d. Carolina rice 53 to 54s. Good Maryland tobacco 11 to 14d. Virginia do. 16 to 20d. New dollars, 5s 6d. Portugal gold in coin, 4l. 10s. per oz.

August 25. As a proof of prince Talleyrand's opinion respecting the future repose of France, we may notice that his lady still remains in this country.—This looks as if some further convulsions were apprehended by the person of all others, perhaps, the best acquainted with what was likely to happen.

August 29 More Prussian troops are entering France to lay siege to the places that still hold out.

The German papers, alluding to a conspiracy discovered at Paris, add, that it was to have broken out on the 6th of this month, and that one of its objects was to seize the persons of the allied sovereigns and their most distinguished generals.

Ten sea unicorns were lately killed on the coast of Spitzbergen, by the crew of the Lively, of Berwick, eight of which had horns, three of them females. Captain Kingston conceives that these animals cast their horns like deer, as he saw many of them without any.

In the eastern departments of France several Austrian soldiers having been assassinated, and the order for disarming the inhabitants not having been effectually executed, the archduke Ferdinand, of Austria, had issued a proclamation from his headquarters at Dijon, directing that every commune in which any soldier shall be assassinated shall be fined in 10,000 francs, besides the punishment of the assassin. All arms are ordered to be given up forthwith under severe penalties.

☞ The "assassinations," as they are legitimately called, probably mean the just deaths of "BOOTS AND BEAUTY"-MEN.

London, September 2. LOUIS XVIII. AND THE KING OF PRUSSIA.—The kings of Prussia and France are said to have lately had an interview, during which Louis XVIII. severely complained of the conduct of the Prussians towards his subjects. The Prussian monarch reminded his royal opponent of the oppressions of the French in Berlin, and other parts of the dominions, during the long period of their success.—The conversation grew warm, and at last Louis XVIII. positively declared "that if things continued in that state, all that would remain for him to do, would be to constitute himself a prisoner in the hands of the allied powers." To this the king of Prussia is stated to have replied, that "it might perhaps become necessary to take such a step." On which the two monarchs rose, and broke up the interview.

☞ Every thing shews that Louis is as much a prisoner of the allies as Bonaparte. They regulate every thing—they do every thing—and treat the French in every respect as a conquered people. If a town refuses to admit the troops of the allies, but offers to surrender to the king of France, it is immediately besieged! and so they go on. We look for a dreadful end of these things. The allies, conscious of their unholy designs, appear to expect a rising of the people—fresh troops are still pouring in. "PERISH THE INVADERS!"

August 27. In the south of France a most horrid persecution has been raised against the Protestants. Thousands have been slaughtered by the Catholics, who cloak themselves under the authority of the duke d'Angouleme, who is well known to be one of the greatest bigots of the age.

London, September 2.—An article in the Gazette of Dusseldorf, dated the 27th ult. has these words:—"Prussia has openly declared itself on the necessity of separating Alsace and Lorraine from France."

Sept. 2.—American Stocks—3 per cent. 59; 6 per cent. deferred, 95; Louisiana 6 per cent. par, with dividend from February, 1815.

Sept. 5. It is reported that some of our cruizers on the coast of Italy have seized on the treasure of Murat, to the amount of three millions and a half of ducats; and which the court of Vienna has claimed; but which the captors refuse to give up.

The 96th regiment now at Guernsey, is about to embark for the West Indies.

Another detachment of the royal waggon train, is on its route to embark to join the armies in France.

A total change in the French ministry is still talked of. The duc de Richelieu is mentioned as premier; Pozzo di Borgo, minister of police; and M. Chabrol, the prefect of Lyons, as minister of finance.

Fouche has, it is said, made another report to the king, on the state of France, still stronger than the one which has appeared in the London papers. It contains most curious and interesting details, and is drawn out to the length of 30 pages, being evidently meant for publication. We are promised a copy of it, says the English Monitor. It now, like the first, is circulating in manuscript.

Last night we received Hamburg papers to the 20th ult. and Berlin to the 25th. Our readers will participate in our feelings on reading the accounts respecting the piracies of the Algerines, still directed against the commerce of the European nations. It is impossible that this can be endured much longer. All the powers of Europe have a direct interest in extirpating these hordes, and they are now too enlightened to suffer them to continue.

The elements of political convulsions seem still smouldering in great quantities in France, and threatening the world with a shower of the embers, if not with a torrent of the lava. Let us hope, however, that the prudence, union, and vigor of the allies, who have at length succeeded in driving back and circumscribing the limits of the torrent, may be so successfully continued as to prevent it bursting forth afresh.

Answer of the French ministers to the official note of the allied sovereigns.

The king's ministers have received the official note addressed to them by the ministers of the allied powers. The latter wish to persuade the king's ministers, that the measures which they have commanded to the government of Paris, are such as may contribute to diminish the exactions of the war, and to re-establish the royal authority. The king's ministers, however, unfortunately, cannot regard these measures in that point of view. They owe it to the sovereigns, to France and to themselves, to explain themselves on this subject. The sovereigns doubtless, are the masters, they can do whatever they desire, but at any rate let them not say, that in taking every step calculated to ruin the cause of his majesty, that they wish to confer any favor on him.—There is already in France too much odium and ill will against the Bourbons, to render it necessary still more to revolt every heart by making the nation experience the greatest losses and the deepest humiliations. What humiliation can be more afflicting than to see in a time of peace all the departments subjected to your military governors—what misfortune more to be deprecated than the dispersion of your troops over the whole face of the country! The sovereigns declared that they only made war against Napoleon, and yet all their measures belie their words; since at the present moment, when the war ought to be finished, it is only about to commence.—The present position of France is so much the more afflicting, as were war openly declared (which it is not) it is utterly impossible that she can suffer in a greater degree all its evils, and all its horrors. Every where, wherever the armies are (all excepting the English,) pillage, fire, rape, and murder, have been carried to their fullest extent; avarice and vengeance have left nothing for the officers or soldiers to desire.—To speak with freedom, they exceed even the atrocities of which the French armies have been too often justly accused. The measures, however, alluded to in your notes, can have no other results than to extend the limits of this devastation. The armies spread themselves in our provinces, and all the horrors which we have depicted follow in their train. Such are the sentiments of the king and his ministers on the new decree, and their answer to the appeal which has been made to them.

They have the honor to subscribe themselves, with the highest consideration.

TALLEYRAND, FOUCHE.

CHRONICLE.

The Creek Indians.—There is some reason to believe that the Creek Indians may give a little trouble. They appear dissatisfied with their late treaty. In consequence, 2000 men are called for from Georgia, by major-gen. Gaines, for whose detachment orders have been issued by the governor of that state. The line, according to the treaty, has not been run in consequence of the death of gen. Sevier, and the severe and continued illness of col. Hawkins, two of the commissioners.

Vermont election.—The votes for governor, as canvassed by the legislature, stand thus—

For Galusha (rep.)	18,055
Chittenden (fed.)	16,632

1,423

Scattering,	571
-------------	-----

The average majority for the republican council (or senate) was about 1,120. The rep. maj. in the house of representatives is about 15, and in joint ballot 27.

Banks.—It is with pleasure we learn that seven of the non acceding banks to the secretary of the treasury of the United States' proposition, relative to the receipt and issue of treasury notes as current money, have, upon more mature reflection, acceded to the proposition. The banks are—

The Bank of Hudson.

The Utica Bank.

The Orange county bank.

The State Bank, Morristown.

The Bank of the Northern Liberties, (Phalad.)

The Farmers and Mechanics' Bank, (Cincinnati.)

N. Y. Nat. Advocate.

Great folks. Many passengers arrive from Europe. Among those who have recently reached New-York, is the count Regnaud de St. Jean d'Angely, and some of his family—and the earl and countess of Selkirk and family.

Colonel Johnson and major Madison, both well-known heroes of the north-west—gentlemen of fine talents and high minds, ardently devoted to the republic, are candidates for the office of governor of the state of Kentucky. It is unfortunate that two men so highly esteemed by the patriots of that state should be opposed. We wish that both might be honored as they deserve.

Mr. Clay having returned among his fellow-citizens of Kentucky, is almost daily receiving some new evidence of their love and respect.

The Fisheries. Mr. Asheron, the British agent for the province of New Brunswick, writes thus explicitly of the fisheries:

"LONDON, July 10. The intercourse between the United States and the king's colonies is to be strictly carried on in British built vessels, and none others.

"The Americans are excluded from the shore fisheries, and are not allowed to come into our harbors, as formerly, to fish; they are to possess in this respect no other right than the subjects of foreign nations; which, by the law nations, is limited to three leagues from the coast."—Edin. Gazette.

Two persons were recently taken up in Baltimore for having passed a large quantity of counterfeit notes—they purported to be of the bank of North America, Farmers' Bank of Lancaster and the Union bank of Georgetown. There are vast quantities of counterfeit paper in circulation, and we are told there are also several ideal banks. The public cannot be too cautious against imposition.

Naval arsenal.—A correct survey of the river, harbor and coast adjacent to New-London has been taken by captain Evans, of the United States navy, with a view to the establishment of an United States naval arsenal at that place. It is found that 27 feet water may be carried six miles above the town.

Literary.—Mr. Small, of Philadelphia, has issued proposals for publishing, in 3 vols. 8vo. a work entitled—"Memoirs of my own times, by James Wilkinson, late a major-general in the service of the United States;" the work will commence with the period of the partial investiture of the town of Boston, by the American militia, in 1775, and terminate with the disorganization of the army in 1815. Each vol. to contain 500 pages, at $3 per vol. payable on delivery.

Major Reed, aid de camp to gen. Jackson, is preparing to write a history of the life of that hero, comprising a full account of the late war in the south, with the Creeks, or their allies the British. To make an 8vo volume of about 400 pages.

The late Dr. Ramsay's great historical work is in forwardness for publication—and will probably be one of the best, if not the best, of its kind, ever offered to the world. Rarely has a man lived more competent to the task than was our late venerable countryman.

Product of Labor. A writer in the Buffalo Journal comparing the relative prices of labor and provisions in New England with those in the western country, affirms, that "the actual price of labor in the western country is four times higher than in the eastern states: or in other words, a laborer has to work only one-fourth as much to support his family in this country as in that." The ordinary value of corn at the westward is 50 cents per bushel—at the eastward from 80 cents to a dollar; wages for mechanics, 1 dollar per day, exclusive of board, in the eastern states; in the west of New-York, from 2 dollars to 18 shillings a day.

Harmony Society. This celebrated society, under the direction of Mr. George Rapp, have settled themselves on the Wabash, about 30 miles above its junction with the Ohio, in the Indiana territory—a delightful spot, abounding with streams fitted to drive all sorts of machinery. They own 17,000 acres of land, which they bought at two dollars per acre. It is probable, that by the invincible perseverance and industry of this people, it may be worth twenty dollars per acre in four or five years.

Education. A "Lancastrian" seminary at Cincinnati, received more than four hundred scholars in the course of the first week, after it was opened.

Abbe Sicard. It appears by our French papers that this celebrated man was on his way for England with three or four of his pupils, accompanied also by his secretary and an interpreter: "having been invited to London in order to establish an institution for the education of the deaf and dumb, similar to that of Paris. He has obtained from the government leave of absence for several months."

Western Virginia is improving as rapidly as almost any other section of the United States. It is a charming country, populated by an intelligent and high spirited people, having few slaves. The town of Lynchburg, that ten years ago was quite an insignificant place, now has a population of 2500 souls; doing a great deal of business.

A Dwarf, is exhibiting in England, who is twenty six years old, 23 inches high and weighs only 27 pounds. He is reported as well made, and is considered "the shortest man ever seen." He has not grown any since he was six years old.

Steam-boats. There are six steam packet-boats plying on the Clyde, Scotland, Extraordinary snake. A letter to the editor of the REGISTER, notices as a curiosity, the killing of a rattlesnake in the Alleghany mountains, "that had twenty-nine rattles, and must, therefore, have been thirty-two years old." It was four feet long and about 8 inches in circumference.

Delaware Election. The election for members of assembly in this state, has resulted, as usual, in the choice of 14 federalists and 7 republicans, for the house of representatives—with the addition of a federal senator from the republican county of Newcastle, through some division among the people.

SOMETHING WONDERFUL. From the Easton, (Md.) Star. Three men from Kent Island were lately fishing for drum, off Love point, in about 25 feet water, and having been there a considerable time without success, at length (Haycock) one of the party felt something move his line, and upon drawing it in, found he had brought up a large earthen jug, and his hook, with the bait within it; which being unable to extricate, he broke the jug in pieces, when, to his utter surprize and astonishment, he discovered a large catfish, fourteen inches in length, which had been enveloped in the jug, and swallowed his hook with the bait. It is supposed the jug was lost from some vessel, and having settled at the bottom in a perpendicular situation, the fish entered it when small, and being attracted by something in it, or not being able to find its way out, continued there till grown too large to get out at the mouth; and the bait having accidentally fallen into it, was seized with avidity by the fish. The jug must have been a long time at the bottom, as there was very long grass and several large oysters adhering to it.

"THE RIGHT OF SEARCH!"

Buffalo, Oct. 17. "The American schooner Mink, captain Hammond, on her passage from Detroit to Buffalo, when passing the British armed schooner Nawash, lieutenant Drury, on the 1st inst. near Ballast Island, about two miles from Put-in-Bay, was fired upon by the schooner without being hailed, or receiving the least other previous intimation. The shot passed just over the bowsprit of the Mink. Captain Hammond immediately hoisted the American colors, supposing that to be the object of the British. Another shot was then fired from the schooner, which passed through the foresail of the Mink, not four feet from where the passengers were standing on the deck. Captain Hammond then brought his vessel to, although there was great danger in doing it, of falling on the breakers. The British commander ordered him to send his boat aboard the Nawash—the boat was accordingly got out, and captain Hammond went aboard. After making a number of enquiries relative to the news at Detroit, and the passengers he had aboard, the British officer ordered him to return to his vessel, without assigning any reason for his outrageous conduct!"

The able editor of the Niagara Journal (from which the preceding is copied) has a number of excellent remarks upon this outrage, so truly British and "magnanimous." We wish we had room for them. But "the long and the short of the matter" is this—that the insult must and will be atoned for. On Erice, that theatre of our naval glory, impudence shall not pass unrewarded.

"* * We are really apprehensive that the puppyism of British naval officers, whose luck it was not to meet an equal American force during the late war, may lead to serious difficulties. The time has gone by when such things could be looked at with forbearance, if unpunished. The national character will be supported. We ask nothing but common civility—a quality too rarely found on board a British ship. On the lakes, at least, where there is no sort of pretext for being otherwise, however, we will have it."

New-York, October 24.—We learn by a gentleman from Canada that 7,000 troops were expected from England to garrison the different fortifications on the lakes, &c. and that the British were fortifying the Isle au Noix, on lake Champlain.

Mortality.—The deaths in the city of Charleston, from the 10th to the 17th September, were eight! four of whom died of infantile diseases—four were white and four black. The world, we think, can hardly produce such another instance of health, in a hot climate and a compactly built city. Gaz.

Kingdom of the Netherlands.

We have the following account of the kingdom of the Netherlands, in a late Boston Daily Advertiser :

This new kingdom embraces, besides the seven United Provinces, the greater part of the country generally known under the name of the Austrian Netherlands. It was all included in the year 1812 within the French empire and formed the greater part of sixteen French departments. The Austrian provinces were annexed in the year 1795, soon after their conquest by the French, being formed into nine departments and were formally ceded to France by the emperor of Germany, at the treaty of Campo Formio, in October, 1799. The United Provinces after their conquest by the French, for some years bore the name of the Batavian Republic, afterwards that of the kingdom of Holland, and were not formally annexed to the empire until 1810. They were then divided into seven departments, corresponding nearly with the seven Provinces. The following statement of the population of the country, founded on the estimates made by the French authorities, of the inhabitants of the several departments while belonging to France, may be considered as near the truth as any that can at present be obtained.

War Events :

Or, matters belonging to the late war.

THE ELEVENTH OF SEPTEMBER.

Middlebury, (Vt.) Sept. 20.—The return of this memorable day was rendered highly interesting in this place, by the meeting of the first brigade of the third division of the militia. Though the weather was unpleasant, the exercises of the day were unusually gratifying. The scene was enlivened by the presence of a respectable number of the patriotic VOLUNTEERS (many of them under arms) who, one year before evinced their devotion to their country by turning out in its defence. The whole was crowned by the animating presence of that distinguished citizen-soldier, general Strong. The appearance of the brigade was unusually fine. A new spirit seemed infused into it, and all appeared emulous to excel in a prompt discharge of duty.

Towards evening, the immense concourse of spectators were gratified with a sham fight designed, as near as circumstances would permit, to imitate the battle of Plattsburgh. At the close of it, lord Wellington's invincibles having been repulsed and driven and whipped by the Yankees! gen Strong, surrounded by the volunteers, addressed them as near as we could collect, in the following manner:

FELLOW CITIZENS,

It is one year, this day since you met the powerful foe that carries fear and terror to all nations except America. So long as your firm, united and patriotic spirit exists your country may stand fearless of any nation. The events at New Orleans, Plattsburg and many other places where our late enemy so confidently attacked, and was so disgracefully defeated, will, to the honor and safety of the American nation, be held in lasting remembrance.

A most invaluable effect of your late patriotic exertions for defence, on the present and future generations will be a conviction, that though divisions as to men and measures may exist among us, yet we are and will be, one universal people, in defending our soil against all foreign invaders; and while that spirit exists which governed our fathers in the year '76, and animated their sons in the ever memorable year 1814, we are safe from foreign oppression.

At the review of the brigade, on the day following, it was addressed, by gen. Strong as near as we could ascertain as follows:

SOLDIERS—Your military appearance and performances have exceeded my expectations. Though the weather has been unfavorable for military manœuvres, so much has been done, as to convince all, that the militia have of late very much improved. Much credit is due to the officers for their attention, and to the soldiers for their united exertions in placing the militia on that firm and all important ground contemplated in our constitution. So long as we follow the examples of those who made us free, so long we shall be able to support that proud name sustained by our fathers in the year 1776.

Green mountain boys, citizens and soldiers—You well remember your situation one year ago to day. The smile of friendship was on every countenance—Plattsburg protected—the enemy retreating—brothers congratulating each other on success—fathers, wives, children and friends, welcoming you home, and a grateful country highly approving your conduct. Great is your reward. To enjoy freedom, you must at all times be prepared to protect your rights. Cherish the spirit, and persevere in the exertions which have recently prevailed, and we shall remain a free people.

STRENGTH OF THE SOUTH. Pendleton district, S. C. furnished during the late war, upwards of 1,000 militia and 400 regulars for the actual service of the United States. This district is in the interior, "immediately under the Big Mountains," says a letter to the editor; "and in 1790, the only place of public resort was the muster ground of the county, at which the little effective Mockasin force was collected." This letter, written several months ago, adds—"we are far removed from the theatre of war, but always ready to share it—500 men, assembled at Pendleton Court-House on the 1st of February (1815) on a call from general Pinckney, in four days after the orders were received at that place, to march to the seaboard."

MONUMENT TO BURROWS. Portland, September 27.—It is with peculiar pride and pleasure, we record an instance of liberality and honorable munificence to the memory of the brave, which recently came under our inspection.

A gentleman from New-York, MATTHEW L. DAVIS, Esq. while passing through town a few days since, on a tour to the eastward, had accidentally taken a walk into our burying ground. His attention was attracted to the neglected grave of the late captain BURROWS. The only guide to the spot, where is deposited the remains of one, who had so much heroic merit, and who deserved so much of his country, was the tomb-stone of his deceased competitor, the British captain Blythe. This was erected two years since by the surviving officers of the Boxer. The thought was instant. Mr. D. immediately gave orders for an elegant marble monument to be erected over the grave of Burrows—to be finished by his return, and without the sparing of labor or expense. It is now completed and put up. Its style of execution does much credit to the ingenious artist, Mr. Bartlett Adams, of this town; the inscription is highly creditable to the taste, judgment, and modesty of the generous donor, and worthy the hero whom it is designed to commemorate. It is in the following words:

BENEATH THIS STONE
In moulders
THE BODY OF WILLIAM BURROWS,

Late Commander of the United States' brig ENTERPRIZE, who was mortally wounded

ON THE FIFTH OF SEPTEMBER, 1813,

In an Action which contributed to increase the Fame of American Valor
by capturing

His Britannic Majesty's brig BOXER, after a severe contest of forty-five minutes.

A passing stranger has erected this Monument of respect to the manes of a Patriot, who, in the hour of peril, obeyed the loud summons of an injured country; and who gallantly met, fought and conquered the foe.

DARTMOOR MASSACRE. The following fact has been been communicated to the editor of the Weekly Register from a source claiming entire belief:

To those who have read the documents respecting the tragedy at Dartmoor, the fact is familiar that certain Americans were branded as traitors by their fellow citizens there, for agreeing to enter the British service to relieve themselves from the sufferings of that infernal prison—for this certain of them were tried, but for want of evidence or something else, were acquitted. The infamous Shortland was exceedingly enraged at it, and swore, most bitterly and blasphemously, that he would have satisfaction for it, before he was done with them, in their blood, or words to this effect. The rascal kept his oath.

FROM THE ESSEX REGISTER.

Mr. Palfray—By publishing the inclosed resolutions, adopted at York, in Maine, by a number of our sea-fearing brethren lately returned from Dartmoor prison, you will particularly oblige

A SUBSCRIBER.

We, the undersigned, late prisoners at Dartmoor, England, congratulate ourselves and each other on the return of peace, and our safe arrival in our native land, after so long and cruel a confinement.

And we resolve, that we have seen with mingled surprise and indignation, the statement of the circumstances which led to the unhappy massacre at Dartmoor, by the orders of the infamous Shortland, signed by CHARLES KING on behalf of the United States, and FRANCIS LARRENT on the part of Great Britain, founded almost entirely on the testimony of British officers, on their honor—whilst, at the same time, the aforesaid commissioners neglected to examine the positive evidence that could have been adduced by the prisoners, to show that these unfortunate victims of British barbarity were butchered by a blood-thirsty bacchanal, in consequence of positive orders given by him to fire on those unfortunate Americans, to gratify a private pique, for which he had so long sought a plausible pretext; and as the time of their departure drew near, afraid that the objects of his malice might escape, if he delayed, he falsely pretended that the prisoners had an intention of escaping, when he knew the fear of again being impressed into the service of the ancient enemy of their country would prevent them; and, besides, had they the disposition, they had not the means to effect this pretended purpose, from their destitute situation in a foreign land.

And we further resolve, that we have seen with great astonishment, a resolve of the legislature of our native state, once the cradle of liberty, purporting, that after diligent enquiry having been had, only sixteen instances of impressment could be satisfactorily substantiated, when the single prison of Dartmoor contained 2300 of our fellow-citizens in that predicament, who had surrendered themselves as prisoners of war at the commencement of hostilities, more than 350 of whom were native citizens of Massachusetts. Some of these unfortunate victims of British cruelty had been forcibly detained for more than twenty years in the British service, separated from all they held dear—from their native land of liberty, from their wives, children and friends, held in the most oppressive bondage, the better part of their lives wasted and worn out, in fighting the battles of a foreign power with nations then at peace with their own.

And we further resolve, that the thanks of the undersigned are justly due to Dr. Magrath, the physician of the hospital, for his kindness to the prisoners generally, while we call down the choicest curses of Heaven upon the head of that murderous miscreant, the infamous Shortland.

And we further resolve, that every impression we formerly entertained in favor of the British nation, as magnanimous, pious, liberal, honorable or brave, is utterly extinguished by the regular and systematic oppression, practised under our own observation, calculated to render our existence uncomfortable, and by breaking down our spirits and abusing our feelings, to hurry us out of this world into eternity.

And we further resolve, that whilst with pride and pleasure, we have heard recounted the repeated exploits of our infant navy, which have given our country an exalted rank amongst the nations of the earth, we cannot sufficiently express our contempt for the pusillanimous conduct of a great and powerful state, in suffering an enemy of a barbarous character, to occupy, with an inconsiderable force, one third part of its territory; so strongly contrasted with the gallantry of our western brethren, when the intrepid Jackson led his valiant band to victory and glory, prevented the horrors of St. Sebastian's from being repeated at New-Orleans, preserved that city from indiscriminate rapine and ravishment, which the ungallant Packenham had promised to his troops, as incentives to their courage; but instead of the arms of beauty he met the embraces of death; instead of booty he found an untimely grave. So perish all the enemies of America!

And we further resolve, that whilst our gallant naval heroes, Bainbridge, Decatur, Hull, Jones, Rid-ale, Blakely, the lamented Lawrence, Warrington, Morris, Perry and Macdonough, have been earning laurels for their country, a desperate and unprincipled faction have been plotting the dismemberment of the union, the erection of a monarchy in New-England, discouraging enlistments, preventing loans, by depreciating public credit, aiding and abetting the enemy, by supplying him with provisions, whereby he was enabled, by hovering round our shores and the mouths of our harbors, to capture many of our private armed vessels, all of which had a tendency to prolong the war, increase the number of prisoners, and keep us longer from our homes. We therefore declare that we have no longer any confidence in men who rejoiced at the misfortunes of their own country and gloried in the victories gained by the enemy, merely as a means of increasing their influence, and raising themselves to power; who stigmatized those who engaged in the war, directly or indirectly, as murderers: who have repeatedly declared that the impressment of seamen is no cause of war, when we know that more than two, perhaps three thousand, have been released from a worse than Algerine bondage, in consequence of this same "unjust and unnecessary war"—such men, whatever they may pretend, are no friends to sailors, or sailors' rights.

HARTFORD CONVENTION. In a large number of the federal votes given at the late election in Vermont, the name of William Hall was struck out and the words "Hartford Convention" substituted in its place. This man was a delegate to that infamous assembly, appointed by no body knows who, and we are glad to see this evidence of the contempt that should forever attach to each one of that knot.

GEN. PIKE. From the Analectic Magazine.—The following is a correct copy of the last letter of general Pike. It was handed to his aid, on the evening previous to his fall, with this injunction—"Should I fall and you survive, hand this yourself to Mrs. Pike." As it breathes a spirit of patriotism and affection worthy of the departed hero, I have thought it worthy of preservation and publication.—D. F.

"My dear Clara,—We are now standing on and off the harbor of York, which we shall attack at daylight in the morning: I shall dedicate these last moments to you, my love, and to-morrow throw all other ideas but my country to the winds. As yet, I know not if general Dearborn lands; he has acted honorably so far, and I feel great gratitude to the old gentleman: my sword and pen shall both be exerted to do him honor. I have no new injunction, no new charge to give you; nor no new idea to communicate; yet we love to commune with those we love, more especially when we conceive it may be the last time in this world. Should I fall, defend my memory, and only believe, had I lived, I would have aspired to deeds worthy of your husband.—Remember me, with a father's love—a father's care, to our dear daughter; and believe me to be, with the warmest sentiments of love and friendship,

Wasp and Avon. The following particulars of the action between the U. States' sloop of war Wasp, and H. B. M. sloop of war Avon, were gathered from a conversation by a gentleman on board the U. States' schooner Nonsuch, at Halifax, (N. S.) with the surgeon of the Avon.

The Avon mounted 18 32-pound carronades and one long shifting 12; had a complement of 120 men. The action lasted 40 minutes. There were 22 men killed—among them the 1st lieutenant; 5 wounded men were left in the cockpit when the Avon went down—the greater part of the crew were wounded and many severely. It was afterwards necessary to amputate the commander's leg (captain James.) The Avon was literally cut to pieces; when sinking they called to the American commander, who had his boats lowering, when, on the appearance of two sloops of war, he hoisted them in and bore away.—The last boat that left the Avon scarcely escaped the suction occasioned by her going down. The surgeon seemed much astonished on hearing the size of the Wasp and her complement of men. She was considered by him as greatly larger, and much superior in point of force.—Norfolk Ledger.

DIVISION ORDERS.

Head-quarters, Sacket's Harbor, Adjutant-general's Office, May 12, 1815.

The period has arrived when the soldiers of this division of the army, who have enlisted for during the war, will receive their arrearages, and an honorable discharge from the service of their country.

The colonel commanding, directs that their arms and accoutrements be first delivered over to the deputy commissary of ordnance, and the adoption of the following order of payment and final discharge, viz.

The 9th and 25th, the 11th and 22d, the 1st and 21st, the light artillery, corps of artillery and 45th infantry, the 23d, and lastly the 18th. Two days will intervene between the payment of each regiment as above connected and arranged. The five years' men will not be paid, until those for during the war shall have left the post.

Commandants of brigades and regiments are aware of the necessity of adopting system and method, in the disbandment of sixteen hundred soldiers; they are called on strictly, to carry into effect the immediate and orderly departure of their respective commands, as soon as paid off.

The colonel flatters himself, that the soldiers, the heroes of the gallant deeds of the last campaign, who, by their valor have added new glory to the American nation; will not allow a character so honorable to be tarnished by unsoldier-like and ungentlemanly conduct, whilst returning to their civil avocations. Let the valuable non-commissioned officers set a laudable example. Soldiers, by your sobriety and general good conduct, convince your fellow citizens that you are as valuable and meritorious in domestic life, as you have been brave and victorious in the field. Patriotic gratitude will direct their conduct towards you; they will respect and kindly treat those men who have fought and suffered for their country—who so long have stood its faithful sentinels on the frozen borders of Erie, Niagara, Ontario and the St. Lawrence.

Many of you have parents, wives and children; these, with all the endearing ties of social and private life, you left, when your country, to revenge her injuries, rallied you to her banners. You have done your duty—they now anxiously await your honorable return. Husband the earnings of your glorious toil—reserve for them the pleasure of participating with you the rewards of your services.

The land presented you by the United States is of more value, than many of you suppose; that given the revolutionary soldiers, was, perhaps considered at the period of its donation of less importance than the tract which will be apportioned to you at the present day. Beware of base speculators on your dear-bought rights. Secure and reserve your land—if possible, settle it—in a few years it will be an ample independence for you and your families. The most beautiful section of this state was, in part, the reward of the veterans who achieved the revolution and established our independence; some of them wisely retained and cultivated this well deserved bounty from their country. They soon were remunerated for their industry and enterprise. In your marches to the Niagara frontier, you have seen the honorable and prudent soldier of those days, enjoying all the blessings of life on the very land his valor and patriotism had acquired, and his industry had improved. Emulate their example in private life, as you have rivalled their glory in the field—and you, citizen soldiers, may hope for equal prosperity.

The colonel commanding, in behalf of your country and your absent general, presents you his most cordial wishes for a happy return to your homes, and that health and happiness may attend you through life.

BRITISH OPINIONS. Extract of a letter from an English gentleman in London, to an American gentleman in Philadelphia, dated 21st July, 1815:

"The war was a subject of general regret here; at least I never met with a single individual who did not lament it. It is indeed sincerely to be hoped that it may teach moderation to each party, as it has shown that each can do the other much injury. Captain —, of the — frigate, with whom I had a long conversation just before I left Dublin, told me he had captured and destroyed three hundred and twenty sail of American vessels on the different stations upon which he had been placed.* The result of the war, however, may be summed up in a few words. It has humbled the tone of our ministry and of the nation, and made the United States much more respected in Europe. Success dazzles mankind, and few sit down patiently to investigate the real causes of failure or victory. Those however, who do so, will, perhaps, discover, that in every instance of triumph, your vessels were stronger, and the crews numerically greater, as well as much more select. It is notorious that our ships of war count three classes of men: able seamen; ordinary seamen and landsmen: and the proportion of the former, in our very extended navy, of necessity becomes small.—Your ships contained, as far as I am informed, all able seamen, all volunteers. Our admiralty should have known the enemy we had to deal with, and have distributed our force accordingly; for it was quite obvious to all our officers who had seen your frigates in the Mediterranean, and lain alongside of them, that they were much more powerful vessels than ours, and better manned. Now that the game is over, we are building frigates exactly after your model. They should have been built sooner, and manned with prime hands: and as little as possible left to chance. As it is, the charm of invincibility is broken, and it will influence, in spite of every effort, the future contests between the two nations; though I sincerely trust such contests are far off. At Portsmouth lately, I saw on board one of our crack frigates, the new sights for cannon adopted from your service. These in themselves must, if used in the action, have given a very considerable advantage. It is no mean distinction, that the Americans are teaching, at the present day, a new system to England in naval affairs. The war on shore seems nearly a repetition of the revolutionary war, the history of which one would think, had either made no impression upon our ministry, or never been read: otherwise they could hardly have been such dunces as to commit the very same errors. The most disgraceful part of the war to us, as far as I can judge, was the affair at Plattsburg. The first measures of the Canadian war on our side, should have been the destruction of this place and of Sackett's Harbor, before time had been allowed to strengthen them; and more troops should have been allotted to the service. As for the affair at New-Orleans, we were already informed of the fatal result before the receipt of your letter.—Surely, our commanders ought to have known what sort of fire might be expected from an American intrenched force. Good marksmen who are cool have an advantage almost incalculable in such a position, and it is said 500 of our men fell on the first fire, without seeing an enemy to attack in return."—U. States' Gazette.

NAVAL COURT. Opinion of the court of enquiry convened at New-York on the 2d day of September, 1815, by order of the secretary of the navy, to examine into the causes and circumstances which produced the capture of the U. S. late brig SIXX, under command of lieutenant commandant N. D. Nicholson.

"The court, being perfectly satisfied with the evidence adduced, was cleared, and after mature deliberation on all the circumstances, is of opinion, that no censure can be attached to lieut. commandant Nicholson for the loss of the Siren; but, on the contrary, that his conduct was that of a cool, vigilant, zealous and active officer. The court is also of opinion, that the conduct of the officers and crew during the chase, was perfectly correct and free from censure."

The editor of a newspaper published at Nottingham, England, animadverting on the conflagration of the national library at Washington city, stated, that "the burning of the library was an act without example in modern wars, or in any other wars, since the inroads of the barbarians who conflagrated Rome, and overthrew the Roman empire." The printer was prosecuted for this as a libel, and has been condemned to such punishment as is usually inflicted on the most abandoned villains. Naval Affairs.

We have been favored by the same attentive correspondent with another letter* from an officer of the navy to his friend, detailing, in a minute and perspicuous manner, the great importance of dry docks, and the series of unavoidable dangers and disadvantages to which vessels of a large class must be subjected in the tedious operation of careening. We think his arguments unanswerable; and, therefore, cannot refrain from recommending them to the serious perusal of all, especially of those who take a lively interest in whatever concerns the prosperity of our gallant navy:]

A third interesting letter from an officer of the United States' navy to his friend, a member of congress, dated at

WASHINGTON, Sept. 20th, 1815.

DEAR SIR—It is very natural that you should enquire, why dry docks are now more necessary to our navy than at any former period, and why they are necessary at all? On these questions I shall endeavor to furnish you with a few explanatory remarks, that, in my opinion, will afford the most satisfactory answers to them; and, at the same time, connect with these remarks, as I go along, some useful facts and estimates relative to the cost, the economy, and the many other advantages resulting from the use of dry docks, as well as to the manner of erecting them.

Dry docks have always been a great desideratum in our naval establishment. The necessity for them has indeed been long and severely felt, though not more so than at the present period. Heretofore we had no larger vessels in our navy than frigates, and these we were enabled, some how or other, to heave down when their bottoms required repairing, at a great expense and under many inconveniences and delays. In this operation the ships have always been greatly strained and some very seriously injured, by being thrown out of their original shape; some have sprung their masts; and, to my knowledge, an instance has occurred of the sinking of a frigate while undergoing this unnatural ordeal. But, that you may be enabled to form some idea of the magnitude of the dangers and difficulties to which ships are invariably exposed in being hove down, I shall, as briefly as possible, give you a description of that operation.

The careening of a ship is effected by affixing tackles, or purchases, to the mast head, and to the wharf or shore by which she is to be hove down: to the fall or end of each of these tackles a force is then applied, and the mast operating as a lever with the vessel's sides for a fulcrum, she is by these means brought keel out of water. Two of these tackles are in general applied, one to the foremast and the other to the mainmast.—They are commonly four fold, and to heave down a frigate with them, keel out, it is necessary to employ a force equal in power to the strength of ten or twelve hundred men; thus making, according to accurate calculation, the quantum of the actual force applied to the lever equal to the united strength of five thousand men! To prepare a ship for careening with her keel out, every article on board must be landed from her—her upper works previously caulked, and her masts well secured by preventer shrouds, by shores, by outriggers, and by various other complex and precautionary contrivances.—Considerable weight must then be placed upon her bowsprit and on her bows, in order to bring her down by the head; that her keel, or the after part of it, may be brought out of water; and thus, with her keel out of water, and supported only by the bilge or round of her side, this immense force is incessantly straining upon her masts and hull, while, at the same time, a great weight is pressing upon her bows, and her whole stern is weighing down the opposite extremity. It is evident, that while in this situation, the ship must be exposed to many accidents; for if either of the tackles should give way, not only the lives of the men employed at her bottom are subject at once to the most imminent danger, but the loss of one of her masts must inevitably follow. Should there be any rise or fall of tide, the utmost attention is required to the security of the tackles; for, unless they were duly slackened upon the rising of the tide, the ship would certainly upset from the confinement of the lever; and upon the same principle, unless they were equally attended to upon the ebbing of the tide, she must necessarily right so much as to render it impossible to work at her bottom. In addition to all this, the position in which she lays occasions her to strain to such a degree as to open her seams and expose her to the danger of sinking, notwithstanding the constant effect of pumps in reducing the water, which no precautionary measures can prevent from leaking in. We have always been compelled to resort to this expedient in repairing the bottoms of our ships of war, however trifling the injuries they had sustained. In this way our frigates, with the exception of the Guerriere and Java, have several times been hove down; some have had considerable repairs done to their bottoms, but not one of them has escaped the operation without being strained and weakened to such a degree as to render it absolutely unsafe (considering their age) to repair them over again in this way. Some of them have been still more weakened in the hull by the removal of old plank for the purpose of putting on new ones; for, as the old trenails and bolts remain, new holes must be bored, until, by successive repairs in this way, the strength of the respective timbers is almost totally destroyed. The frigates Constitution, United States, Constellation, Congress, and, in fact, all the old ships now in service, it is believed, have not sufficient strength to bear the operation of heaving down; and the President, when last careened, was so strained as to cause one of her quarters to rise eighteen inches higher than the other, and her shape so completely distorted as to make it utterly impossible for her ever to recover it again.

*The reader will please to correct the following error in our last—page 142, 1st col. 12th line from the bottom—for "All the other yards and establishments might be sold, buildings erected," &c. read All the other yards and establishments, might be sold, AND WITH THE PROCEEDS OF THEIR SALE buildings MIGHT BE erected, &c.

I am thus particular in laying these facts before you, relative to the difficult and dangerous operation of careening even frigates, knowing as I do that the subject is new to you, and that therefore I cannot be too precise in my explanations. I am not certain, however, that I have been able to make you comprehend fully the awkward and uneasy situation of a ship when hoisted keel out, as I have been under the necessity of using some technical terms which, perhaps, you do not understand. To provide against this disadvantage, I will state as clearly as possible, that my wish is to make you sensible that a frigate cannot be hoisted down without being greatly strained; an idea of the extent of which you will be able to form, by figuring to yourself a vessel of this description drawn down on her beam ends, by a force of not less than three or four hundred tons applied to her mast-heads, keeping in mind at the same time the great masses of timber composing her bows and stern, which remain entirely unsupported except by the plank and timber connecting them with the midship frame. In this state, (from which the ship never escapes uninjured) when extensive repairs are required, she must remain for several days, and in some cases even for many weeks; during which her crew must be subsisted on shore, or on board a receiving ship—her rigging, sails, stores, cordage, &c. put on shore—a scene of confusion introduced into every department—discipline relaxed—desertions hazarded—bad habits promoted amongst the men—and, in short, every evil experienced to which a state of things like this might be expected to give rise.—All this has been the fate of frigates and smaller vessels in operations of this kind, and I state it here amongst the calamities incurred by vessels in undergoing them, as I shall speak of the expense hereafter.

If, then, the careening of frigates when new and strong, has invariably been attended with so much injury and inconvenience, what dangers and disadvantages may we not reasonably look for in attempting to careen them when old and crazy? And if these be the dangers and disadvantages uniformly attendant upon frigates while under this operation, who can calculate the extent of the danger, inconvenience and injury to which, under similar circumstances, a ship of 74 guns must inevitably be exposed? I admit, that while our frigates and smaller vessels were new and strong, we were enabled, for the want of better means, to careen them when it became necessary to overhaul their bottoms; but they are now old, and will soon require such extensive repairs as to render their heaving down totally impracticable. Hence it becomes necessary either to haul them up on shore, or to erect dry docks for their accommodation. And although the Adams, the Enterprise, and some other vessels of that class were repaired agreeable to the former plan, yet it was found that the expence of hauling them up exceeded all moderate calculation, and that the cost of repairing them in this way, when launched, did not fall short of that required to build an entire new ship. Besides, however well the plan might answer for repairing smaller vessels, it would assuredly not do to repair frigates—at least it has not yet been tried with them. How much less then would it answer for ships of the line?

There can be no doubt but that ships of the line, while new, may be hoisted down; but the injuries to which they must inevitably be exposed in undergoing the operation, will necessarily be very considerable, and a few years will make it indispensable for us to provide some other method of repairing them. It is proper, therefore, that we should begin to prepare the means in time, for if any accident should now make it necessary to overhaul the bottom of one of our 74 gun ships, there is no other mode by which it could be effected than, either subjecting her to the tedious, vexatious, injurious, dangerous and expensive operation of heaving down, or sending her to one of the dry docks of England, France, Spain, Portugal, or the Grand Seigneur.—Whereas, if such a convenient contrivance existed in the United States for a ship of that size, she could be sent in at one tide, have her damages repaired, and hauled out again the next. The truth is, that if we intend to keep up any thing like a respectable naval establishment, it will be impossible to dispense with the necessity of dry docks—for, build as many ships as you please, unless you possess the means of repairing their defects, they will soon decay, and one half of the time be of no service whatever.

Many persons are frightened at the idea of establishing dry docks in this country, and since the introduction of the gun-boat system (which has happily had its day) a man dare scarce open his mouth upon the subject without being thought mad. Whether this originates from a rooted prejudice against dry docks, or from a mistaken idea of the magnitude of the object, it is not my business at present to enquire; I will only say that, I believe it to be owing to both. But, let me assure you, my dear sir, that dry docks are very simple and cheap contrivances. They have them in England for their ships of war as well as for their merchant ships—we have one at Boston for merchant ships, and another at New-York, constructed by the late Mr. Fulton, for the repair of his steam-boats. To construct a dry dock, it is only necessary that a place should be dug out having nearly the shape of a ship's bottom, and of a sufficient depth to float a vessel at high water. This hollow place is then lined with logs or hewn stone, laid in the form of steps from the bottom upwards, and gates are fixed at the entrance where the water flows in, in a similar manner as gates are fixed to locks. And this completes the dry dock. When the tide is up, the ship is floated into this dock and the gates left open. When the tide falls, the ship is supported in an upright position by means of props placed against the sides of the dock; at low water the gates are shut, and the water remaining in the dock is pumped out with common hand-pumps, or with a steam-engine. All this with proper apparatus may be done in a few minutes, and the ship remain perfectly dry within the dock as long as may be necessary to make her repairs. She is in this situation as free from any pressure or straining as a ship on the stocks, and far more convenient for the workmen employed at her bottom. In places where there is a sufficient fall of tide to drain the dock after the ship is taken in, nothing more is necessary than to close the gates to prevent the water from returning at the rising of the tide; and where there is not a sufficient fall of the tide, nor the convenience of a steam engine but a stream of water, this by being led into double docks, one higher than the other, will raise the ship into the highest dock, in the same way as boats are raised over rapids from one lock to another. When her repairs are finished she may be taken out of the dock in the same manner, for, by letting in the water again until she floats, she may be hauled out with the greatest ease and without any danger or disadvantage. The only preparation necessary to be made previous to docking her, is the landing of her guns, and even this is not always necessary. In England it is not uncommon to take a ship into dock merely for the purpose of scrubbing and examining her bottom, but with us so trifling an operation cannot be performed without that laborious and extremely injurious process before described, to wit, careening.

With regard to the cost of erecting a dry dock, when compared with the expence and injury incurred by a ship in heaving down, it dwindles into a mere cypher. A single dry dock at this time would be fully adequate to the accommodation of our navy, and that dock, constructed of the best materials and in the best manner, would not cost more than $53,907 33.* It would last for ages, and greatly reduce the expence of repairing our ships; for no frigate can be hove down under an expence of less than $15,000. And if to this we add another item of $15,000 for a loss of time in a season of warfare and for injuries sustained by the vessel in heaving down, we shall find that the sum required for careening our frigates would in two years amount to more than sufficient to build a dry dock, capable of accommodating our navy were it even double the size it is at present.

These facts I could easily prove to you by calculation. But as I can have no motive in deceiving you, I presume this will be unnecessary. To shew, however, that my assertions upon this point should not excite any surprise, I will observe that, besides the wages of artificers and yard men employed in careening a frigate, I take into my estimation the pay and rations of her officers and crew for six months, as it has not been usual for our ships to careen in a less time. however revolting to our feelings as Americans, that he was born in the United States! The production to which we allude is distinguished by a cold-blooded apathy towards every thing American—by the most abject devotion to England—and by a tissue of misrepresentations, calculated to degrade, in the eyes of the world and of posterity, the name and character of the American nation. One of these glaring misrepresentations we are this day enabled officially to expose. It is that wherein he represents the conduct of the American army at the capture of York, in Upper Canada, in so false and barbarous a light. It will be seen by the statement of that distinguished officer, general Ripley—by the evidence of colonel Connor and major Grafion—and the letter of the British judge Scott, that so far from sacking, plundering, and wantonly destroying the city of York, general Dearborn treated it in such a humane and liberal manner, as reflects the highest lustre on his character, and the arms of the United States. Further comment, at this time, we deem superfluous. The facts speak loudly for themselves. A simple perusal of the documents is all that is requisite to prove the turpitude of the procedure.

[Boston Patriot.

FACTS RELATIVE TO THE CAPTURE OF YORK, UPPER CANADA.

In a work lately published in this town, bearing the title of "Goldsmith's History of England, with Wood's Continuation, and a Summary of Events by a Member of the Massachusetts Historical Society," I noticed the following paragraph:

"Little York, the capital of Upper Canada, was taken, sacked, and the public buildings wantonly destroyed in the former part of the campaign, by troops under general Dearborn; but the Americans were soon forced to abandon it, with considerable loss."

In justice to myself, the troops which I had the honor to command, and my country, I lay before the public the following statements.

H. DEARBORN,

Late a major-general in the U. S. army.

At the capture of York, the capital of Upper Canada, on the 27th April, 1813, the force of the enemy, under the immediate command of major-general Sheaff, having been repulsed and dispersed from the position they had taken on the bank of the lake, where they had formed to oppose the landing of the American troops, retreated to the principal works, where they remained only a sufficient time for placing slow matches to the magazines, and then continued their retreat to the town. When the American column, led on by the gallant general Pike, had advanced within a short distance of the works, a tremendous explosion of a large powder magazine killed and wounded more than a hundred of our brave men, and inflicted a mortal wound on the much-to-be-lamented general Pike; the column notwithstanding advanced, took possession of the works, and continued the pursuit of the enemy to the town, when a capitulation was offered and agreed to; by which such regular troops and militia as were then in the town, were to be considered as prisoners of war, and all public property to be surrendered to the American forces. In the mean time, general Sheaff, with about an hundred regular troops, made his escape, after directing the frigate on the stocks and a large store containing rigging and naval stores, to be set on fire, which acts were effected after terms of capitulation had been offered by him.

After the enemy had surrendered and laid down their arms, a strong guard was posted in the town under the direction of colonel, now major general,

Ripley, for the protection of the inhabitants, with strict orders to prevent any plundering or other improper conduct. Only two or three instances occurred of any complaints from the inhabitants, and those were from families which resided some distance from town. They were directed to send in a schedule of the articles taken, and their value, which was immediately refunded to them. An old schooner, said to be private property, which was aground, part filled with water, and without sails, was appraised at twelve hundred dollars and burnt.—The owner being out of town, the twelve hundred dollars were paid to judge Scott. No other private property was destroyed or taken away, excepting such as belonged to general Sheaff, and the officers who went off with him. Two military block-houses were burnt by orders, and also two sheds attached to the navy yard. It has appeared from recent information, that although the large building called the province house, was not burnt as heretofore stated, a small one-story building called the parliament house (in which a human scalp was found with the mace suspended near the speaker's chair, highly decorated,) was set on fire by some person unknown, but from the statements of colonel Conner and major Grafton, the inference is, that some exasperated subjects of Canada set fire to it after the troops of the United States were withdrawn from the town. No troops of the enemy appeared in arms after the capitulation, either while the American troops were on shore, nor during the four or five days our fleet remained in the harbor; therefore, the American troops were not forced to abandon the place with considerable loss.

To shew what the inhabitants of York thought of their treatment, the following copy of a letter from chief justice Scott is annexed. He resided in York, and wrote the letter but a few hours previous to the re-embarkation of the troops.

York, April 30, 1813.

Sir—I hasten to acknowledge the favor of your letter, enclosing an extract from the general orders of this day, by major-general Dearborn, commanding the forces of the United States, signifying that it is not his intention that the occupancy of the town and garrison of York, should have any undue effect on the necessary functions of the civil magistrates, but that it is his wish to support the civil authority when properly exercised, and that any representations of the civil magistrates of improper or irregular conduct on the part of the soldiers, will be met by immediate and strict severity.

On the part of the magistrates of York, I gratefully acknowledge the humane attention which has been paid by his excellency to the present situation of its inhabitants, by pursuing a line of conduct so conducive to the protection of a number of individuals, and so honorable to himself.

I am, sir, with consideration, your obedient humble servant,

THOS. SCOTT, Chief Justice.

Major PENNEY, Esq.

Deputy Adj. General U. S. Army.

It may be proper to observe, that on taking possession of York, with the public property, many poor women and children; families of soldiers, and others who had been killed, taken, or fled with general Sheaff, were found destitute of the necessaries of life, particularly bread, and from twenty-five to thirty barrels of flour, and a quantity of peas and pork, were by general Dearborn's orders distributed to those families, and an additional quantity of twenty barrels was delivered to a Humane Society of the town, to be distributed among the poor.

The judicious and unremitting exertions of commodore Chauncey, and the brave officers and seamen of his squadron, in the preparation and execution of this enterprize on York, and especially covering the landing of our troops, in destroying the enemy's batteries, and in removing and securing the public property captured, deserved the highest applause.

GENERAL RIPLEY'S STATEMENT.

HEAD-QUARTERS, BOSTON, Aug. 15, 1815.

Sir—I take the liberty to state the occurrences at York, after the capture of that place by the American forces on the 27th of April, 1813. You will then be able to determine how much truth there is in the work entitled, the "continuation of Goldsmith's history of England," so far as relates to the following article.

Previous to the place being carried, an order had been issued by the ever-to-be-lamented and gallant general Pike, prohibiting every species of plundering or depredation under the penalty of death. After the capitulation, a guard was posted in the town by direction of major-general Dearborn, to carry this order into the strictest effect. As field officer on duty during the first night, I had occasion repeatedly to visit the guard, and I always discovered it extremely vigilant and attentive. The next morning, at about seven or eight o'clock, I had occasion to visit the town. I met a straggler of the volunteers with his knapsack full of valuable plate. I ascertained it to belong to a lady; a daughter of the honorable judge Powell; it was immediately returned to her. I reported the circumstance to gen. Dearborn, who ordered this man confined, and directed me to order up all the 21st regiment, under command of major Grafton, to the town for the purpose of protecting the inhabitants. The officers were quartered in houses in town, and the system established, was for sentinels to be stationed to prevent depredations wherever it was requested.

If this regiment did its duty, it will be at once perceived that there could be no plundering: and that it did perform its duty will appear from several circumstances. That the knapsack of every man was searched previous to embarking, and not an article of plundered property was found. That the inhabitants of York were particularly pleased with their deportment in the city, and on every occasion testified their gratitude for their protection; and that when captain Pelham was wounded and taken prisoner at Chrystler Field, no sooner was it known that he was on duty in the regiment which protected the property of the inhabitants of York, than at the intercession of many highly respectable officers of the British army, he was paroled by sir George Prevost on that very account expressed in his letter, notwithstanding other officers at the same time were imprisoned under the question of retaliation agitated between the governments of the two nations; an instance of liberality which shews that acts of courtesy and kindness were properly appreciated by that officer.

Previous to the 21st regiment being ordered to the city of York, two buildings that had been evacuated and stood detached, had been stripped of many valuable articles by the stragglers. A schooner (private property) was also destroyed. When these facts were made known to major-general Dearborn, he instantly ordered the claims for damage to be liquidated and payment to be made. It was done. In the case of the property taken from the buildings, it was made to the proprietors personally. In that of the schooner, as the owner was absent from town, major-general Dearborn sent the money to judge Scott, who receipted for it.

When the place was captured, large stores of flour, beef and peas were found in depot. Agreeably to the articles of capitulation, these were delivered to us. Major-general Dearborn directed a large proportion of them to be delivered to the needy in the city, and particularly to the widows and families of the British and Canadian soldiers who had been killed in the action. In addition to this, considerable quantities were deposited with the clergyman of the place to be distributed in a similar manner.

During our stay at York, the citizens of the place seemed to be more alarmed by some inhabitants of the country, than in relation to the American forces. They frequently expressed their apprehensions in strong terms, and they had reason so to do. I recollect very well a man who lived in the vicinity of the town, who came to me one day, and observed, he intended to burn the gaol. I remarked to him, if he did I should hang him, and detached constantly a sentinel to guard it.

I have seen many British officers who have always complimented our forces for their liberality of conduct, on this occasion manifested at York. Some have informed me, that the inhabitants had applauded it in such forcible terms, that they had even been accused of disloyalty by the British army.

As it respects the manner in which York was stated to be evacuated, in the work I have alluded to, it is perfectly incorrect.

The object of striking York, at the opening of the campaign, was solely to destroy the frigate building there; and the military and naval depot. The first object was effected in order to ensure our control on lake Ontario during the summer of 1813. The second, with a view to destroy the military depot, from whence the right and central division of the army, under generals Proctor and Vincent, drew their supplies; and the naval depot to paralyze the efforts of the British in building ships on lake Erie. It was settled before the army left Sackett's Harbor, that these objects accomplished, the division would sail for Niagara and operate against Fort George. After the reduction of that post, the army was to concentrate, by means of the fleet, on Lake Ontario, and reduce Kingston.

I will add, that when we abandoned York, no British forces were, to my knowledge, nearer than Fort George on one side, and Kingston on the other.

I am, respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. W. RIPLEY,

Major-general, U. S. army.

Major-general Henry Dearborn.

COLONEL CONNER'S STATEMENT.

ALBANY, Sept. 18, 1815.

DEAR SIR—The conduct of the American troops at York, and that of the commander in chief, was marked by such humanity and attention to the wants and interests of the citizens that I should have supposed no "American gentleman," in an imposing historical form, would have hazarded assertions so directly to the contrary.

The explosion of the mine, which killed the gallant Pike, and killed and wounded more than one hundred men in our columns, did not add to the defence of the place, and perhaps the army would have been justified in subjecting York to all the severities of a town carried by assault. But far different was its treatment; the persons and property of the inhabitants were protected; large store-houses of valuable goods were thrown open next day by the citizens, and payment made in specie by our men, for any article they had occasion for.—Some petty depredations were practiced, principally by the light troops, who patroled the skirts of the town; but, on detection, they were punished, and the citizens were invited to carry complaints of any abuses directly to head-quarters. The letter of judge Scott to major Pinkney, the acting adjutant-general, will shew in what manner these attentions were appreciated.

No public or private buildings, except such as added to the defence of the place, were destroyed, to my knowledge.

It would appear, from the report of col. Monroe, that information had reached him, that the parliament house, a one-story brick building with wings, was burnt down. If this was a fact, it must have been done after the rear guard had been withdrawn from the town, by some solitary individual, (perhaps by a citizen, for some of them who left York with the army, were exceedingly exasperated against the magistracy) unbeknown to the commanding officers of the army or navy; as I was witness to the anxious and strenuous endeavors of those officers to prevent any cause of complaint whatever. It was the wish of the commander in chief, that the conduct of our troops at York might afford as great a contrast to the then recent behavior of the enemy at Ogdensburg as possible, and you will believe his wishes were realized, when you are informed, that lieut. Pelham, of the 21st, (which formed the guard of the town) who was captured the next November, on the St. Lawrence, was paroled on the special consideration of the humanity and polite attention experienced from his regiment at York.

There was no apprehension of the enemy's being in sufficient force to attack us at the time of embarkation.

I am, dear sir, with great respect, your very obedient servant,

SAMPL S. CONNER.

Major-general Henry Dearborn.

NOTE—Colonel S. S. Conner was aid-de-camp to major-general Dearborn at that time, but having volunteered his services, landed with the troops, and was in the advancing column at the time of the explosion. Colonel Conner negotiated the capitulation on the part of the United States.

MAJOR GRAFTON'S STATEMENT.

I certify, that after the capture of York, the capital of Upper Canada, *lieut. Pelham, with myself, were ordered into the city by major-general Dearborn to protect the inhabitants; and the then acting adjutant-general, major Pinkney, stated to me, that we should have as many soldiers as were requisite for that purpose. We made known our orders to the inhabitants; they appeared gratified with the arrangements which were made for their security, as some of them observed they had much to fear from their own disaffected. I kept patrols out during the night, and safeguards were furnished to all those who requested them. One gentleman, I think his name was Cameron, who applied for safeguards, gave as a reason, that two or three of these disaffected, "some of our own rascals," as he called them, had threatened to burn his house. This request as the others was promptly complied with.

The third day after our landing, I saw a column of smoke arising at the distance of 200 or 300 paces. I immediately rode towards it, and saw the flames bursting from the windows of a small one-story brick building. I enquired of the citizens who had collected, and were quietly looking on, how the fire had originated, and what building that was? They said it was called the parliament house, but could not say how it had occurred. At this time there was not in sight an American soldier.

*Now capt. Pelham—This gentleman was wounded and taken prisoner at Chrysler's Fields, and was paroled in consequence of his attention to the citizens of York.

JOSEPH GRAFTON.

I believe that the whole barbarisms about York belonged to the enemy in Boston.

We have a long time designed to notice the "continuation" alluded to, and shall do it some day. It is certainly the most perfectly villainous production I have ever seen, and ought to be recorded as a sample of the progress of society in falsehood and misrepresentation, in the age we live in.—REG.

The following is the opinion of the court of enquiry, ordered to be convened by the secretary of the navy, to examine into the causes of the capture of the United States' schooners Ohio and Somers, on Lake Erie, under the command of lieutenant Augustus H. M. Conkling:

The court, not being able to procure any witness that was on deck when the boats were first discovered, cannot enter so minutely into the circumstances attending the capture of the Somers as they could wish; it appears, however, from the testimony produced, that she was boarded very soon after the boats had been hailed, and carried without much resistance, having but part of her crew on deck.

The Ohio, commanded by lieut. Conkling in person, it appears, was well defended, and not surrendered till overpowered by very superior numbers.

THOMAS BROWN, Pres'dt.

SAM'L D. HEAP, judge advocate.

New-York, Oct 31. Arrived, U. S. sloop of war PEACOCK, captain Warrington, from a cruise, with a quantity of opium, and a few thousand dollars in rough gold, captured in the Union, a rich country ship. Previous to hearing of the peace, captured four Indianmen, two of which were sunk, one given up for the transportation of prisoners, and the other, a cruiser belonging to the East India company, was restored in consequence of furnishing the news of peace. The Peacock touched at Bourbon and St. Helena, for refreshments, and left the latter place the 20th ultimo.—The Peacock had been out from this port 9 months and 6 days—was at sea 5 months at one time, and has lost only one man, by the name of Johnson, who a few days since fell from the fore-top-gallant-yard.

Books—Jefferson's Library.

In looking over a "general catalogue of valuable and rare old books" issued last year by Longman, Hunt, Rees, Orme, and Brown, Pater Noster Row, London, we are struck with the high prices of most of the works therein mentioned.—The obliging and liberal manner in which Mr. Jefferson allowed us the free use of his library, so long as we resided in the neighborhood of Monticello, had enabled us to form some idea of the considerable value of that gentleman's collection of books, most of them rare and elegantly printed.—We were therefore convinced that congress had acquired that collection on terms unusually advantageous. Yet, our ideas on that subject, fell far short of the truth, as we now discover by a comparison of the London prices, with the sums paid by congress, for the following works.—We should wish to extend that comparison to a greater number of books. But independently of the subjoined statement being sufficient to remove all erroneous impressions, we have, at present neither time, nor room, for a further development of this interesting subject.—We cannot, however, forbear again congratulating the country upon so valuable an acquisition, on terms so obviously advantageous and liberal.

Pittsfield Cattle Show and Fair.

Pittsfield, (Ms.) October 12.

The fifth Cattle Show and Fair was celebrated in this village on the 2d and 3d inst. It was the most brilliant and interesting display ever exhibited in this county. The Society were blessed with two fine days for the exhibition, and although the rapid improvements in agriculture, domestic animals, and manufactures were manifest, yet it was a matter of universal regret that the first day should have been fixed on Monday, which probably prevented many animals coming from the more distant parts of the county. Nevertheless, the animals were numerous; the pens were enlarged, and their fine appearance was universally admired by numerous spectators.

At an early hour our females were seen coming from various quarters with the rich fruits of their industry and ingenuity; and it was grateful to every true lover of his country to see the rapid improvement, both of quantity and quality of our domestic manufactures. The display on the 2d day was peculiarly interesting, and the whole community were delighted with the proceedings. At 12 o'clock the members of the Society, with several honorary members from a distance, having the badge of the Society in their hats, formed a respectable process-sion, and were escorted from Morgan's coffee house to the old church, by captain Allen's company of infantry, and a band of music, where the articles of premiums, being silver bowls, cups, spoons, &c. to the value of $600, were handsomely arranged in front of the pulpit. About 100 singers were seated in the front galleries, and the band of music arranged themselves in the rear of the organ.

The rev. Mr Shepard, of Lenox, opened the ceremonies of the day by reading a vote of the Society, with a request to solemnize the opening scene with suitable expressions of gratitude and praise in celebrating our agricultural prosperity. He then read a psalm suited to the occasion, which was admirably sung by the numerous choir of singers; after which he addressed the throne of grace in a very impressive and peculiarly appropriate prayer. The president of the Society then pronounced an address to the members and the citizens assembled on the occasion, which was also appropriate, interesting, and useful; it discovered great research into agricultural and manufacturing pursuits, (the promotion of which is the chief object of the institution) and was received with much applause. After the conclusion of the address, an ode was read composed for the occasion, and sung by the choir in a very handsome manner. It may not be improper to say, that the performances of the singers were highly gratifying to a very numerous audience; and merited and received universal commendation.

The premiums were then announced by Elkanah Watson, esq. and all eyes were fixed with interest on the successful candidates, as they rose to receive their premiums. The effect produced on this interesting occasion, which was animating and visible, we think must carry conviction to the mind of every person present, at least, of the great utility and importance of this institution. We hope it will be cherished and supported by our fellow citizens. [Sun.]

ORDINANCE OF THE KING.

Louis, by the grace of God, king of France and Navarre, to all, &c.

Taking into consideration our decree of the 24th of July and 2d of August, in virtue of which marshal Ney is ordered before the court martial of the 1st military division, sitting at Paris (department of the Seine):—

Taking into consideration the order of the 21st of August, by which our minister, secretary of state for the war department, has nominated the members which are to compose this court martial:

Considering that by the terms of that appointment, and in virtue of the 5th article of the law of the 4th Fructidor, year 5, marshal Moncey, Duc de Cornegliano, is called to preside over the said court martial, as being the oldest of the marshals in France. Taking into consideration the letters of marshal Moncey, from which it appears that he has not the only excuse which, after the 6th article of the law of 13th Brumaire, would be valid to exempt him from presiding at the said court martial:

Considering that the refusal of marshal Moncey can be ascribed to nothing else but a spirit of resistance and insubordination, so much the more culpable, as an example diametrically opposite might have been expected from the high rank which he enjoys in the army, and the principles of obedience which his long military career should have taught him to respect; we have resolved to apply to him the penalty decreed by the 6th article of the 13th Brumaire, year 5, against every officer, who, without a valid excuse, refuses to sit in a council of war to which he is called; we, therefore, ordained, and do ordain, as follows:—

Art. 1. Marshal Moncey is cashiered, (déstitué)—he shall suffer three months imprisonment.

2. Our minister, secretary of state for the war department, is charged with the execution of the present ordinance.

Given at Paris, at the Thuilleries, August 29, 1815, 21st year of our reign.

GOUVION SAINT CYR.

PROCLAMATION BY THE KING.

Louis, by the grace of God, king of France and Navarre, to all who shall see these presents, health:

We have learned, with grief, that in the departments of the south several of our subjects have recently proceeded to the most criminal excesses; that under the pretext of making themselves ministers of public vengeance, Frenchmen have, to satisfy private revenge, shed the blood of Frenchmen, even before our authority was universally established and acknowledged throughout the whole extent of our kingdom.

Doubtless great crimes, infamous treasons, have been committed, and have plunged France into an abyss of misfortunes—atrocious persecutions have been exercised against such of our faithful subjects, who, following the banner of our well-beloved nephew, courageously attempted with him to save France; but the punishment of these crimes ought to be national, solemn and regular. The guilty ought to suffer by the sword of the law, and not fall under the weight of private vengeance. Justice would be offended, discord perpetuated, and a door opened to a thousand disorders; social order would be subverted, were men to constitute themselves at once judges and executioners, for injuries received, or even of personal attacks. Our intentions and our orders have sufficiently made known that the nation shall have justice done on the authors of these evils, and that indulgence granted to weakness or to error will not be extended to those criminals whose public and proved guilt can be prosecuted without causing alarm to the multitude who obeyed, doubtless with regret, the force of circumstances. We hope that this odious attempt to anticipate the operation of the laws and of our authority has already ceased. It must be regarded as an offence against us and against France, and whatever may be the regret we shall feel, nothing will be omitted by us to punish such crimes. Our worthy nephew, whose name stands henceforth united with the sentiments of love and devotion manifested by our southern provinces, who, by his character of obedience, conciliation and energy, has preserved, and still will preserve, these provinces from invasion, ought also to be our agent in saving them from civil discords, and in repressing and punishing those who would pretend to abuse our name and his. But, doubtless, the noble ties formed between him and the inhabitants of the south, will not be broken by the culpable conduct of some men, thirsting for vengeance and disorder. In this confidence, and with this hope, we have recommended, by prior orders, to our ministers and our magistrates, to cause the laws to be strictly respected, and to show neither indulgence nor weakness in the prosecution of those who have, or who yet may attempt to violate them, being well convinced that our voice will not be heard in vain in a country from which we have received so many proofs of fidelity and affection.

Given at Paris, on the 1st of September, 1815, and of our reign the 21st.

PASQUIER,

LONDON, Aug. 27.—Bourbons and bigotry returning together.—in the south of France a most horrid persecution has been raised against the Protestants. Thousands have been slaughtered by the Catholics, who cloak themselves under the authority of the duke D'Angouleme, who is well known to be one of the greatest bigots of the age.

Extract from the Bulletin of Nismes.

"On the 5th of July, several domains belonging to the Protestants were burned, and on the 6th a still greater number. The Steward (Gerissene) of the estate of Gurraudin was stretched over a fire. After his death they took him down and exhibited the body to passengers. The 7th, 8th, and 9th, were more calm days; they were only pillages. On the 5th, they massacred almost all the prisoners who were protestants. A pretended national guard, formed of all the malefactors, and of all the worthless wretches of the environs, and the town, are accused of these crimes. One of the captains is a person of the name of Toislajon, a sweeper of the streets, who alone has killed fourteen Protestants. They broke open the grave of a young Protestant girl to throw her into a common receptacle of filth. Those Protestants whom they do not kill they exile, and throw into prison, and yet there were a number of royalists among them.

"From the 10th to the 14th July no couriers from Paris arrived. On the 16th the king was proclaimed, by the Urban guard (composed of men between 40 and 60 years of age) followed, by all the most respectable persons in the town, and the white flag was hoisted.

"On the 17th armed bands of brigands, and the national guards of Beaucaire came to disarm the military, who sustained an assault in the barracks, and they were almost all massacred. Their number amounted to 200.

"On the 18th many peaceable citizens were massacred—many houses pillaged. On the afternoon of that cruel morning, the mad wretches ran about the town calling out that they wished a second saint Bartholomew.

"On the 19th the prefect published a proclamation, recalling the peaceable persons who had quitted the town: they obeyed this order, and a great number were assassinated.

"From the 20 to the 29th, the pillages and assassinations did not discontinue. Those who sought their safety in flight were assassinated on the roads. Some were conducted into prisons, where they are still growing.

"On the 29th the prefect of the king arrived. The other prefect had been named by —, the royal commissioner.

"On the 30th a te Deum was chanted. On the 31st the new prefect published a very prudent proclamation, but he quitted Nismes.

"On the 1st of August, M. de Calviere, the person whom the royal commissioner had named, resumed the functions of prefect, and 16 Protestants were massacred. They went about seizing them in their houses, and they cut their throats before their own doors. Many were massacred in the fields. The night between the 1st and 2d was the most cruel. M. de Calviere caused an order to be posted up, which seems to have some what calmed these pretended royalists. On the 4th several country seats were set on fire.

"The peaceable citizens, the members of the Urban guard, have been again forced to flee to save themselves from destruction. The prefect sent an order to them to return, under the penalty of having the laws respecting emigration put in force against them. Those who returned into the town experienced either death or captivity. It is uncertain whether M. de Moncalm or M. de Calviere is most guilty of allowing or causing the commission of all these horrors, but suspicion falls principally on the former, who is royal commissioner, and whom it is said the king had a considerable time ago ordered to cease his functions.

"Nothing promises any security to friends of order; for all the authorities, with the exception of two persons, are composed of the most timid and feeble men.

"The attorneys (notaries) and the avocats, have formed resolutions not to retain or to receive into their bodies any but Roman Catholics.

"Nismes has already lost its rank among the commercial towns. It is on the brink of annihilation.

"The prefect named by the king was a M. d'Arbot; but he has done no good. The foreign troops have been implored to force the brigands to repose, and to assist the true royalists, for the brigands abuse this name, which they will render universally odious.

"The number of deaths is prodigious; we have not an exact enumeration.

"Horrors of the same kind are continued in the neighboring towns."

On the re-establishment of the Jesuits in Spain.

The king our master, has received from his holiness, Pius 7th, a letter, of which the following is a translation:

"Our very dear son in Jesus Christ, health and apostolic benediction. The sentiments of generous piety, which have excited the royal heart of your majesty have been confirmed as is manifest, when desirous of doing a distinguished benefit to the religion of Jesus Christ, your majesty has resolved to re-establish the company of Jesus. We give your majesty the most affectionate thanks for the copy of your royal decree which you have sent us, and much more for the filial deference which your majesty discovers for our counsels. May the father of mercies send down his blessings on this religious disposition of your majesty, and cause your reign to prosper more every day for the good of your most faithful subjects, and principally of the church, of which your majesty manifests yourself the defender in your states, with so much glory to yourself and consolation to us. We supplicate, and will incessantly supplicate the Lord to pour his celestial grace on the person of your majesty, to establish your majesty more each day in the maxims which render you a king truly Catholic in your submission to the Holy See, and in your love for the Father of all the faithful; being able in the mean time to assure your majesty that we love you with the greatest tenderness, and that with the greatest effusion of our heart we give our paternal, apostolic benediction to your majesty and to all your royal family.

Given at Rome, in Sta Maria, Maggiore, the 22d of July, in the year 1815, 17th year of our Pontificate."

PIUS 7th

LONDON, Sept. 4.—Fouche, (Duke of Otranto)—The following letters appeared yesterday in the National Register, Sunday paper, and as they have all the appearance of being genuine, (the editor having them in Fouche's own hand writing,) cannot but be considered as furnishing a very important key to the politics of the French minister. His reasoning to Bonaparte on the subject of his title and Elbese Sovereignty is just and luminous. As for his notion of transporting the Corsican to America, it was likely enough to proceed from a man who never disguised his hostility, by the bye, in which Talleyrand is not his inferior, involves a curious consideration at the present time, and ought never to be forgotten by our Ambassadors in treating with these diplomatists. Did it add to their recommendations for office under Louis XVIII? Copy of a letter written by the Duke of Otranto, to his Royal Highness Monsieur, April 23, 1814.

"Monseigneur—I have attempted to render a fresh service to the Emperor Napoleon, whose minister I have been during ten years. I think it proper to communicate to your Royal Highness the letter which I have written to him. His interests cannot be an indifferent object to me, since they have moved the generous compassion of the powers who have conquered him. But the greatest of all interests for France and for Europe, that to which every thing should be sacrificed, is the repose of Nations and of Monarchs, after so many agitations and calamities: and that repose, even if it should be established on solid bases, would never be sufficiently secured, would never be truly enjoyed, as long as the Emperor Napoleon should stay in the Island of Elba. Napoleon on that rock, would be to Italy, to France and to all Europe, what Vesuvius is by the side of Naples. I only see the New World and the United States in which he can produce no convulsion."

Copy of a letter written by the Duke of Otranto to the Emperor Napoleon, April 23, 1814, inclosed within the foregoing.

"SIRE—When France and a part of Europe were at your feet, I dared to make you constantly hear the truth.—Now that you are unfortunate, I experience more dread of wounding your feelings by speaking the language of sincerity: but I owe it to you, since to you it will prove useful, and even necessary.

"You have accepted, as a retreat, the Island of Elba and its sovereignty. I lend a very attentive ear to all that is said respecting that sovereignty and that Island. I think it my duty to assure you, that the situation of that Island in Europe does not become your own, and that the title of sovereign of a few acres of land, still less becomes him who has possessed an immense Empire.

"I beseech you to weigh these two considerations, and you will feel how well they are founded.

"The Island of Elba lies at a short distance from Africa, Greece, and Spain: it almost touches the coasts of Italy and France. From that Island the sea, the winds, and a small felucca, may rapidly convey to every country most exposed to movements, events, and revolutions. As yet, stability exists no where. In this mutability of nations, a genius like yours will always create inquietude and suspicions amongst the European powers. Without being criminal you will be accused; but without being criminal too, you will do harm; for alarm is a great evil, both to governments and to nations.

"The king who is about to reign in France, will wish to reign only by justice; but you know how many passions surround a throne, and with what skill hatred imparts to calumny the colors of truth.

"The titles which you preserve, whilst recalling at every moment what you have lost, can only serve to increase the bitterness of your regrets. They will not appear a wreck, but a vain representation of so many vanquished grandeurs.—I say more:

without honoring you, they will expose you to greater dangers. It will be said that you only keep those titles because you maintain all your pretensions.—It will be said that the rock of Elba is the resting point on which you intend to place the lever with which you will seek once more to raise the world.

"Allow me to tell you my whole thoughts: it is the result of my reflections. It would be more glorious and more consolatory to you to live as a simple citizen; and at present, the safest and the most becoming asylum for a man like you is—the United States of America.

"There you will recommence your existence in the midst of people still, near, who will know how to admire, without fearing, your genius.—You will be under the protection of those laws equally impartial and inviolable for all that breathe—in the country of Franklin, Washington and Jefferson.—You will prove to the Americans that if you had been born amongst them you would have felt, and voted like them; and preferred their virtues and their liberties to all the domination of the earth.

"I have the honor to be, &c.

"The duke of OTRANTO,"

In the name and on the behalf of his majesty.

GEORGE P. R.

Our will and pleasure is, that all French vessels and cargoes that may have been captured or detained by reason of the late declaration of hostilities against France, on any voyage to or from Martinique or Marseilles, and also all vessels and cargoes captured on a voyage from any French port at which the white flag was hoisted at the time when the vessel sailed from her port of lading, shall be released forthwith, on payment of such expenses as have been duly incurred in consequence of such capture or detention.

Given at the palace at Carleton-house, this 26th day of August, 1813, in the fifty-fifth year of our reign.

By command of his royal highness the Prince Regent, in the name and on behalf of his majesty.

NAPOLEON BONAPARTE.

The British papers are filled with remarks and speculations on the fate of Bonaparte. Some were for hanging him at once—in perfect evidence of "British magnanimity," which, indeed, seems a favorite idea with many, who reprehend the ministers in the vilest terms for not shutting him up in Newgate, or confining him in some Scotch dungeon. One of them says that St. Helena is accessible in many places, and that an escape, without actual confinement, may be easily effected. Another, exciting his countrymen to a deadly hatred of the prisoner, observes—"Have we no compassion for an exiled king, for the memory of a murdered prince, for a legitimate royal family, seeking refuge in a foreign country? All history proclaims the dignity of suffering virtue. Is it left for the present age to venerate unsuccessful villainy? Are great talents alone, independently of their use, a sufficient title to the esteem and admiration of mankind?"

Here is impudence, indeed! Where are the "legitimate" royal families of India—scores of princes of "as ancient and venerable" standing as the Capets, or Gueiphs? In exile or murdered by successful "villainy."

One fellow rails at him for "seizing the English families living peaceably in Paris," &c. But the creature thinks it right that his countrymen should have made prisoners of not less than 3000 Americans that they had forcibly got into their possession before the war with the United States; and no doubt supposes that, within the walls of Dartmoor, much more pleasure was to be enjoyed than in a department of France! I am no apologist of Bonaparte—his crimes are many and deep;—but his villainies are virtues compared with the giant rascalities of his powerful opponents and enemies.

The following paragraph recently appeared in the Boston Centinel, about the same time that that paper recorded the fact that the British had not typically, but actually, stolen the crown and throne of the “legitimate” of Candy:—“The wits remark, that John Bull does not shew his sapience in placing NAPOLEON in the Tower, where the British crown and jewels are deposited. His penchant for such articles is well known, and they think it nine chances in ten he will one day filch the whole of them and make off. Beside, they add, he will have it in his power, by ascending to the turret of his castle, and displaying a handkerchief, to boast that he had fulfilled his promise, to hoist the tri-colored flag on the tower of London.”

London, August 19.—A ministerial paper says:—“The following arrangements respecting Bonaparte are handed about in the upper circles, in MS. but upon what authority we know not:—He is to have one servant and his own cook. His letters are to be opened by the governor. He is not to be landed till a house is fully prepared for his reception. He is to be permitted to exercise himself in any field-sport of which the island will admit, but is constantly to be attended by an officer and two orderly men, who are to shoot if he attempts to escape, and is beyond the reach of their hands. He is only to be allowed such a sum of money as he may be in want of for common occasions—and, finally, the French government is to be wholly at the expence of supporting him.”

Foreign office, August 26.—Lord Bathurst, one of his majesty's principal secretaries of state, has this day notified, by command of his royal highness the prince regent, to the ministers of friendly powers resident at this court, that in consequence of events which have happened in Europe, it has been deemed expedient and determined, in conjunction with the allied sovereigns, that the Island of St. Helena shall be the place allotted for the future residence of general Napoleon Bonaparte, under such regulations as may be necessary for the perfect security of his person; and for that purpose it has been resolved, that all foreign ships and vessels whatever, shall be excluded from all communication with, or approach to that Island, so long as the said Island shall continue to be the place of residence of the said Napoleon Bonaparte.

September 2.—A letter from Havre, dated Tuesday, states the arrival of a British frigate, with Savary and L'Allemand on board. She had the white and British flags flying, and was received with a salute from the fortress; but they were not permitted to land until instructions had been received from Paris.

The marquis de Monscheme is named as the French commissioner appointed by the king at the island of St. Helena.

ETRA. Florence, Aug. 2. Despatches from Porto Longone, of the 31st, inform, that in consequence of the advance of the troops of the grand duke, the French garrison in Porto Ferrajo, in the island of Elba, had capitulated, and the Tuscan troops had marched in, and taken possession of all the posts of the island, with their artillery, munitions and other effects.

Corsica.—According to letters from Sardinia of the 30th July, the factions are far from being extinguished in the island of Corsica, as was lately stated; things seems on the contrary to assume a serious character, and it appears that a design is entertained of taking advantage of present circumstances to withdraw this island from the dominion of France. They talk of convoking a general assembly. Mr. Arright intends to organize six Corsican battalions; he is fortifying Calvi, where he designs, it is said, to fix his head-quarters.

The state of Public feelings in France, according to late and authentic advices, is far from being pacific and tranquil. The Boston Daily Advertiser in support of this fact, says—“We have been allowed by a friend the perusal of a letter written by an American gentleman now in France, which gives a gloomy picture of the state of that country. He confirms the fact so often stated, of the general dissatisfaction of the inhabitants, at being treated as a conquered people, It seems there is a general dejection of spirit and much murmuring, but no resistance except in the garrison towns. He speaks of the angry note presented to the allied powers, which he states was dated July 22, and adds that their treatment of it was evasive. The allies had declared that they would not interfere with the interior regulations of France, but their armies proceeded in taking military possession of different places, in the name of their respective sovereigns.”

The following melancholy picture of the state of things in France is copied from one of our latest London papers:—

“Day after day the private accounts from France become more gloomy; the state of politics in the capital becomes more involved and intricate; the complaints and confusion of the departments become more distressing, Of plots and conspiracies in every quarter, there is abundant rumor. We hear of new Sicilian Vespers directed against all the allies; and of a new St. Bartholemew's day which threatens the protestants of the South.—The king's ministers, or their most intimate friends, are stirring up a jacobin insurrection; they are opposing the disbanding the army of the Loire, and secretly encouraging the rebel commanders of the fortresses to prolong their resistance. The allied sovereigns do not appear to act in concert with the king of France; or with any party in that country, and scarcely with each other. The conclusion of the treaty of peace seems to be more distant than ever. The opening of the chamber of representatives is looked to as the signal of some new and tremendous expolition: and France has all the symptoms of an approaching and most sanguinary warfare.”

[N. Y. Com. Adv.]

Marshal Ney.—A London paper says: Marshal Ney has undergone a second examination; and a court-martial consisting of the following generals is appointed to try him:

The duke of Cornegliano (Moncey), president.
The prince of Essling (Massena.)
The duke of Castiglioni (Angereau.)
Marshal Jourdan.

Lieutenant-general Maison, governor of Paris.
Lieutenant-general Villate.

Lieutenant-general Claparede.

Great exertions are making to screen him from the punishment that awaits him.

Two days ago (says a Paris paper of August 27) Madame Ney waited on the duc de Rohan. It is said that some days before that lady had applied to a great monarch to intercede for her husband, but that the answer she received was not favorable.

Marshal Moncey has been cashiered and imprisoned because he refused to act as president of the council before whom marshal Ney was to be brought to trial.

The trial of marshal Ney had not commenced on the 6th September. He has published a defence in the Paris papers, and an opinion had gone forth that he would be acquitted.

Fouche. The London papers say that Fouche had tendered his resignation to the king, and express great surprise that it was not accepted. They are indignant at his second report on the state of France which has not yet come to hand. It seems likely that a new storm is brewing. The laboring classes in France are becoming desperate through suffering.

The London editors have lately commenced a severe campaign of abuse against Fouche—calling him any thing else than an honest man. "The wind has changed."

FRENCH COURTESY. From a London paper of May 16. Last Saturday the magnificent plate and crystal which the duke of Wellington had at Paris, arrived in this city. The maitre d'hotel of the duke was bearer of a letter from the duke of Vicenza, in which he expressed the greatest consideration for that general. It appears that the household furniture and pictures which were found in his hotel at Paris, had been packed up with the greatest care, and sent under a military escort to the nearest port of Paris, where a vessel well fitted out waited their arrival, in order to bring this rich property to England.

Now, suppose these had been the effects of a French general, and had fallen into the hands of a Ross, Pakenham or Cochrane?—Did the "high allies" return to Bonaparte his private goods they took? Nay, nay, they robbed him of what little he was able to save. But this is—"MAGNANIMITY!"

INDIA. It appears from the exertions making to send troops from the Cape, Isle of France, Ceylon, and 30 regiments 1000 strong from England, that there is warm work expected in India. Whether some new scheme of conquest is on foot, or the natives manifest a disposition, and have acquired more knowledge of the means to expel their bloody oppressors, we shall see by and bye. We wish success to the India patriots. The tyrannies of the British in the East, are beyond every thing that modern times gives us an account of. Murder and robbery, or one or the other, is the fate of about sixty millions of innocent people, "PERISH THE INVADERS."

Fleur de Lys. This emblem, (says the [Charles-ton] Southern Patriot) though bearing a very soft name, has a very military origin. It was first wrought upon the standard of Philip 2d of France, commonly called Philip Augustus—and VOLTAIRE informs us it represents the head of a spear—a very significant sign for the present king of France and Navarre, who has been seated on the throne a second time by the force of arms.

Paris, Aug. 23. When Labadoyere was shot, he obtained leave to be without the bandage on his eyes, and to give the word to fire. He said "I cannot fear to die who have seen death in so many shapes; and I who have so often given the word to French soldiers to fire, may be permitted to do so this once and for the last time."

He advanced with a firm step to the veterans who were appointed to shoot him, and when within four or five paces, gave the words, "Ready! Present!"

"Fire!"—They obeyed most steadily, and the traitor fell dead in an instant.

He was 29 years of age, of elegant manners and handsome person, and married two years ago, and has a son. He never confessed himself guilty of any wrong, but, on the contrary, said he and his enemies put different constructions on the term loyalty, for that he had acted loyally and for the good of France, by attaching himself to Napoleon, being confident that he, and not the Bourbons, could save it.

[The day will come that the people of France will erect monuments to Labadoyere as a murdered patriot.]

Berlin, August 12.—We are informed that Turkey is arming with the greatest activity, and that formidable armies are already put in motion. People ascribe to this circumstance the retrograde movements of the Russian forces.

Toulouse, Aug. 25. The day before yesterday it was currently reported that the Spanish troops near Bellegarde, menaced our frontier. Though this report was contrary to the tenor of the proclamation of the mayor of Bayonne, general Ricard took measures of safety, and departed for the frontier on the road to Perpignan. His head-quarters we are assured were at Carcassona. The battalion of Maria Theresa, a regiment of lancers, a train of artillery, &c. have departed for the same destination. All the troops in the neighboring departments are placed on the war establishment. These wise measures of precaution, and above all, the explanations of the count Abisval, the commander of the Spanish army, ought to dissipate all inquietudes.

Bologna, (Italy) Aug. 9. Prince Giustiana has set at liberty a great number of the persons who were detained for having been found in possession of fire arms.

Madeira, Sept. 9. The vintage is almost concluded, and in the whole island we do not think there will be more than five thousand pipes. We reckon a fair crop to produce thirty thousand pipes. This will enable you to judge what price Madeira wine is likely to get to.

Aix-la-Chapelle, Aug. 9. Another convoy of covered waggons arrived from Paris. They are said not to contain any pictures or statues, but things taken from the French depot of military plans and models of all the French fortresses, in wood. [How degrading!]

The city of Arras has not yet opened its gates to the allies. This appears to be the case with several other fortified places. The people resist the demand for their arms, and several severe petit contests have ensued. France, from all we see, may be compared to a cask of gun-powder, having all the properties of dreadful explosion and destruction. But whether things are really as bad as the British represent them, to afford a pretext for "crippling" that country, we shall know more hereafter.

The king of Denmark, after reigning several years, has recently been crowned at Copenhagen. The old Danish title of king of Norway is omitted in the new arrangement.

The Danes are complaining grievously of the depredations of the Algerines, who have captured some of their vessels. They also allude very mournfully to the loss of the fleet that the British took from them, just for the sake of "religion and liberty," which prevents an immediate chastisement of the barbarians.

One of the London Journals gives the following laconic correspondence between Carnot and Fouche:

"Traître!—ou veux tu que je me retire?"

(Signed)

CARNOT.

"Ou tu voudras,—imbécile."†

(Signed)

OTRANTE.

The answer was written on the same paper.

[*Traitor! whither wouldst thou have me retire?

†Whither thou pleasest—fool.]

Carnot does not appear to have been troubled by the new government. It seems as if the "high allies," like Bonaparte in the zenith of his power, feared to touch the brave old man.

Recruiting goes on rapidly in the Austrian dominions—80,000 are to be raised in Hungary alone.

Serbia is again in insurrection against the Ottoman Porte—a useless waste of lives; they must be subdued. The power of the Turks is legitimate and the rebels will be punished.

The "king's regiment," as it is called, that returned to England in May last, after five years absence in Portugal, Spain and America, lost during that time 2,500 soldiers and 80 officers. This is like the cobbler's old awl, that had had 15 new blades and 2 new handles.

Stocks, London, Sept. 9.—3 per cents 56½.

It is said that Murat has obtained leave to join his wife in Austria.

The hon. A. Curson, aid to the earl of Moira, had arrived in England with despatches from India, containing official details of the war against the Nepaulese. It is said the governor-general has found it necessary to call for all the disposable force belonging to the Indian dependencies; and the troops from the Cape, Ceylon, and the Isle of France, had been directed to reinforce the army in Bengal.

The British government had ordered 30 regiments to be sent immediately to India, which are to be made 1000 strong each, by volunteering, which is to be permitted from those regiments which are not ordered.

A London paper observes that the whole of the family of Bonaparte appear to be disposed of: Louis is in Rome; Lucien in Turin; Joseph appears to be Switzerland, [not so; he is here]—Jerome with the king of Wurtemberg and his wife; and Murat with his spouse in the Austrian states.

The Chesapeake frigate had been ordered to Plymouth to be paid off.

On the 21st of August about 60 gentlemen dined at the Vine Tavern, Liverpool, to celebrate the return of Mr. Brougham to parliament. Among the toasts, the following was given—

"The United States of America—may our friendship be as lasting as our interests are inseparable."

On proposing the health of the mayor—Mr. Shepherd, a member of parliament, made an enlivening speech, which was received with unbounded applause, in the course of which Mr. S. observed,—
"Had his voice been listened to, we should have been saved the disasters of an American war; we should have been saved the discomfort which our troops experienced in the North and South of the United States, on Lake Champlain and at New Orleans; nor would it have been a point of discussion whether the Americans could, without decided odds, encounter us at sea."

At the late assizes of Lincolnshire, Eng. William Chapman, a sweep, aged 17 years, was charged with robbing Elizabeth Johnson, aged 11 years, of the sum of two pence. The prisoner acknowledged that he had took from her three half-pence, which he offered to return to her. He received sentence of death, and was ordered to be hanged.—In another county, two men were convicted of stealing and receiving goods to a considerable amount.—They were sentenced to be transported seven years.—In these judgments, there seems, to us, to be a wonderful disproportion of punishments.

Private letters from America mention, (says a London paper) that each of the maritime states has engaged to build a ship of the line in the year, without, it is added, taxing the people.

General Clarke, duke of Feltre, former minister of war to Bonaparte, and since employed by the king, has withdrawn from public business, and retired to his estates.

Louis XVIII caused a proclamation to be published, that the inadequacy of the contribution to be raised in Paris by the ordinance of the 20th July, for the extraordinary expences of the present emergency, and authorising that city to impose on itself, in addition to the land-tax of the years 1806 and 1807, a further sum of 2,034,000 francs; and, in addition to the tax on personal property, during the same period, a further sum of 970,000 francs, for the same purpose.

It is now said that 130,000 men, of the different nations of the allies, except Russia, are to remain in France, under Wellington, to support the authority of the beloved Louis! They are to be maintained by the French. The allies at present draw 900,000 rations daily from the Parisians, which cost 75,000£ (330,000 dollars) a day.

Steam frigate.—A London paper of September 1, has the following paragraph:—An American gentleman who is lately arrived from New-York, states, that there is just completed in that harbor, a steam frigate, the length of which is 100 yards, and breadth 200 feet, her sides which are alternately composed of oak plank and cork wood, are 23 feet thick. She carries 44 guns, four of which are of very large bore, the other 42 pounders, and in case of being boarded, she is enabled by machinery to discharge 100 gallons of boiling water on her enemies per minute, and at the same time 300 cutlasses branch over her gunwales, and an equal number of pikes dart out from her sides!

"The first division of our Canadian army" says a London paper "amounting to 7000 men, has arrived at Paris." Some of these can give a good account of Chippewa, Niagara, Erie and Plattsburg.

The allies appear zealously employed in gathering up muskets and other arms in France.

In the middle of September the oath of allegiance to Prussia will be taken at Ehrenbreitstein, for the Nassau and the countries on the Moselle.

A Basle paper, of the 7th July, says—"The passage over the Rhine began June 25, and still continues. ☞ For six days the sky has been red every night with the flames of burning villages !!! Where a single shot is fired from them upon the allies, all is levelled with the ground !!!"

The allies, shortly after their entrance into France, thus describe their own movements—"We entered Alsace yesterday, (June 26) and the very first step we have been obliged to make examples; it is the only means of keeping down the inhabitants, who are, in general, animated with a very bad spirit."

☞ Let the people recollect how the French in Spain were spoken of for doing less than these in that country. The Spaniards who shot the Frenchmen invading their country, were "patriots"—but the French who shoot or resist the hordes of Russians, &c. &c. invading France, are rebels! Here is "legitimate" consistency and honor!

The commandant of Hunigun had hoisted the red flag by the side of the tri-colored—the same thing was done at Refort.

The subsidies paid by Great Britain to the respective European powers, &c. within the last 21 years, viz. from the year 1793 to the end of 1814, amount to the sum of 146,289,416 9s. 2 1-3d.

All the furniture of the chateau Marfontaine, which belonged to Joseph Bonaparte, has been sold by an order of the allied authorities.

Austria has ordered a new levy of 80,000 and Prussia of 30,000 men. What is to be done? Large bodies of troops are moving towards France. None have yet left it.

Orders have been received at Plymouth to fit out 15 brigs of war as packets. Five of these are to run between St. Helena and the Cape, and the remainder to the eastward of the Cape. These orders had been executed for some time. The brigs will be commanded by king's officers, and will be in all respects under the control of the admiralty.

British army, July 1815—The estimates of the army services, for 1815, have just been published, in obedience to an order of the house of commons.—The total amount of land forces, including the regiments in the East India company's territory, is 276,221. The total charge, £14,898,457 3s. 6d.—of which £7,917,387 5s. remains to be provided for.

State of the country before the French war. In detailing the budget in 1787, Mr. Pitt was glad there was no occasion to burden the country with new taxes. He stated that the current expences of the year, independent of the interest of the national debt, would amount to 6,775,000*l.* and that the income was 6,790,000*l.* It was evident therefore, the income bring superior by 15,000*l.* to the expences there was not the least necessity to levy any new taxes. The national debt is now 1000 millions; its interest alone exceeds 45 millions, other expences this year are above 90 millions!!! If the wealth of England be rated by the amount raised upon the people in taxes, she must be a most flourishing country.—Dublin paper.

The Irish Catholic Bishops met in Dublin on the 23d and 24th inst. and agreed to a series of resolutions against the Veto. In these resolutions, which it is said were unanimously adopted, they declare it to be their "decided and conscientious conviction, that any power granted to the crown of Great Britain of interfering, directly or indirectly, in the appointment of bishops for the Roman Catholic church in Ireland, must essentially injure and may eventually subvert the Roman Catholic religion in this country."

It is estimated that no less than 300,000 Prussians are in France!

The black troops, Sepoys and Lascars of all arms, now in the pay of the East India Company, are stated to amount to 150,000 men. Miserable wretches, that are made the means of their own debasement.

Several towns of France appear yet to hold out. The allies were bombarding some of them.

The French representative chambers were to meet on the 25th September, Bourbon blessings.—A French ship with 515 slaves and a quantity of gold dust and elephants' teeth on board, bound to Guadaloupe, has been sent into Antigua by the Barbadoes brig.

A London paper advertises a third edition (price 6s.) "Of an exposition of the causes and character of the late war between Great Britain and the United States—published by authority of the American government. Of which upwards of one million of copies have been published in America.

Bordeaux, 12th Sept. Extract of a letter: "Here are the articles of a treaty said to be concluded between Louis XVIII. and the allies, as they are called; which, letters from Paris say, are not to be published until the opening of the legislature.

"1. The integrity of France confirmed according to the treaty of Paris.

"2. The fortified places, except Strasburg, Metz, Lille and Besancon, to be garrisoned by the allies.

"3. A contribution of six hundred millions, of which two hundred millions to the English, and the remainder to the other allies."

"4. 50,000 Prussians, 15,000 English, 50,000 Austrians, 15,000 Russians, together 130,000 men, to remain in France until the contributions are paid—the remainder to march off on the 1st of October.

"It is said the sovereigns of the allies are to leave France on the 15th of this month.

"The people of France begin to think the allies intend to spend the winter here. It is natural enough to suppose that the Russians would prefer remaining in France to returning home in the approaching season. Unhappy, wretched France, these are the effects of British gold, and the disunion which it has too successfully produced."

CHRONICLE.

The British in Canada, &c.—Captains O'Connor and Owen, with several secretaries, lieutenants, midshipmen, &c. &c. have recently proceeded up lake Ontario in the Wolfe frigate, to make an accurate survey of all the lakes. General Murray, with 10,000 men, is to be sent from England, in addition to the present force in Canada. This, it seems, will make the whole force about twenty-three thousand regular troops. Seven thousand Scotch families are expected to settle the crown lands in Upper Canada. These emigrations appear to be in some measure forced, to strengthen the British arm in America, and to afford room at home for "raising more sheep!" It would also appear that their fleet on Lake Ontario is to be kept up, and that several vessels are to be built on the upper lakes. Many cannon have recently arrived at the Isle au Noix (Champlain) and its fortifications are to be greatly extended; for which purpose they have already chartered several American vessels on the lake, to bring stone, &c. in the spring—and it seems as if they were also about to build some vessels there. But—major-general Brown has fixed upon Rouse's Point for the erection of a military post and fortification—which, it is said, will effectually prevent any vessel from entering the lake, without leave; and, we hope it will be immediately placed in a proper state for the purpose. Thanks to Macdonough, we have cannon enough near the spot. The British call their proceedings precautionary measures. They may be so—but they are upon a scale that is calculated to keep us upon the look out.

¶ We have also reason to believe that British officers are now in the most of our sea ports, making maps of them and the places adjacent. "THE DANGER IS NOT OVER." Our congress has economized too much. Let them look to it in time. "An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure," says the homely proverb. Let the army be got back to what it ought to have been, instead of its present force; and let the navy be cherished and increased.

"The Spanish Patriots." Our intelligence, in general, from Mexico and South America is cheering. A powerful force of the "usurper" has been in the neighborhood of Carthage for a considerable time, but appears to have made no impression either on the place or on the fears of the people, every one of whom was a soldier, full of enthusiasm, and panting to punish the slaves sent to deprive them of their freedom. Their rallying words are, "united we stand, divided we fall." Patriotic donations for works of defence are very liberal; some giving as high as 20,000 dollars each. Papa is to have a patriotic garrison of 8,000 men. It is understood that gen. Palocos has defeated the invaders at Mompoz. At Carthage there are some brave spirits from the United States, aiding and assisting in the cause of liberty.

The patriots have obtained very important advantages over the royal and tory forces about the river Orensco, which opens a valuable channel of communication with the provinces of the interior, and they now command it. The capital of Guyana, (Augustura) is in their possession, as, indeed, nearly the whole country appears to be. May they keep it!

Of the proceedings in Mexico we are not very lately informed. The "supreme congress" was to have been in session in August last. May it have wisdom and strength to wrest another empire from the shackles of a tyrant; and raise up a new government wherein the rights of man shall be respected!

It is understood that the Buenos Ayrean patriots are in possession of a vast district of rich country. The republican army is very powerful, and they have a considerable fleet, under an admiral or commodore named Brown, from the United States. It is lately said that they have entirely captured or destroyed the tory fleet that rendezvoused at Montevideo. They have a well established and a liberal government.

From Peru and Chili we have not any very late intelligence. But we believe the good cause prospers in these countries.

It is astonishing how indifferent the great body of the people of the United States appear as to the events in these extensive regions. This may partly arise from our ignorance of their real situation and of what is going on. It is strange that the feelings of the nation should have been so excited for the "deliverance" of old Spain from Bonaparte, when so little interest is excited for the real deliverance of the new world from the dominion of a knave, fool and bigot. The freedom of Mexico alone, is, indeed, fifty times more important to the United States than the rescue of Spain from the hands of Napoleon was, in a commercial point of view, independent of those desires which, as republicans, we ought to have for its emancipation; and I seriously wish that circumstances were such that we could give them a helping hand. Perish the "legitimates," live the people, say I—Up republics; down royalty.

The following article will shew the importance of the countries spoken of, as places of commerce:

FROM THE LONDON MORNING CHRONICLE.

The contents of the late North American papers amply prove, that there the same indifference does not remain with regard to the fate of Spanish America, as in England. Hints are frequently thrown out respecting the magnitude and gains of trade we have been carrying on for some years, which shew that the Americans will also now do every thing to partake of it. The extract, however, from a Philadelphia paper respecting the amount of our past trade there, and copied into most of our own papers within these few days, is founded in error, and consequently, it must not be improper to subjoin the following statement, formed on the best mercantile information, and on some official data. Channel trade from Great Britain and the West India Islands to Spanish America.

From the ports of Great Britain direct to
Buenos Ayres	$9,000,000
To the coast of Chili and Peru direct, and through South Sea whalers	5,500,000
To Venezuela and Cumana, from Great Britain and West India Islands	4,500,000
The provinces of Santa Fe, principally from Jamaica, Curacao and St. Thomas	5,000,000
To Porto Bello, and over the Isthmus of Panama for the consumption to Higher and Lower Peru, Guayaquil, &c.	8,500,000
To Nicaragua, Tampico, and contraband to New Spain	5,000,000
To Islands of Cuba, Hispaniola, Puerto Rico, Margarita, &c.	5,000,000
	Dolls. 42,000,000

This is, accurately as can be ascertained, the amount of our past trade, and double what the American prints suppose. Mexico here comes in for a small proportion, owing to the wars; though by far the most populous country. Humboldt states, Spanish America, when subject to Spain, to have consumed annually ninety-five and a half millions of dollars of European imports; in that scale Buenos Ayres is only rated at three millions, and she now consumes nine from England alone, of which amount the port of London has sent yearly 500,000*l.* sterling. Sixty four British vessels have been seen riding triumphantly in the river Plate at one time, and the amount of property belonging to our merchants at present in that section alone, is not less than 1,800,000*l.* sterling, independent of that of British subjects resident there, which reaches 250,000*l.* sterling more.

Humboldt states the yearly consumption of New Spain or Mexico to be 25 millions of dollars, yet not more than one-sixth of the people use European goods. What would not this be if it were open, when the increase of Buenos Ayres has been so great? The best criterion of our trade to Spanish America is, however, the following fact:—In 1805, 20 millions sterling were exported to North America alone, and three only to the other parts of the Western world. In a subsequent year, when our intercourse with the United States was interrupted, we shipped there only five millions sterling, and 18 millions to Spanish America and West Indies; so that of the 20 millions sent to the United States in 1805, thirteen at least must have gone to Spanish America. In 1809, 7 millions sterling were exported to North America, and 19 to Spanish settlements and West Indies; and in 1810, our total exports westward reached 28 millions.—In the present unsettled state of that country, our trade has been immense, as may be seen by Walton's Expose on the dissensions of Spanish America; yet the whole is lost to us the moment Spanish power is again affianced there, if that were possible; or as soon as North American enterprise gets into full play. Is not this a question on which British ministers and merchants ought to ponder while it is yet time? After we have finished our work in Europe, is it not time to look across the Atlantic?

Magnificent building.—The people of the city of New-York are congratulating themselves that their City Hall, just finished, will cost only $538,000.

Canal.—The long-labored Washington City canal is at length rendered practicable for boats to con-very loads from the Eastern Branch to the Potomac, and vice versa, and the citizens now begin to experience the advantages of it.

Telegraphs.—The corporation of New-York has determined to erect a line of telegraphs from that city to the highlands below Sandy Hook.

Telegraph time.—A telegraphic message may be sent from London to Portsmouth, and an answer to it received in town in three quarters of a minute. A telegraphic message may be sent from London to Plymouth, and an answer to it received in town in one minute and three quarters.

METHODISTS.—London, September 1.—At the annual conference of the Wesleyan Methodists, held at Manchester, it appeared that the number of persons in the connexion amounted to nearly one hundred and ninety thousand!

Admiral Coffin, sir James Robinson, the earl of Selkirk and several British officers are now in New-York; which is also visited at this time by many other strangers of distinction.

It is hoped, out of courtesy to these distinguished persons, they may be invited to visit all the forts, examine the steam-frigate, &c. &c. that they may be able to give an accurate account of them to their government; whose standing direction it is, in war or peace, that their officers should take plans of places and gain intelligence of their works and means of defence.

THE WEST.—New-York, October 27.—The sale of 64,000 acres of Genessee lands, which yesterday took place at the coffee-house, was attended by many of the most opulent land-holders in that part of the state, as well as by many capitalists in this city. We understand, that some of these lands sold as high as 35½ dollars an acre, and none lower than two dollars.

Population of Indiana.—The Western Eagle makes the aggregate of the several counties of the territory of Indiana amount to 68,084 souls! No doubt, the people will soon claim the right of being admitted as a state. Their number of free persons are already nearly or quite equal to that of some of the old states, and in a very few years more, it will probably equal those of Rhode-Island and Delaware united. The emigrations to this territory are exceedingly great.

Connecticut.—The present state of parties may be seen in the following vote for assistants—highest fed. 9008—highest rep. 4263.

Gov. Galusha, of Vermont, was escorted into Montpelier, by a procession of the people more than a mile long, wearing in their hats sprigs of ever-green, the ancient badge of the mountaineers.

G. W. Campbell, esq. late secretary of the treasury, and colonel John Williams were, on the 10th inst. elected by the legislature of Tennessee to represent that state in the senate of the United States.

Mahlen Dickerson, Esq. (rep.) has been unanimously elected governor of the state of New Jersey.

A steam boat has been very successfully employed in towing large vessels up the Mississippi to New-Orleans, at the rate of two miles an hour, against the current and wind. How great an object is accomplished in this! Ships from the sea may be towed to Orleans in two or three days, instead of being weeks employed in getting up, as is sometimes the case.

A new steam-boat has been launched at Montreal, of 500 tons burthen. This is the third vessel to ply between that city and Quebec.

PERPETUAL MOTION. It is gravely insinuated in the Philadelphia papers, that Redheffer, who was treated as an imposter some time ago, has steadily, and in retirement, pursued his object, and actually discovered the perpetual motion; as it is said will clearly be shewn a little while hence.

STEAM NAVIGATION. Ferdinand Fairfax, Esq. has published at the city of Washington, a notification that the oldest patent right for steam boat navigation is vested in him, under Fitch's invention and experiments.

TYTHES. Extract from the epistle of the Quakers at London, in June last:

"Accounts of the sufferings of our members, chiefly for tythes and other ecclesiastical demands, and for claims of a military nature, to the amount of 15,727*l.* have been reported;" this is equal to 70,287 dollars. These exactions have greatly increased within these few years.

Newspapers.—The stamp on newspapers in England costs 4*d.* a sheet. The price, per annum, paid by a subscriber for a newspaper daily, is $40 75—of which the government receives $23 18. We should have few subscribers at this rate in the United States.

The Capital arising from its ashes.—The new building on Capitol-hill, preparing for the accommodation of congress, is in such a state of forwardness, that it is expected to be finished early in November.—The spacious room for the house of representatives has been finished for several weeks. The senate room has been plastered for some time, and will require but a week or two more to be completely dry and ready for the reception of that body. Much credit is due to the spirit and enterprise of those who have erected this building in so short a period. As several new houses are erecting in the neighborhood, and old ones fitting up, congress will, probably, be better accommodated the ensuing winter, than they have ever been in the city of Washington. In a short period, the capitol, president's house, and executive offices, will be rebuilt with additional splendor. It is hoped that the navy yard, which has already undergone considerable repairs, will soon resume its former standing. The loss of the extensive and valuable library, which congress had with so much care been collecting for many years, has been repaired by the purchase from Mr. Jefferson. The bridges that were burnt have been rebuilt, and every trace of the fire-brands of a barbarous foe will soon be effaced. This shows how vain is the attempt to break the spirit, or to cramp the energy, of a free people. They rise with elastic spring from every effort of this kind.—Nat. Intel.

Unprecedented phenomenon.—We have conversed with several gentlemen, of undoubted veracity, from the county of Ulster, in this state, who all agreed in the following very extraordinary relation:

That they have conversed with several credible persons from Marblatown, in that county, and they mentioned the names of persons well known to the editor of this paper; and these persons assert, and declare themselves ready to make oath, that the stones lying in two fields there, on several successive days, rose from the ground to the height of three and four feet, and moved along, slowly and horizontally, from thirty to sixty feet; and that a few of them even mounted over the tops of trees! That the persons, who first beheld these astonishing performances, were disbelieved by the neighborhood; but that all those, who came to see if there was any truth in the accounts, are prepared to swear to them. The last performance was in an open field, without wood or cover near it.

We understand that a gentleman from Kingston has taken means to have every circumstance accurately verified by affidavits; which will probably be laid before the public, in a week or two.

[New-York Courier.]

The above facts have been substantially stated to the editor of the Argus, by gentlemen from Ulster, in whose veracity implicit confidence may be reposed. When relating the circumstances to a gentleman of this city, he stated that an occurrence equally marvellous and very similar, took place in the early settlement of Albany, at the corner of Market-st. and Mark-lane; and that the police established a guard to discover the cause, but without effect.

[Albany Argus.]

LARGE APPLE.—Cincinnati, Oct. 4.—I was presented with an apple, called pound pipen, of an enormous size, from judge Wood, which grew on the Great Miami. The apple weighs twenty-two ounces, is fifteen inches in circumference each way, and five inches in diameter, and of an excellent quality.

JOHN S. GANO.

St. Louis, Sept. 30. We learn that the commissioners appointed to treat with the Indians of the Mississippi, will close their labors without a prospect of effecting a negotiation with the Sacs of Rock river, and their allies, the Winibagoes, Falsavoine, Kickapoos, &c. &c. It is said, that a fort will be immediately erected near the river Desmeine, preparatory to further operations in the spring, and that fort Osage will also be prepared for the reception of a company of regular troops.

New-London, Oct. 4.—Phenomena of the storm.—The brooks which run through this place continue to be brackish. Some wells in the country, which afforded excellent water, have become brackish. It is stated by persons of veracity, that several wells in this place which had plenty of water previously, were nearly dry while the tempest raged.

It is supposed by many persons in the city, that there was a shock of an earthquake during the storm:

Near Mr. Haughton's tavern, Montville, seven miles from this place, is a bridge of a single arch, built of heavy stone over a small run of water. In the storm, one side of the bridge gave way, not from the effect of water, there being very little, and what is very extraordinary, a stone weighing several tons was driven up the stream a rod in a direct line.

Such was the violence of the storm, that the large fishing rocks at Point Judith were removed from the beds, in which nature, perhaps, planted them.

British finances. Among other schemes to raise money, the British ministry proposed an additional tax on news-papers. The mere mention of such a thing caused the discontinuance of several weekly journals that had already paid as much as they could bear. The project was abandoned, for it was found that it would essentially impair, instead of increase the public revenue. The discontinuance of the lowest weekly paper would have caused a loss to the revenue of 600 pounds sterling per annum, and that of a daily paper about 4,000 pounds.

Industry. Most of our readers will be object the story of the quizzical yankee that boarded the Ramillies, to know of captain Hardy when he would bombard Stonington again, so that he might have his carts ready to carry off the iron!—and also how that the industrious people of the vicinity of that place have collected many tons of that metal thrown over board from the Despatch, &c. in her hurry to get way from the battery of two guns, &c. A late

New-York paper has the following notice of the continued industry of this people:

"Five tons of iron were lately taken up, by aid of a diving bell, near Montauk, from the ballast of the Culoden, an English 74, sunk there during the revolutionary war."

List of the navy of Sweden. Charles XIII. 80; Gustavus the Great, 74; Gustavus the Third, 74; King Adolphus Frederick, 74; Fathersland, 74; Russian Prince, 74; Caution, 74; Honor, 64; Courageous, 64; Manful, 64; Prince Frederick Adolphus, 64; Fortitude, 64; Warrior, 50; Galater, 38; Chapman, 38; Eurydice, 38; Camilla, 38; Venus, 38; Thetis, 38; and Fearnought, 22.

British policy.—It appears that the circulation of the Niagara Journal, an ably conducted newspaper published at Buffalo, N. Y. is prohibited to the people of Upper Canada—but, that the Gazette, issued from the same village, is freely received. It is unnecessary further to designate the political character of the two papers. The Weekly Register has recently received one subscription from Kingston—we shall see if it continues.

Philadelphia, Oct. 3.—There have been visited at the Lazaretto during the late quarantine term,

The Slave trade still goes on, after all the vigilance promised against it. It is said that several cargoes of slaves had reached Cuba lately. Mr. Cuffee has employed a colony to go with him to the African coast. Free settlements will be the most enlightened policy which they who sincerely wish an end to slavery can adopt.—Salem Register.

Among the passengers in the Wade Hampton, (arrived at New-York) are major Heriot, U. S. army, Mr. Wade, and captain Tryrand, who "in consequence of barbarous treatment from our late enemy, has lost the use of his limbs."

The Peacock has arrived at New York—see "war events," page 162.

Intending immediately to commence the publication of several very long and very interesting articles, we have freely used the pages of this number to dispose of many scraps and things, worthy of notice and preservation, that were in our way. For some time to come we shall probably give an account of passing European events much less detail than we have done, to afford room for other things more important. The fate of France seems nearly fixed (if a new explosion does not take place) and there is little happening there to interest the friend of freedom—all is becoming darkness and despotism.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

N O. 11 OF VOL. IX.] BALTIMORE, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 11, 1815. [WHOLE NO. 219.

Hæc olim meminisse juvabit.—VIRGIL.

PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, NO. 29, SOUTH CALVERT-STREET, AT $5 PER ANNUM.

To Mr. Cobbett,
Proprietor of the Weekly Political Register, London.

☞ This letter is divided into two parts. The first, presented to-day, consists chiefly of general remarks on men and things. The second, which is not yet fully prepared for the press, will be made up almost altogether of statistical facts, in contrast and otherwise, with needful elucidations, to shew the state of society in Europe and America—and, I think, will present some curiosities to the people of both countries.

PART THE FIRST.

STR—On the 14th ultimo I republished the letter you did me the honor to write to me on the 5th of July. Accept my thanks for it. Common civility requires that I should return the compliment in the same way; and, with the fear of God before my eyes for the truth of what I shall say, and the dread of your attorney-general for what you may publish, I shall attempt it in a style and manner suited to the freedom of the British press, so that you may republish my letter, if you please, in your widely circulated and popular work.—And, believe me, this is a more difficult task than you may suppose—I have been so long accustomed to call things by their proper names, and to feel myself bound by nothing but a regard for the verity of what I had to write, that I feel very awkward at being confined within the range allowed by the fly wheels that belong to and balance the great machine of a monarchy. But I cherish the hope—it is among the most pleasant of my anticipations, that the time will yet come, and is not far distant, when the truth of a matter stated shall be deemed sufficient evidence of its innocence, and all men will be compelled to respect HOLY TRUTH. You very emphatically observe, that “light has gone forth”—yes, and this first principle of the Almighty shall yet penetrate the darkest caves of despotism, and set the oppressed free, though closed up by doors ten fold stronger than those that Milton imagined to shut up his hell—“three of brass, three of iron, and three of adamant rock.”

The number of your paper, that contained your letter to me, was sent to me from a city, more famous than Vienna, [twice captured], Berlin, [twice captured], Madrid, Lisbon, Turin, Rome, Venice, Naples, Amsterdam, [all captured and held for years] Moscow, and some fifty other capital cities, and a thousand more populous places, which fell into the hands of the barbarian Napoleon, for the destruction of its “monuments of the arts,” its public libraries and edifices, not devoted to military purposes. I shall not name this city, because I have heard that the British government, determined to maintain its character, have recently persecuted, fined and imprisoned an unfortunate publisher, who spoke of the desolation of that city as he would have done—as every, even the most conflagrating press in London would have done—if Bonaparte had applied the torch. Why, sir, it seems to me, as if your writers really required the resuscitation of Sam. Johnson to coin them new “legitimate” words to express their detestation of the French for carrying off the “monuments of the arts”—hard put to it, as they are, for only this, what would have been the condition of these fellows, had they been called upon to condemn Napoleon for destroying them? Happily for them, and the honor of the French nation, and of human nature, they were not reduced to this terrible difficulty!

It has always appeared very odd to me, that the same thing, happening under the same circumstances, may be a barbarism in one party of men, and “a gallant expedition” in another party. I have a “notion”—it may be a “Yankee notion,” to be sure, that a villain is a villain, whether born in France or England; and that a villainy is a villainy, whether committed in Europe or beyond the Cape of Good Hope. But there are many who seem to have “notions” very different from this—who act as if they thought that “the elect” might serve the devil most “religiously.” For instance, they considered the French as condemned to make the very dregs of the “bottomless pit,” because some few madmen at Paris had paid religious homage to a woman, as the representative of Reason, during the throes and convulsions of the revolution; but they think it quite “magnanimous,” “humane” and “religious,” that the government of another people should pay the salaries of the priests of Juggernaut and their numerous prostitutes, and appoint officers to see that the human victims, offered to the idol, are crushed to death, by the wheels on which it is moved about, according to law. Indeed, sir, a belief in this is a good match for a belief in the virtues of “St. Pocomo’s old breeches,” or in the “foreknowledge” of the cunning men who make “Moore’s Almanac,” telling the wise people of England, with the greatest certainty, what sort of day, rainy, cloudy or fair, God Almighty intends to give them at any period of the year!

The great body of the people of the “last remaining republic” think of late events in Europe pretty much as you do. There are very few, the “Cossack priests” and Hartford convention madmen excepted, who seem to feel quite easy at the proceedings of the “legitimates” in France; and most of us indignantly recollect the threat that was made to “depose Mr. Madison” when you had got Napoleon down, the first time. A very large majority of our federalists, as they are called, are genuine patriots, real republicans—that would resist a foreign control over this country with as much ardor as the rest of the people. It is lamentably true, that they carried party a great deal too far during the late war with you, and, especially, after it appeared that we were called upon to fight for national existence; and had given themselves too much up to the lead of your partizans and pensioners here, whose resolution it was “to ruin or to rule the state.” But the glory of our arms on land and at sea, with the *sine qua non*s of your wise men at Ghent, opened the eyes of thousands, and got up a national spirit suited to the emergency. If the war had lasted a little longer (but I sincerely thank heaven it ended with the affair at New-Orleans) it would have been differently carried on from what it had been before. We had acquired experience, and a high and honorable feeling began to pervade every class of the community, except as above excepted, which would have penetrated even the senate house of Massachusetts, where it had recently been resolved (in fact) that our inestimable naval heroes were murderers, for thrashing your "fighting squires" into a little respect for the "bit of striped bunting at the mast-head." They would, probably, still have opposed Mr. Madison, but they would have made it their first concern to have opposed you; like a very excellent and respectable gentleman I know, who, at a public place, happening to let fall some expressions derogatory to the character of Mr. Jefferson, immediately after knocked down an English merchant for casting vile epithets on that venerable man. He said the fellow was meddling with things that did not belong to him, and so he was. You will like this evidence of a national feeling; but, perhaps, will think that kicking, instead of striking, was the due of the insolent foreigner.

But you are no more to judge the American character by the tape-sellers of our sea-ports, or the newspapers, generally, printed therein, than we should take one of the calves you send out to gather orders for pins and needles as a fair sample of John Bull. (I could tell you a right merry story of one of these things, and perhaps may do it in a note at the close, for the use of such creatures as may visit us hereafter.) But it is among our farmers—the men who cultivate their own lands, and our manufacturers, now rising to vast importance, that you are to look for republican virtue and stediness. It is they who feel they have a country—it is they who look at the new earth as it is turned up by the plough, or watch the motion of their ten thousand wheels as they go round, that will "not give up the ship," as the dying Lawrence exhorted those around him, though the decks of the Chesapeake were filled with his enemies! There are no such men in the world as our independent farmers, who constitute a large majority of our people. Many of them have libraries, like your English lords; and, what is more, they read and understand the books they have. There are men worth $100,000 who drive their own wagons and bring their own produce to Baltimore. Be assured, therefore, that though liberty may be put down for a while in Europe by the weight of "legitimate" pressure, she shall range unconfined in America. Nay, though even our whole sea-board were reduced by the weight of numbers, still freedom would nail her standard to the loftiest oak of the Alleghanies, and beyond it the spoiler should never pass! The deadly rifle, commissioned by heaven for its object, would prostrate all who looked toward our ark profanely, and make the wolves fat with their carcases; and the "star spangled banner should wave triumphant" over the Eden of the world. But though our sea-board is immensely infected with British influence, there is republican virtue and valor enough on our shores to play many "tricks" like Jackson's at New-Orleans, or Macomb's at Plattsburg, or to meet the enemy in the open field, foot to foot, point to point, as Brown did at Niagara, and dispute the possession, inch by inch. The authority of a foreign force would hardly be respected a yard beyond the range of its cannon balls, and the capture of a city have no sort of effect on the country adjacent. Empires sometimes have fallen in Europe with their capitals. You have never found it so here. It never can be so, while every citizen feels himself a part of the government—and the blacksmith argues politics with his neighbor, the congressman. If the Spaniards were able to bury three hundred thousand Frenchmen sent to subdue them, calculate how much money it would cost and how many lives would be sacrificed, to put down our "dangerous example of successful rebellion," as your vile writers call the establishment of our republic, and raise up a foreign king on the ruins of our liberties!—calling to mind the nature of the country we have, and the sort of people who fill it; always recollecting, that nine-tenths of our males, between the ages of 16 and 45 years, and many younger and older, can kill a little bird as far as the shot from their fire-arms will reach. Perhaps you have heard the following anecdote which occurred at New-Orleans; but, as I also want your countrymen to hear it, I will repeat it in this place: One of your officers, a gallant-fellow, mounted the breast-work, in despite of the shower of balls, and called out to the few that followed him, to come on, for "the day was their own." "Not yet," said a rifleman, and down came the officer. After all your men, that were not killed or wounded, had ran away, a dispute arose in the American line, which had not yet been the least disordered, as to who it was that had shot the officer alluded to. The man, who really killed him, rested his claim to that service on the simple fact, that he was shot under the left eye. One of our officers then went and examined the body to settle the contest among his fellow-citizens; and it was found out that the only wound he had was under the left eye. Such things would happen every five minutes in a partizan war with the people of the United States. Our western men might make better that they would shoot off the tip of an enemy's nose without otherwise injuring his face. They are not only the best marksmen in the world, but the most generous, high-minded and patriotic people that live, as all of your fellow-subjects, who have fallen into their power, will freely acknowledge. They extended the hand of benevolence to the wounded and the captive—they never gave up the disabled enemy to Indian tortures, or made their prisoner pass through every degradation and privation that tyranny was capable of inventing, or human nature of bearing.

I have said you ought not to judge the people of the United States, by those of our sea-ports, or by the newspapers generally printed therein. The many English and Scotch merchants settled amongst us, with the general influence of commercial business, which makes many stand gaping with their eyes fixed on England for thread, tape and buckram to fill up the shelves of their shops, give us an appearance of being more vitiated than we really are, though the state of society is bad enough, indeed. Take the following case in proof of this assertion:—A much esteemed friend of mine from Wilmington, Del. (a gentleman you once knew very well, and whose talents you respected, though, at that time, you did not approve of his principles) called upon me in this city, Baltimore, during the war, and appeared ready to conclude that nearly all our people were Tories—he had been here two or three days and had discoursed with none else! I told him that Baltimore, of 5000 votes, had not 1000 on the federal side, and that of these, not 100 were Tories. "Where then, are the republicans?"—demanded he. "Minding their own business, and treating strangers with courtesy, instead of bellying contested points of politics into their ears, whether they want to hear them or not, as is the practice at Boston," said I. The fact is, that ten full-blooded monarchists will make more noise than ten hundred republicans—but, when it comes to the ballot, that silently decides our contests, we see where the strength lies. Why, sir, even in Massachusetts, when her leaders seemed as if they would be content with nothing else than the hanging of Madison and an unity with you in the worship of Juggernaut, a large majority of the fighting men were on the side of their country; aye, and would have hurled perdition on the bawlers, if "discretion," as Falstaff has it, had not formed the better part of insurrection valor; and though, perhaps, 10,000 republican voters have left that state for the west within these three or four years past, yet expect to hear speedily that the rulers of it are changed.

Besides, all your fashions and manners are followed by the young and giddy, and we have some that are fools enough to affect the bastard tongue of a London cockney, who swears 'pon his 'onor, that "*h*England is the most hellegant hand the andsomest place and the biggest place too in hall the world!" Indeed, sir, I have heard (and believe it) that the sons of a hatter and of a bootmaker in one of our cities, (whose fathers had acquired great wealth by their trades, and kept their country seats, carriages and horses, and thought themselves as good as any body) asked their old dads to import hats and boots from England for them! The old fellows richly deserved this—they had raised their sons to be "puppies through life," instead of directing the learning they had given them to useful objects. And here permit me to observe, that what seems to me a natural aristocracy, growing out of wealth, ruins many of our most promising young men, sons of honest tradesmen. Possessed of ample fortunes, or having them in prospect, they kick down the means by which they were acquired, and set up for fine gentlemen—live a little while the laugh and butt of the town, and, by and bye, find an asylum in an hospital for lunatics, or the poor house of the county. A very grave, and, perhaps, a useful sermon might be preached about this as a "warning to fathers," but I have not time for it now. As to the newspapers alluded to; they are as corrupt as any that you have. In most of the cities, the great body of the advertising people are anti-republican—this rule has but two exceptions, I believe, in our commercial towns—the cream of the newspaper-business lies in the advertisements, and "where the carcass is there will the fowls of the air be gathered together." Mark it, the advertising customers must not be offended. Besides, some of our editors are evident monarchists, and they make a good trade of their principles.

But to proceed to some of the subjects of your letter. Men of sense have not been a little tickled at your "boastings" about the battle of Mount Saint John, or Waterloo, as you call it. The opinion of many is clearly expressed in a little piece of rhyme which I first saw since I began to write the preceding paragraph. I beg leave to insert it for the edification of Mr Bull:

LOGIC A-LA-MODE.*

"Lord Wellington" said Blucher, "is it true That you beat Bonaparte at Waterloo?"
 "Yes, prince, it is: I'll prove my claim to glory,
 If you'll but listen to my modest story.—"
 'Twas English gold brought Prussian Bulow on
 To join the ranks of falling Wellington:
 For England I commanded on that day,
 Your king and army were in British pay—
 What England pays for surely is her own;
 And being hers, belonged to Wellington.
 Thus, though 'twas Bulow struck the deadly blow,
 'Twas I that laid Napoleon's honors low.
 Dare you deny the French by me were bang'd?
 Deny it, Blucher, and I'll have you hang'd:
 Let Castlereagh to Frederick say the word,
 (Lining his fob with gold)—you'll feel the cord."
 Said Blucher—"Noble lord, I'm forc'd to yield:
 Yours is the glory, for you—bought the field."

At any rate, the great point was gained—you got Napoleon down, and this was, indeed, a "deliverance" to all the borough-mongering tribes. It must be confessed, you do some things much more substantially than we do. If a man is puffed into a mighty warrior, or really does a gallant action (provided he be of a great family) you immediately go to work and send 5, 10, or 15,000 miserable wretches to your poor houses to make a fortune and pension for him that he cannot spend except in profligacy and debauchery. We have no pensioners here but invalid soldiers and sailors, and "Mr. Jackson," if he had killed fifty Pakenhams and Gibbs would have received no more from the public purse than his pay as a major-general in our armies. Nor would he expect it; he went into the service to fight as hard as he could—he did his duty and fought as hard as he could. He escaped unhurt, and is as hale and as hearty as ever. If he wanted money, the people would give it to him with the same alacrity that they paid his fine at New Orleans of $1000, limiting the subscription to $1 per man, and making it up as fast as the names of the subscribers could be written down; but they who would give him $1000 each, as individuals, would not grant him one cent from the public treasury over and beyond his pay, allowance and rations. And I do not know that on this account Andrew Jackson is less happy than Arthur Wellesley, to whom you have given so many nicknames, that an honest old acquaintance would hardly know him. I very much like the project of rewarding the duke of York for the victory of Waterloo! The duke is certainly a very gallant man.—Give him 100,000! Bless me! how prettily it would enable him to rig out his present maker of priests, colonels and tide waiters.†

We understand the way that your newspapers have of getting over an unpleasant piece of intelligence. Some folks here are as well versed in the management of such articles as any are with you. At times, when they feel themselves compelled to afford an insertion to an official article, that gives the lie direct to all they have been saying for the last twelve months, they just leave out the paragraphs or sentences that bear immediately on the subject, and thus make many believe that the whole ground of the matter is laid before them. And it is the business of the priests, in that part of the country where this species of roguery has been most frequently practised, to prepare the people for deceptions by cautioning them against reading any thing that does not come from orthodox sources. But this kind of management only answers for a season. The people discover the error, when the excitement about it has ended, and yet many suffer themselves to be made subjects of new delusions. I could notice several cases exactly to this point. The following more recent affair may be mentioned, for several reasons: A little while after the brave admiral Cockburn had stormed and burned the village of Havre de Grace, after a vigorous defence of the place by an honest Hibernian of the name of O'Neil

* General Jackson was fined $1000 by a judge at New Orleans, for refusing to obey his precept during the invasion of the city, when he had declared it to be under martial law. The fine was paid in about two hours by subscriptions limited at $1 each, by the grateful people.

† For the information of the American reader, it may be useful to state that while Mrs. Clark was the "dear angel" of this bright fellow, many priests and colonels, and other officers were preferred, or made, by the duke, at her request.

* From the Baltimore Patriot.

and had conflagrated both shores of the Chesapeake bay, your writers, at Boston, were set to work to sack and burn the town of York, in Upper Canada, which had not long before been captured by our troops. They began, with "it is said," "we have heard," "it is reported," &c. and after awhile they came out with what appeared regular statements of the destruction of the place by our soldiers. The British at length, seeing it so broadly asserted, began to believe it—and they helped the story on by engraving it in some of their official papers, on the simple authority of their writers in Boston, for they had no other; and, perhaps, they believed it, for they would hardly have supposed that any Americans were profligate enough to make up the story merely as an apology for the warm system of Cockburn.—In process of time, the tale assumes even the shape of "history," by a priest, "a member of the Massachusetts Historical Society;" and they who made it begin to believe there may be some truth in it, though told a thousand times to the contrary. In this state of the business, high and honorable men, who were present during the whole time the town was in our possession, come forward to say that the statement is altogether false, and support the good conduct of our troops there by a letter from the chief justice of Upper Canada, to our commander in the expedition, written at the time and on the spot, and thanking him for the humanity and generosity that had been extended to the people of that town. This, you would think, is what is vulgarly called a botherer. No such thing. The purpose had been served, and they care nothing about it now, and think they do an act of ample justice by inserting two or three lines in an obscure corner of their papers saying—"It is asserted that York was not sacked and burned as was currently reported sometime ago"—And so they manage it on a thousand occasions. I am, therefore, not the least surprized to hear that the body of the English people believe that you threshed us most abominably at New Orleans. I only wonder that Mr. Bull does not enquire what became of the 300,000 bales of cotton that were to have been brought home as booty to supply your manufactories, as was promised in the papers. John sometimes seems to think a great deal about the "main chance."

The fate of France, and, indeed, of Europe at large, is deplorable. The people seem pressed to the earth by the bayonets which support the "legitimates"—kings and priests. You have made a pretty business of it by re-establishing the inquisition in Spain, and the jesuits, &c. Your priests have a standing prayer for the downfall of the pope—might they not be subject to the correction of the attorney-general for asking God to destroy one of your king's best allies? By the blessing of Providence, we have none of these things. If a big bellied fellow were to trespass on one of our farmer's lands, and demand of him the tenth of his produce for the support of the church—if the farmer did not seek safety in flight, supposing him a crazy man broke loose from some hospital—he would set his dogs upon him as an impudent knave, without any respect for his coat. It is true, the blessings of such a priesthood as you have, are not yet "restored" to France; but I am induced to believe that the allies will not consider the "deliverance" as perfected until the people are as well subjected to the church as to the sword. This may easily be done, by cutting the throats of all the protestants in France and killing off about one half of the catholics. Things are managed a little in this way in some parts of India—for the sake of "re-li-gi-on."

There is one piece of impudence that astonishes me. Napoleon, an outcast, without a friend or ally, lands in France with 600 men, and the whole country submits in almost as few days as the news of his arrival could reach all the parts of the empire.—Louis enters at the head, or rather tacked to the heels of more than a million of armed men, arrives at Paris, and the country is yet in rebellion against him. But they call the Bonaparte an usurper and the hated—the Bourbon, they say, is the "legitimate" and the desired. What a wonderful hypocrisy is this!—but it has a parallel in the declarations of the allies compared with all their proceedings: They affected to war only with the "usurper," but they have conquered France, and make even the king that they brought on their spears, an actual prisoner in his capital! I cannot doubt but that they intend to be avenged on France for her glories, and to "cripple her for fifty years," as you proposed to serve us. And they may do great things in this way while they keep 5 or 600,000 of their soldiers quartered on the people of that country; but away will Louis as fast as the poor old man can run, with all his royal and legitimate appendages, the moment the spring of the nation is released from the actual pressure of the sword. Indeed, the only way by which I believe France can be kept "tranquil" under her present rulers and their principles, would be to kill off every second man, at least, and every third able-bodied woman. "Order—law and religion" might then be restored, and France would "repose in the arms of her legitimate sovereign," as Governneur Morris says.

Napoleon committed many and very great errors. The parent of all the rest was his silly hankering after those foolish things which I had hoped the French revolution was designed by Providence to destroy. He never had my personal friendship after his return from Egypt. He would be a king and conquer countries and have tributary nations, like his brother kings. I do not believe he was one whit worse than the very best of them—more restless, more ambitious, or more tyrannical. He stood upon higher ground, and acted in a larger field than most others. Certainly, your government or that of Russia, will hardly accuse him of ambition. You, who have put down more "legitimate princes in India than reign in all Europe," and have killed more men to govern those that remained than Bonaparte aspired to rule, out of what was esteemed his proper sphere: and the territory of Russia, made up of conquered countries, like your empire in the East, is larger than that of all Europe. Why not emperor of France and king of Italy, as well as emperor of Russia and king of Poland, or emperor of Austria and king of Lombardy? Still, Napoleon was a king—he mixed his blood with the blood of kings—he would have raised a breed of kings—and, therefore, was not a favorite with me, nor do I care three straws about the sufferings of his dignity, and the like, though the conduct of his enemies towards him will consign them to the infamy of ages. For this chiefly I liked him—he stood as a monument of the right of the people to change their rulers, and I really thought him the most legitimate king that had reigned for a thousand years. But I must not say much on this subject, if I would expect you to republish this letter—you have Mansfields enough that would not conduct themselves with the moderation and forbearance of the Roman governor, who called for water and washed his hands to shew his innocence of the designed death of one who had appeared among an ancient people to invite them to return to truth. The purity of his life and the sublimity of his principles, would have done as little to have excused his "innovations" before a king's bench as before the council of Jews. But if Bonaparte had declared for a republic—aye, if he had done that, every throne in Europe would have sympathetically trembled to its centre, and France would not have been trodden by foreigners in arms. His soldiers would have been more numerous than he could have employed, and they would have went into battle chanting the hymn of the victory they were determined to win.

A few observations about the "legitimacy" they speak of, and I shall have done with this part of my letter. Is it in the blood? We have a niece of your beloved regent in the penitentiary at New-York, suffering the penalty of our republican laws for royal practices, in appropriating to her own use what she did not earn—vulgarly called stealing. Now, would it be worth my while to take a journey to that city to request an interview with her royal highness, and obtain permission to get a drop of blood from her royal arm to compare with a drop of mine own, whose father, grandfather and great grandfather were mechanics, as I myself am? You often see this kind of people, and know all about them. I have never seen but one that I suspected as being of the blood royal—his name was S——, and I supposed he might be the heir of three kingdoms (now held by a foreign family) because he appeared to be the most worthless wretch I ever saw. If it be in the blood, then you are all slaves, as much so as our negroes, being born the property of a master. But how is this blood got up? If a foreign woman were to murder her husband and all his relatives (her son excepted) would that make the grandson one of the "legitimates!" Or, does the expulsion of one from the throne who has the blood, by another who has not the blood, transfer the blood to him that wins the battle, as was the case when what you call your "glorious revolution" was accomplished? It is absolutely denied that the people have any thing to do with the "legitimacy." My "notion" is, that the whole thing depends on the sword. Bonaparte was legitimate—quite legitimate, with all the people of Europe, except those of your island, while his sabre was up. Force, therefore, is legitimacy. Our "cossacks" talk a great deal about "legitimate kings," but they never have the liberality to tell us wherein their "divine right" lies. I have many times put questions to them about it, and they are immediately thrown into a flutter—the saying is homely, but they touch the subject as I have seen a hungry puppy attempt to manage a hot dumpling; they turn it and twist it over and over again, being afraid to touch it boldly; for if they do, they know very well that they declare Washington and the rest, for whom they affect almost a religious homage, to have been traitorous villains. There is no way of getting off, if the question be closely pressed upon them. Either men have, or they have not, a right to change their rulers—if they have, the whole doctrine of legitimacy is false and scandalous; if they have not, we also, are, of right, the subjects of your king.

To conclude these general remarks—I indulge the hope, that though the prospect is indeed gloomy, and it would seem as if the rights of the people and sovereignty of nations were alike to be sacrificed by a conspiracy of an extent before unheard of in power to do mischief, yet mankind shall break the chains that confine them, and nations shall resume their independence, by general risings of their population; and reason, and justice and truth become arbiters in the civilized world, instead of gold, fraud and force. When the people shall begin to see, and see it they must very shortly, that they may as well lose their lives in battle as be starved or ground to death, they will grasp at any thing that offers a prospect of change, for they cannot be worsted. Then will they seek their lost liberty in blood and slaughter, with a fury bordering on madness. The contest will be bloody and the trial severe, but the effects, in the result, happy. I prefer the tumult of revolution to the calm of despotism. You in England, used to call the French "slaves" twenty years ago, and boast of your liberties and of the ease and happiness you enjoyed. It is not among the least remarkable things which have happened, that you no longer use that epithet or boast of your freedom and ease.—The French were slaves; but they will not be made slaves again.—Let the blood that is shed be laid at the door of those who would steal away their liberties. Every one may lawfully shoot at and kill the wretch that would deprive him of his freedom; and the fault will be no more that of the French people, if desolation shall again have its day in a new struggle for their rights, than it would be mine to spill the blood of one of your officers who attempted to impress me into "his majesty's" service—whose life I should feel just as callous about taking as I would that of a viper coiled up to strike me.

Yours respectfully,

Baltimore, Nov. 9, 1815.

Vermont Legislature.

The legislature of Vermont convened at Montpelier, on the 12th ultimo. The majority for gov. GALUSHA was 852 over all others; the council are all republican, and sixteen republican majority in the house of representatives. William A. Criswold was elected speaker, and Wm. D. Smith clerk of the house. William Slade, jr. is appointed secretary of state.

GOV. GALUSHA'S SPEECH.

Gentlemen of the council, and Gentlemen of the house of representatives,

We are assembled at a highly interesting period; a period succeeding the most surprising events that ever burst upon the view of an astonished world. The storm of war, which had overspread the whole civilized world, and threatened almost universal ruin, has, by the overruling hand of Omnipotence, been suddenly hushed to silence. The great commotions, by which Europe was shaken to its centre, have, for a moment, subsided. The important contest in which we were deeply engaged, with one of the most potent nations of the earth, has been happily terminated; and, instead of the horrors of war, we are surrounded by the rich blessings of peace. While we behold, most conspicuous, the hand of that Being, who "enlargeth the nations, and strengtheneth them;" and, while our hearts glow with gratitude for the signal displays of his beneficence, in protecting and conducting us safely and triumphantly through our late struggle for the support of our dearest rights and national independence, let us look to Him for wisdom to direct us in our deliberations, and aid to such a discharge of our legislative duties, as shall conduce to the highest interest of our constituents, and the best good of the union.

A time of peace is a time of cool and deliberate reflection, when all the angry passions, which are too prevalent in war, ought to be quelled, and when the sufferings and dangers to which we have been exposed, together with the causes of those dangers and sufferings, should be carefully sought, and critically examined, for the purpose of avoiding future evils, and ensuring future safety. Notwithstanding the European powers now seem tranquil, yet the unexpected and extraordinary changes, recent in that devoted country, justify our fears that new wars may soon arise from some unforeseen cause, and put our rights and liberties again in jeopardy. During the calm, then, we ought, by an indissoluble union, to be prepared for any storm that may arise.

I do not design to enter upon an investigation of the causes, progress and termination of the late war with Great Britain. Permit me, however, to observe, that no neutral nation was ever more cautious of giving offence to belligerent powers, than were the United States; and no nation that had the least confidence in its strength to oppose, ever suffered so long, such flagrant abuse of its rights, without resorting to arms. But when the love of peace could no longer restrain its votaries from assuming an attitude to defend their sacred rights and the nation's honor, the constituted authorities of our country declared a war which has progressed and terminated in such a manner, as has wholly disappointed the proud expectations of our enemy, and, in the view of the world, shed a lustre on our national character, which I hope no future disgrace may tarnish.

The nations of Europe, after suffering an almost incalculable destruction of property, after drenching the earth with blood, and clothing their fields with carnage, have sunk down under governments no less despotic, with immense additional burthens. Aided by protestant powers, the pope is again restored, and Spain again groans under the terrors of the inquisition. France is degraded to a state of wretchedness, unparalleled, except in Poland; for notwithstanding the pledge of kings, that when Napoleon was secured, France should remain unmolested in the enjoyment of her liberties and independence, yet when that object was accomplished, royal faith was violated, and the strong holds of the kingdom put in possession of foreign mercenary troops, who strip the inhabitants of their wealth, and spread devastation and terror through that opulent, polished, and late powerful nation; while their stupid monarch sits quiet on his throne, without the least exertion to preserve his own honor, or any seeming concern for the interest and happiness of the people over whom he nominally reigns.

If, from beholding the unhappy state of Europe, we turn our eyes to ill-fated Asia, there we behold despotism and misery reigning triumphant. Even in that vast and populous territory which has been subjected to the British government, so far are oppression and superstition from being exterminated by England's boasted love of liberty and religion, that the chains of cruelty, ignorance and idolatry are riveted by the hand of that nation, which is almost worshipped for its professed Christianity. Idols and idol priests are supported by the British government of the Indies, and a revenue drawn by that government from the collection of a tax levied on those deluded pilgrims, who go to worship, and frequently to sacrifice themselves in blind devotion to their lifeless gods.

I do not mention these things, thinking that they have any immediate connection with the business of this legislature; but, that we, by reviewing the wreck of nations, and the horrors of despotism, may the higher prize, and more carefully guard, the rights, and firmly support the principles of a free, equal, and happy government. Of all the nations of the earth, the United States, alone, are left to support a government, whose basis is equal liberty, and whose sovereignty is the will of the people. While, then, we behold a world in chains, and consider that we belong to the same mass of beings of which other nations are composed, ought we not to be jealous of our rights, and suspicious of usurpers?

From what has already appeared, is it uncharitable to say, that the same restless ambition, which has subverted former republics, and which ever grasps at power, regardless of right, now rankles in the very bosom of our country? Then, as faithful guardians of the people's rights, ought we not carefully to watch over our own hearts, check every inordinate desire, and be vigilant and active, lest the subjects of that aspiring ambition, should overturn the fair temple of liberty, and ride into unlimited power, over the crumbling monuments of freedom, erected at the expense of the blood of our heroes? Our rights and independence cannot be too well guarded; for though few will openly declaim against a republican form of government, as being the most happy, while the people continue tranquil among themselves, and undisturbed by foreign wars—yet many have presumed to affirm, that it is too weak, and too tardy in its operations, to protect its citizens against domestic insurgents or foreign invaders. But we have seen, by experience, the fallacy of such assertions; for, in the late contest, the strength of our government has been amply proved, even at a time when party spirit prevailed to as high a degree as an enlightened populace would admit.

Although, in the first stages of the war, owing to a long interval of peace, which it was the interest and the happiness of our government to cherish, until safety forbid, we were destitute of such experienced officers and disciplined troops, as seemed requisite to meet the well-tutored hosts of one of the most formidable nations in the world, whose perpetual wars keep her in constant readiness for any new military enterprize; and notwithstanding we suffered some disasters through the failure of a few, who did no honor to their commissions, yet, in a short time, was our army so officered and disciplined, that whenever the enemy came in contact with an equal, and often an inferior number of our troops, he was compelled to yield the palm of victory, and either surrender, or retire from the scene of action, confused, disgraced and abashed. Witness our illustrious victories near the shores of Erie. Even our militia have trampled on the fading laurels of British prowess. What was the state of Procter in the west? Let Harrison reply. Where is that formidable army that invaded from the north? Let Prevost inform. Where are the boasting legions, flushed with European victories, that assailed the south? Let England answer with a sigh; let Jackson point to their relics; while the faithful page of history records their doom!

Our naval victories have been no less conspicuous. On the ocean and on the lakes, our flag has waved triumphant over Britain's wounded pride and expiring naval glory.

In the Mediterranean, the brave Decatur and his gallant fellows, with but a part of their little squadron have, in the space of a few days, humbled the dey of Algiers, and compelled him to accept a peace dictated by the victor. This, several of the great naval powers of Europe have frequently attempted in vain.

Who then, but with a blush, can speak of the weakness of our government to withstand foreign invasion?

And has it not proved, equally adequate to the suppression of insurrection? Has not every former faction been crushed in its first overt acts of opposition? And where is that most formidable of all factions, which threatened the dismemberment of the union, or the total subversion of our constitutional government? Although it was long disseminating its poison, and originating its plans; it perished at last in embryo. Happy for its supporters that it ended in resolutions and declamations; for, had they threatened hostilities actually commenced, they would have been trampled in the dust by the very people they were endeavoring to allure to ruin.

I do not make these remarks with a design to revive and strengthen those party prejudices, which unhappily exist among us, but to increase our confidence in that government which we have adopted, and to excite our energies to counteract every attempt to overthrow it, for I well know that a republican government rests, principally, on the union of the people. A union formed and maintained for the support of rational liberty both civil and religious, is an object so dear to me, that I have not failed to recommend it on all suitable occasions; and hope ever to recommend it by corresponding example.

I rejoice that we have been so far united, that the constitution of this, as well as that of the United States, has survived the violence of the storm, and defied the threatening surges of the times. When the citizens of this state saw an attempt at such an alteration in their constitution, as would remove the election and accountability of many of their officers, and a greater and truly dangerous distance from them—without distinction of party they rallied round the standard of their liberty, an in the exercise of their sovereignty, secured the happy form and principles of a government, whose peculiar blessings they had long enjoyed. I am far from believing that any human government is so refined as to admit of no improvement; yet, amendments should be made in a time of general tranquility; when the passions and prejudices of the people are at rest; when they can enter upon the most cool and deliberate investigation; and then should they proceed with the utmost caution; for, when a right is once surrendered, it is seldom regained but by wading through scenes of blood, and even then too frequently, the most desperate efforts are in vain. The struggles of France, in her first revolution, to emancipate herself from the galling chains of despotism, are an awful lesson to the world; and should teach us the danger and folly of neglecting our rights even while in the most quiet possession, lest by our supineness, we lose those inestimable blessings, which we have been able to retain through the difficulties and dangers of war—for the aspiring and ambitious are ever ready to grasp the rights and privileges of the people, the moment they come within their reach.

Not having of late been engaged in the business of legislation, and fearing that I have already trespassed upon your patience, I shall not attempt at this time, to point out such alterations and amendments in our laws, as the change of times, and other causes may require.

The education of our youth is an object of such importance, that it cannot fail of exciting your attention, and receiving your fostering care.

In the full and prosperous tide of commerce I trust you will not neglect our infant manufactures, which, if rightly improved, cannot fail to increase our wealth and real independence.

I shall at all times firmly rely on your cordial support, in the faithful discharge of the arduous duties that devolve upon me. And having endeavored to impress your minds with a due sense of the responsibility, that rests on the representatives of a free people, I entertain the highest confidence in your wisdom and integrity, to perform every legislative duty, and especially to supply the various offices within your jurisdiction, by the appointment of such persons as are lovers of justice, and suitably qualified to fill their several stations so as shall conduce to the safety and happiness of individuals, as well as the honor and interest of the state.

All such communications as I may receive, for your consideration, either from the general government, from sister states, or other sources, will be seasonably laid before you.

I shall, gentlemen, cheerfully concur with you, in every measure, calculated to promote the welfare of our constituents; and it is my ardent desire, that a spirit of harmony may prevail among us—and that the blessing of that Supreme Being, who presides over the affairs of states and nations, may attend us in all our deliberations.

JONAS GALUSHA.

Legislature of Tennessee.

The legislature of Tennessee convened at Nashville on the 18th ult. and proceeded immediately to business.

On counting the votes received for governor, it appeared that there were—

For Jos. McMin	14980
Robert Weakley	6028
Jesse Wharton	5918
Mr. Foster	3626
Mr. Johnson	2417

So that Joseph McMin was elected governor, in the place of Willie Blount, who has served already for six years, the full term permitted by the constitution. The legislature have passed a vote of thanks to governor Blount for the able discharge of his duty during the term of his service.

The following is the GOVERNOR'S MESSAGE.

Senators and representatives of the general assembly of the state of Tennessee:—

GENTLEMEN—I have a peculiar gratification in tendering to you my congratulations upon the return of a safe, honorable and advantageous peace between the United States and Great Britain, after a struggle for three years in a war declared for the maintenance of our rights, and in support of our republican institutions—for this peace, honorably obtained, we are, under the favorable disposition of Divine Providence, principally indebted to the unceasing exertions of the able and virtuous administrators of the general government—to the talents and attention of our negotiators, and to victories obtained over the enemy by our armies and navy, together with the support of every patriotic state in the union—the peace will be durable because thus obtained. The late war has proved that a republican government is not only best calculated to promote the happiness of man, in times of tranquility, but capable also of withstanding the rude shocks of war. Such a government is worthy of the best support of freemen; it adds greatly to my satisfaction to have it in my power to say that the state of Tennessee has, from the commencement to the termination of the late war, faithfully, zealously, and honorably done her duty, and that in every trial with the enemy, victory, of the most brilliant and decisive kind, has crowned the exertions of her militia and volunteers engaged in the conflicts—victories which have excited the admiration of the American government, and of the whole people of the United States; and which have astonished and confounded the enemies of republican government throughout the world—Victories by them in part obtained, when acting in conjunction with the brave regular forces and others, commanded by the gallant Jackson, which have given to Tennessee a high standing and which will, in all future times, as well as for the present, secure to the commanding general, the militia, volunteers and regulars under his command, a lasting fame, and will entitle them to the unfeigned thanks of their fellow citizens; their exertions have saved a valuable country, and rendered the condition of a meritorious population therein, safe and comfortable—a country which affords the outlet to the redundant produce of the west, and the inlet to many of our comforts. The expedition used in descending the river to meet the enemy, was never surpassed—the hand of a favorable Providence was surely with them; which, with the best human exertions in any laudable undertaking, is sufficient to ensure success.

In executing the duties enjoined upon the executive of this state by the highly patriotic act of the general assembly, passed on the 24th of September, 1813, giving to him authority to call out a given number of the militia and volunteers, as also to provide temporarily for their support and equipment, to act in concert with troops ordered out by the general government against the hostile Creek Indians, for the relief of the people of the Mississippi territory, then exposed to savage depredations; and also to provide more effectually for the safety of our frontier settlers—many difficulties were experienced by him, but much greater were experienced and borne by the troops called into that service; those difficulties were in part occasioned by the existing emergency, and the necessity for immediate active operations against the enemy—to the want of open routes for ready communication with the commanding general—to the want of roads and places of deposit at convenient distances throughout the Indian country, which led to the consequent difficulty of supplying the troops with provisions in due time for their comfort, whilst they were undergoing every hardship, and anxious to meet the enemy—these obstacles, with many others, however, were met with a zeal to overcome them, and were surmounted in the best manner, which under all circumstances it was found practicable to pursue; and the objects of that act which was so replete with the most patriotic provisions that ever was enacted by any legislature of a state, have been carried into effect without leaving the state liable for the payment of any monies authorised therein to be borrowed, if necessary, altho' there did, for a short time, exist a necessity for making to the contractor, some advance of money, the better to enable him to furnish provisions, when, for that purpose, I borrowed $15,000 from the state bank (the one nearest to his residence) and gave my note, which note the contractor took up by the time it became due.—The objects contemplated by that act have been effected in a manner highly honorable to the state, and glorious to the troops of Tennessee, and the 39th regiment of the United States, who were engaged in that arduous conflict—a conflict rendered arduous mostly by the obstacles to transportation of supplies, &c. as abovementioned, as Tennesseans have no difficulty in fighting their enemies or the enemies of their country—the good effects which have resulted from the passage of that patriotic act, and from the promptitude, valor and good conduct of the militia, volunteers and regulars, and in fact from the patriotic exertions of the general population of Tennessee, to promote the service, will be forever felt and remembered with gratitude to the actors, by the population of the whole south-western section of the nation, and by the general government. The hostile Creeks have been conquered, and the better portion of their country obtained by treaty as a pledge of their future good behavior, whereby great strength and a permanent peace is secured, not only to our immediate frontier, but to the neighboring states and territories. Greater achievements and more important benefits have not resulted from the active conduct and bravery of any men—They have deserved well of their country. The Cherokee Indians, headed by that distinguished hero, colonel Gideon Morgan, in aid of the United States' arms, in that conflict, are, as well as colonel Morgan, well entitled to the highest praise; his and their bravery will be recollected with pleasure by all who know their conduct in the several battles with the Creeks, and particularly at the battle of the Horse-Shoe or Tohopeka.

In compliance with a resolution of the last assembly, passed the 27th of September, 1813, authorising the executive to appoint a confidential agent to go to the Choctaw nation, if in his opinion it should be necessary, the better to secure the settlers on Tombigbee from savage depredations, I appointed colonel John McKee, an agent on that mission—his qualifications in all respects were as good as could be wished—he immediately proceeded thither; the United States' agent to that nation was absent, and colonel McKee's arrival there at the time he did was most fortunate for the people on that frontier, and highly important in other respects—his exertions rendered in aid of the general policy of the United States, and the particular objects of his mission, greatly tended towards the preservation of that frontier, if not saved those exposed settlers from destruction, before any other relief intended by the provisions of the act of the 24th September, to be afforded them, could be carried into effect—as that resolution was passed to make a part of the aid intended to be afforded to the general government in the prosecution of the war against the hostile Creek Indians, and for the protection of the frontier settlers of the Mississippi territory, of which government was immediately advised. I have full confidence that the expense incurred under it will be defrayed by the general government, and that the services of the agent will be duly appreciated and rewarded.

In the course of the last year, major-general Jackson, with the view of more effectually promoting the safety of this frontier, made a movement against Pensacola, which place had long been a rendezvous for the enemies to our peace, and from which place much evil ensued for many years to the frontier settlers of this state, and to the neighboring states and territories. He was aided in that most laudable undertaking by a brigade of volunteers from this state, commanded by general Coffee. This affords an additional evidence of the zeal of Tennesseans in support of measures calculated to frustrate the objects of the enemy, and to promote the peace and safety of their fellow citizens. The result of that movement was the surrender of Pensacola to general Jackson, and the dispersion of the British fleet and forces stationed there—among the good effects therefrom, may be reckoned the greater safety of Mobile at a very critical period of the war, and a favorable change in Spanish policy towards the United States, and greater certainty of a permanent peace on our frontiers. The actors deserve well of their country.

In each and every call I have had the honor to make upon the militia or volunteers, in compliance with requisitions from the war department, I feel pleasure in declaring my gratification at witnessing their promptitude, zeal and patriotism in attending thereto—and I have also abundant reason to feel grateful to the whole people of Tennessee for their patriotic exertions on such occasions to promote the service. The good conduct of the troops on their march to the places appointed for rendezvous, is acknowledged with pleasure. The exertions of officers in arming, equipping and organizing the several detachments which have been called into service from time to time, and the celerity of movement from the places of rendezvous, and the despatch in general used to get to the scenes of action, will entitle them to the thanks of their country.

[Some paragraphs on local matters are here omitted.]

As my term of service is now about to expire, I forbear to make a more general recommendation of measures connected with the interest of the state, under a thorough conviction that my worthy successor will call the attention of the legislature to all important objects of state policy and interest.

For some years past it has been my duty to make executive communications and recommendations of measures which I thought connected with the interest of the state, to the general assembly, and as this is the last I may ever make to that regular authority, I will through your honorable body indulge myself in expressing my grateful sense of the attention which former legislatures have paid to subjects which I have had the honor to recommend to their consideration; their support has been sensibly felt by me, and it has produced benefits to the state; the good effects of many important measures which have from time to time originated with the general assembly, and that body adopted, are manifest to their constituents, and so far as it has been my duty to act in compliance with their provisions, it has afforded me great pleasure to discharge it as faithfully as was in my power. In a word, the harmony which has prevailed between the executive and legislative branches of the government for the time I have been in office, in all measures considered interesting to the state, or to the people, has been such as to produce most pleasant reflections; that an equal degree of harmony may continue to prevail between those two branches, is my desire; the continuance of it will be attended with the happiest effects to our common country, the prosperity of which in whatsoever situation I may be placed, will at all times be most interesting to one who has for many years zealously labored to promote it. I do most sincerely rejoice at the arrival of the period when I am to retire to private life. In future, my time will be devoted to pursuits unconnected with the active scenes of public relation, and I beg leave through the medium of your honorable body, created by an expression of the will of the people, to tender them my best wishes for their happiness, and to acknowledge the high sense I entertain of the repeated expressions of their confidence in me, as manifested by their unbiassed vote at the general elections held for the three preceding years, confiding to my trust the exercise of executive duties—those duties have been discharged faithfully, as I believe, and whether the execution of them has, or may produce benefits to our community or not, the people can judge.

PERSECUTION OF THE SPANISH PATRIOTS. A London paper of August 24 exhibits a review of the "ungrateful persecution" of the great men who had struggled for the independence of Spain. He gives a list of thirty distinguished members of the Cortes, or Spanish congress, imprisoned at Madrid after the restoration of Ferdinand VII. Senor Antillon was dragged out of his bed in a dangerous disease by the king's officers and hurried away in a carr to Saragossa: he died on the journey! Besides the deputies, every conspicuous naval and military officer has been either imprisoned or banished; among them are admiral Valdes, who was governor of Cadiz during the siege; lieutenant-general Compan, the defender of Tariffa; Villacampa, governor of Madrid; and the ex-minister of war O'Donojo, &c. &c. &c.

"Lieutenant-general Lacy has been banished, who was general in chief of the army of reserve of Galicia, and who distinguished himself so much in the war of the peninsula. In fact it may be observed, that almost all the chiefs who conducted the war with success have been discarded, imprisoned, or banished.

"Every journalist who supported the character of the government during the revolution, is either a fugitive, or groans in dungeons, or has been condemned to banishment, or to the fortresses. This, however, can be no ground of wonder, when it is known, that the number of persons in prison, in Spain, for their political opinions, is supposed to exceed 51,000!!"

The principles and mode of the mock trials are consistent with the king's despotic motives: The Alcaldes de Corte, or justices of the king's household, twice refused to take cognizance of them.

"In the first place of these judges, Senor Lassutca, was at the same time judge, witness and accuser. The principal charges brought against the deputies, were, the having approved of the two decrees of the 1st of January, 1814, and the 2d of February, 1814, upon the conduct which the army and the authorities should observe in case the king should present himself on the frontiers of the kingdom, either surrounded with the troops of Bonaparte, or under his influence. These two decrees, known in almost all Europe, and particularly by the allied powers, were highly applauded for the patriotic sentiments with which they abound; particularly by the latter decree, which was justly celebrated in England, because it annulled the peace concluded at Valency between king Ferdinand and Bonaparte.

"Besides these charges of accusation, was that of not having approved in the Cortes a motion made by father Ostoleza, who is at present one of the principal of the king's councillors. Almost all the charges, as being ridiculous, may be passed over in silence; but it is not possible to do the same with regard to the acts of illegality committed in the conduct of the trials. The chief of these illegal acts were, that almost all the sentences were passed, when the processes were still in a state of sumario,—that is, before the accused could defend themselves; before they had brought forward witnesses for their exculpation; which is the same as if in England the accused were condemned upon no other evidence than that of the coroner's inquest; for that which in Spain is called the sumario of a process, is nothing else but the first information.—Those processes, in which a regular course has been pursued, abound with a thousand other invalidatory circumstances. Among these one of the most shocking is, that of the persons accused having been prevented from defending themselves in person before the tribunal, which the laws of Spain authorises them to do.

"It would, however require volumes to detail all the acts of injustice committed in Spain since the return of the king, whose ungrateful conduct towards his best defenders and servants, is well known throughout all Europe."

Of the judges we are presented with this sketch:

"The president, lieutenant-general don Joseph Arteaga, was in Ceuta during almost all that period, and therefore never saw a single enemy, which is certainly no high compliment to his valor and patriotism. He however might pass for a good patriot by the side of his colleagues in the commission, which is composed of four other individuals besides himself. The first of these is the Conde del Pinar, who at the beginning of the insurrection in 1808, was sent into Asturias, in order to preach obedience and submission to the intrusive government. He fulfilled this commission with so much zeal, that he was within an inch of being cut in pieces, through a popular commotion in the town of Oviedo, which was allayed, among others by don Alvaro Flares de Estrada, who was at that time procurator-general of the principality of the Asturias, but whose great services, and his having been the first authority that in Spain declared war against Bonaparte, have been insufficient to protect him from the present persecution, and he is now a refugee in England.

"The second person in the commission, Senor Galiano, was one of the judges of the criminal junta established at Madrid by the French government. It appears that it has always been his fate to persecute the patriots. In 1809, he persecuted in the name of Joseph Napoleon, the defenders of the independence of his country, as in 1814, under Ferdinand VII, he condemned as criminals the patriots who had fought and bled in the same cause.

The third, Senor Lasanea, who, as mentioned above, appears under the triple character of informer, witness and judge, signed an humble and respectful exposition which the council of Castile addressed to Bonaparte in which they begged an individual of his family for king of Spain.

"The fourth is Senor Mosquera, auditor of the audiencia of the Caraccas, who, when news arrived in that country of the abdication of Charles IV. and Ferdinand VII. at Bayonne, did all in his power to procure Murat's being acknowledged in the Caraccas as general vicegerent of the kingdom.

"It is necessary to observe that these gentlemen took the oath to the constitution framed by the cortes, the first as a member of the council of Castile, the second and third as deputies, and the fourth as president of the regency, which has given occasion to one of the most singular occurrences that can be imagined, and which is as follows: On the trial of admiral Valdes, one of the questions put to him was, "Why did you cause the constitution to be sworn in Cadiz?" to which the admiral answered, "because I was commanded to do so by Senor Mosquera, then president of the regency, and now judge in my cause."

Whoever reads this, and reflects upon what the people of Spain did and suffered in the name and for the benefit of Ferdinand, and does not wish the ungrateful fool and his monks were at the bottom of the Red Sea, must have excellent ideas—of "legitimacy."

Marshal Ney—Paris, September 1—A justificatory memoir from marshal Ney has been published. It is signed by one of our most distinguished advocates,

M. Berryer, senior. As marshal Ney lies under an accusation, and is liable to capital punishment, we do not wish in any respect to influence the opinion of our readers. We shall merely state the principal points on which his defence is founded. "Till the evening of the 13th March, marshal Ney had passed for a man of honor. Commanded by his majesty on the 7th of that month to march against Bonaparte and give him battle, he served loyally in heart and intention (says M. Berryer) the cause of his king which he had espoused with ardor.

"In the night of the 13th March, the emissaries of Bonaparte came to the marshal. They found him in extreme agitation—in a species of mental derangement (bouversement d'esprit) open to all impressions, and trembling for the fate of France. They brought to him a letter from general Bertrand which forcibly pointed out the weakness of his position, and the certainty of Bonaparte's success.

"According to this letter, Bonaparte had concerted his enterprize with Austria, through the intervention of the Austrian general Kolher.

"England had favored his escape.

"Murat triumphantly advanced with rapid steps towards the North of Italy to take his brother-in-law by the hand.

"Prussia alone could not oppose herself to the views of France.

"The troops of Russia had returned to their distant quarters.

"In vain might marshal Ney attempt to make resistance. The means were no longer in his power. It was the sub-lieutenants and soldiers who had recalled Bonaparte. This he has twenty times repeated himself.

"But if marshal Ney succeeded in forming a focus of armed opposition, what would be the result? It would give up France to all the horrors of a civil war.

"These last words succeeded in triumphing over the better resolutions of marshal Ney.

Hoax at Chester.—A correspondent, arrived in this neighborhood, has stated to us the following account of a curious trick lately played off in that town. A short time ago, a respectable looking man caused a number of handbills to be distributed through Chester, in which he informed the public, that a great number of genteel families had embarked at Plymouth, and would certainly proceed with the British regiment appointed to accompany Bonaparte to St. Helena. He added further, that that island being dreadfully infested with rats, his majesty's ministers had determined that it should be forthwith effectually cleared of these noxious animals. To facilitate this important purpose, he had been deputed to purchase, in the course of a week, as many cats and thriving kittens as could possibly be procured for money in that short space of time, and therefore, he publicly offered in his handbills, 16s. for every athletic full grown tom-cat, 10s. for every adult female puss, and half-a-crown for every thriving, vigorous kitten, that could swill milk, pursue a ball of thread, or fasten its young fangs in a dying mouse. On the evening of the third day after his advertisement had been distributed, the people of Chester were astonished with an irruption of a multitude of old women, boys and girls, into their streets, every one of whom carried on their shoulders either a bag or sack, which appeared pregnant with some restless animal, that seemed laboring into birth. Every road—every lane was thronged with this comical procession—and the wondering spectators of the scene were involuntarily compelled to remember the old riddle about St. Ives—

"As I was going to St. Ives,
I met fifty old wives,
Every wife had fifty sacks,
Every sack had fifty cats,
Every cat had fifty kittens.
Kittens, cats, sacks and wives,
How many were going to St. Ives?"

Before night-fall a congregation of nearly 3000 cats were collected in Chester. The happy bearers of these sweet voiced creatures, proceeded all (as directed by the advertisement.) towards one street with their delectable burdens. Here they became closely wedged together. A vocal concert soon ensued. The women screamed—the cats squalled—the boys and girls shrieked treble, and the dogs of the street howled bass, so that it soon became difficult for the nicest ear to ascertain whether canine—feline—or the human tones were predominant. Some of the cat-bearing ladies, whose dispositions were not of the most placid nature, finding themselves annoyed by the pressure of their neighbors, soon cast down their burdens and began to box. A battle royal ensued. The cats sounded the war-whoop with might and main. Meanwhile the boys of the town, who seemed mightily to relish the sport, were actively employed in opening the mouths of the deserted sacks, and liberating the cats from their forlorn situation.

The enraged animals bounded immediately on the shoulders and heads of the combatants, and ran spitting, squalling and clawing along the undulating sea of skulls, towards the walls of the houses of the good people of Chester. The citizens attracted by the noise, had opened their windows to gaze at the fun. Into these windows the cats instantaneously sprang, taking possession of the rooms by a novel kind of storm or escalade. The cats in their sudden assault on the drawing-rooms and other apartments of the Chesterites, rushed with the rapidity of lightning up the pillars, and then across the balustrades and galleries, for which the town is so famous, and so slap dash through the open windows into the apartments. Never since the days of the celebrated Hugh Lupus, were the drawing rooms of Chester filled with such a crowd of unwelcome guests. Now were heard the crash of broken china—the howlings of affrighted lap-dogs—the cries of distressed damsels, who wept their torn faces and disheveled charms—and the groans of fat citizens, rushing and tumbling forward towards the balconies, bald, bare and bleeding. All Chester was soon in arms, and dire were the deeds of vengeance executed on the feline race. It is needless to recite the various combats that took place between the cats and the men. Suffice it, that our correspondent counted 400 dead bodies floating the next day on the river Dee, where they had been ignominiously thrown by the two-legged victors. The rest of the invading host having evacuated the town, dispersed in utter confusion, carrying with them, however, their arms from the field of battle. [Lon. paper.]

From the London Courier. A wish is expressed that orders will be given to stop the march of more of the allied troops into France. The state of France, however, so far from justifying a diminution of the military force, requires an increase of it. A diminution to any extent of the allied force in France, will be attended with effects disastrous not only to the allies, but to the king of France himself. "What advantage," it is asked, by the partizans of Fouché, "can result from continuing upon France the pressure of the vast foreign force?" The advantage is this: The French, for three and twenty years, have been tainted with the lust of conquest, in every variety of forms. Their revolution gave them unbounded opportunities of gratifying this disposition, and they took care to exercise, with the most unbridled sway, the power which the weakness of their enemies placed in their hands. The collective sense and energy of mankind have triumphed over the disgusting pretensions; the hypocritical professions, and the undisguised ferocity of this people; they were at the feet of their conquerors last year, and then, their blustering looks and cant of self-importance, won unlooked-for kindness from the generosity or credulity of the allies. Circumstances, something different in appearance, but pretty nearly the same in effect, have a second time placed France under foreign domination. Is there no advantage in teaching such a people that they cannot molest the tranquility of the world with impunity? Is there no advantage in disarming men who are still formidable in their cunning and in their strength?

By the treaty of the 28th March, the several parties are not to lay down their arms till the objects of the war are obtained. Are they obtained when the supporters of Bonaparte are advisers of the Bourbons? When the principal adherents to Bonaparte's system still possess liberty, and honors, and authority? When a scowling and ferocious spirit still agitates a large proportion of the population of France? Will any honest man declare, that if the allies had been credulous enough to march to Paris for the sole purpose of placing Louis upon a throne and hearing the deceitful shouts of a mob in the Thuilleries, and then marched out again in holiday parade, that there would have been indemnity for the past or security for the future?

Besides, where is the improved or improving state of the public mind in France? where is the increasing disposition to tranquility and peace; where is there the strengthening inclination to make the king's authority more respected? Is the south—the east of France quiet? Look too at the temper of the inhabitants of the capital.

¶ I insert this article merely to ask the question—if the fellow who wrote it will hereafter pretend that Louis is the desired of France? Pshaw!—The poor old man is neither beloved by the people or respected by those who have throned him. The days of his reign are counted.

War in India.—Extract from a private letter, dated, Bombay, Feb. 10, 1815.—"Lord Moira has got himself into a fine expensive war—I wonder how the court of directors will like it. He has increased the Bengal army, by regulars and irregulars, to twenty thousand men, and two or three Bengal detachments have been cut to pieces, on the Nepaul frontiers. The last Bengal paper mentions that a whole encampment of ours had been overflowed in a valley by a great fall of rain, and the thermometer at the time 38. Now, none of our native troops can stand such a climate. The Ceylon government have declared war against the Candyans, and the Madras government was to have assisted them with some troops, but lord Moira had ordered them not to go, as he will require all he can collect for the company's territories. Sir T. Hislop has taken the field, and is to command a large force in person; immense numbers of troops have taken the field, and are about taking it. It would seem, that lord Moira was about to depose all the native sovereigns, and take the entire of India into his own hands. It will have no good effect. The interest of money must rise in consequence; if it only continues for a few months, the expenditure attending it will be immense. The Bengal merchants have been obliged to borrow cash at 2½ per cent. to carry on their house expenses; the cotton market at China having turned out so bad, that the merchants here did not get prime cost for their cotton. Indeed trade, in general, is very bad."

Royal polygamy.—His imperial highness the arch-duke Charles of Austria is, it is said, about to surrender himself, in happy bondage, to Henrietta-Alexandrina-Isabella-Wilhelmina-De-Sayn-Hagenburgh! What makes this the more strange is, that the united ages of all these ladies do not amount to more than eighteen years, while that of his imperial highness exceeds fifty!

Red, white and blue.—Mademoiselle Mars, the celebrated French actress, lately appeared at a Paris theatre, dressed in the first piece, in red, in the second, in white, and in the third, in blue. This tri-colored exhibition was received as an ingenious device for the Bonaparte colors, and was honored by the audience with unbounded applause.

Advertisement.—Tri-colored cockades, whereof the blue and red are covered with white dimity, for the use of poor royalists, for sale in the street of Badwords, hotel of Janissaries, No. 93—price one Napoleon of 50 centimes, or ten cents.—Paris paper.

A German paper contains the following melancholy anecdote—"A general of the allies, on the march to Leyre, in Franche Comte, was fired at from a wood—the ball missed him; the perpetrator, a youth of 18 years of age, was seized just in the act of re-loading his piece; the general ordered him to be shot, which was done. The general, when he arrived at Leyre, took up his quarters in the best house in town, belonging to a rich lawyer, where he was well received. A few hours afterwards, they brought in the corps of the young man shot by his order; it was the only son of his host."

At one of the late riots in France, the people called out, in the very presence of the king, "Vive Napoleon, a-bas Louis-jupon." "Huzza for Napoleon—down with Louis-petticoat."

Amongst the crowds of peasants and others, who flocked to the site of the battle of Waterloo, to seek for treasure amidst the spoils left on the extensive field of action, was a young woman, who picked up some jewels, loosely strung together. Delighted with her good fortune, which she communicated to none of her comrades, she proceeded with her prize to Brussels, where she went to a lapidary, and asked him to purchase the ornaments she had found. On being asked what she demanded for the stones, she answered, "thirty-five francs"—"Money is very scarce," replied the lapidary—"I will not take less," said the woman—"Well," answered he, "what you have found is a treasure, and I will give you twenty thousand francs for it;"—which sum he paid into her hands. This sudden influx of fortune was too much for her weak mind—she became frantic with joy a few hours after the transaction, and has remained in a state of lunacy ever since.

It is reported that the object of the duke of Bourbon's visit to this country was to endeavor to obtain from our government better terms for France than the allies appear inclined to grant. It is further said, that upon the success or failure of this mission, it entirely depends whether Louis XVIII. will retain the sovereign authority, or abandon France to her fate; and leave the jacobins to fight out their own battle with the allied powers.

The result of this application is of course unknown; but several circumstances give weight to the opinion that the answer has not been favorable to the wishes of the Bourbon ambassador. The consequence must in this case be to place the king of France in a dilemma, out of which there is no other way but to abdicate, or entirely change his counsellors and the political system upon which they have acted.—London paper.

Strong Emblem. At a late presentation of colors to certain Prussian regiments at Paris, the English general nailed the standard to the staff with a nail of gold.

The way it works. Many letters from France, especially from the sea-port towns, and Bordeaux in particular, give us evidence of a very hostile disposition prevailing against the people of the United States, which no doubt owes its rise chiefly to the jealousy and hate of the English and Scotch merchants that fill them.

LATEST FROM FRANCE.

By the arrival of a vessel at Baltimore from Bordeaux, we have Paris dates of the 19th September, and verbal intelligence from Bordeaux to the 23d. The papers contain nothing very important.

The treaty between the allies and France, though supposed to be ratified, has not yet been published. The troops of the former have begun to withdraw. A Paris paper of the 13th September says, it is estimated that by the 20th of that month 300,000 of them will have left France. It seems perfectly understood that 130,000 are to remain to prop up tottering Louis.

It seems generally agreed in France (which is also our opinion) that the Prussians have the credit of the victory at Waterloo.

The trial of Ney was not concluded. His fate is uncertain.

A great many places have refused to hoist the white flag—the tri-color yet flies at Cherbourg, Longwy, Charlemont, Montmedi, Salins, Neubrisac, and many other places. Some of the towns are regularly besieged. Cherbourg was invested with 30,000 men, who, it is believed, would be withdrawn, as the post was so strong that it could not be taken without great bloodshed. Napoleon has still a very strong party in France. "Disaffection" is the order of the day.

A treaty between the emperor of Austria and "king Murat" has appeared, by which he renounces his title of king, and takes that of count Lipona. He is to reside in the Austrian dominions, as a private man, and respect the Austrian laws, and pledges his honor not to quit them without the leave of the emperor.

London, Sept. 11.—The ships Newcastle and Leander, constructed and equipped to be able to contend, with some chance of success, with the American frigates, are undergoing some alteration in their form. They are enlarging their sterns, and making cabins for the accommodation of admirals. They are destined for the ports of Halifax and Barbadoes.

The committee [in England appointed to collect subscriptions for the relief of the families of the killed and wounded at Waterloo] state the British killed and wounded to have been 9999. The Hanoverians, Brunswickers, Belgians, &c. also under marshal Wellington, 4500. The killed and wounded of the Prussian army, in the four days, 22,000—making a melancholy total of 36,499.

LITERARY NOTICE.—The American Philosophical Society, being desirous of extending the sphere of its usefulness, and calling into action the talents of those of its members, whose pursuits have been more particularly directed to the moral branches of science, has lately added to the number of its standing committees, a committee for history, the moral sciences, and general literature. The number of persons composing this committee is indefinite, every member of the society has a right to enroll himself within it. Many of our associates having evinced a desire to participate in its labors, the committee has organized itself, appointed its officers, and is now sedulously engaged in promoting the objects of its institution. Among those, the means of obtaining a correct historical and statistical knowledge of our country have appeared to them not the least deserving of their immediate attention. Sensible of the eminent usefulness of the exertions of the societies established in some of the states, for a similar purpose, and particularly in Massachusetts and New York, they are anxious to concur in their patriotic pursuits, and, with that view, have already collected and rescued from oblivion several interesting documents illustrative of the history of the United States and Pennsylvania.

These will be given to the public in due time, either at large, or by extracts, in the transactions which the committee is authorized by the society to publish under its own responsibility. Meanwhile they think it their duty to solicit the aid of men of information throughout the union, but more particularly in Pennsylvania, and those of other states where no analogous establishments have been formed. The historical memoirs of individuals, public documents, scarce pamphlets, manuscript notes, public and private letters from eminent men, and from men of knowledge and observation; in short, every thing which may be considered as interesting to this country in an historical, statistical, geographical or topographical point of view, will be thankfully received, either as a gift to be deposited among the archives of the Philosophical Society, or as a loan to be returned, after a certain time, to the owner. Communications of interesting facts, known to individuals by their own observation, tradition, or otherwise, are also respectfully solicited.

To the Pennsylvanians, the committee particularly address themselves. Many important details are yet to be collected respecting the aboriginal Indians, the emigrations from various countries which have so largely contributed to the increase of our population, the history and peculiar tenets and rules of discipline of the different religious sects that are established among us. Information respecting these and other matters connected with the history of this state, and particularly every thing relating to our venerable patriarch and founder, William Penn, and his first associates; their history in Europe and in this country; their political opinions and views of civil government and policy, and the foundations which were laid by them for the prosperity and happiness which we now enjoy, will be received with peculiar gratitude.

Our views however, are not limited by the bounds of any particular state—this appeal is made to the citizens of the United States at large, and we confidently expect, that those members of the American Philosophical Society, who reside in different parts of the union, remote from the city of Philadelphia, will zealously co-operate in promoting the objects of the committee, who will be happy to see their names inscribed on their roll, and will inscribe them whenever requested.

All communications are to be addressed to the chairman, or either of the secretaries.

POPULATION OF INDIANA.—Again the vast augmenting population of the west is about to burst into new evidence upon the eyes of the nation; another manly link is about to be added to the bright chain of our glorious republics, in the territory of Indiana, which it will be seen, from the extract below, is entitled to demand her admission into the union, “upon an equal footing with the original states in all respects whatever.” The ordinance of congress provides that whenever any of the territories north west of the Ohio, shall have a population of sixty thousand persons, it shall be entitled to come into the confederation, upon an equal footing with its other members. West Argus.

We were in hopes before this to have been able to have laid before our readers the census of the territory, (or population of each county,) but as yet we have not procured but a part; from which we may safely calculate on exceeding the amount of population contemplated by the act of congress for the erection of new states out of the territories of the United States, and adoption of the same into the federal union; we have been politely favored with the census from the following counties (viz.)

INDIANA SALT WORKS.—We have much pleasure in stating the success which we have understood has attended the distinguished perseverance of general McFarland, in digging for salt water near the flourishing town of New-Lexington, in the territory opposite to us. We have been informed that the salt wells of this gentleman are sunk to the astonishing depth of 420 feet, and although they exceed any similar penetrations of the bowels of the earth among the salt works of this state, yet it is determined to go one hundred feet further, making in the whole 520 feet. The water already excels any salt water in the western country in strength, affording from three to four bushels of salt to the hundred gallons of water. We hope this treasure of salt may be of extensive benefit to our rising and enterprising neighbors, as the rich beds of Kenawha have been to the whole western country.—ib.

Lexington, Ky. Oct. 9. The following resolution of the Board of Trustees of this town was presented to the hon. Henry Clay, by their chairman, on the 5th instant:

“The trustees of the town of Lexington, participating in the general joy felt at the return of our distinguished fellow citizen, Henry Clay, to his country and family, embrace the occasion to express the sense they entertain of his public conduct, whilst acting in his late diplomatic character. They are well assured their sentiments and feelings on this subject, are in unison with those of the people of this town, and of his fellow citizens in general. Convinced that in negotiating the late treaty of peace with Great Britain, our ministers have discharged the important duties confided to them in a manner highly honorable to themselves and satisfactory to the government and people of the United States, their eminent services and manly exertions for the interest of their country, give them a just claim to its respect and gratitude. Therefore

Resolved, That the chairman of this board be requested to wait on the hon. H. Clay, and make known to him our sentiments on this subject, and to express to him the unfeigned pleasure with which his countrymen greet his return.

To which Mr. Clay made the following reply:—

Sir—I have received the resolution of the board of trustees of the town of Lexington, which you have done me the favor to communicate. My colleagues cannot fail, properly to appreciate the honorable testimony of approbation which comes from a source so highly respectable. To me this expression of the sentiments of the trustees of the town of Lexington—a town in which I have resided a considerable portion of my life, and from which I have experienced uninterrupted favor and affection, is peculiarly gratifying. During a great part of the negotiation, which terminated in the treaty of Ghent, our duty was limited to the simple rejection of inadmissible terms proposed by the ministers of Great Britain. The time will never arrive when any American minister can justly acquire honor for performing a duty so obvious, as that always must be, of refusing to subscribe to disgraceful conditions of peace. If, in the manner of executing this painful service, we have justified the confidence reposed in us, I have ample cause of satisfaction.

I pray you to make known to the board how sensible I am of their polite attention, and believe me to be with great respect, your obedient servant,

H. CLAY.

Communication upon a new principle in generating steam.—Its power and application which has hitherto been considered only for domestic purposes by boiling water. Natural philosophy and few experiments have reduced this principle of creating steam to its centre. To prove the fact, we employ a cylinder about 12 feet in length, seven inches in diameter, made of cast iron with a calibre about 4 inches, one end of which is to receive a stop cock, to be connected to a reservoir of water. The cylinder to be placed in an air furnace, made of brick or any other material. When supplied with fuel so as to make the cylinder red hot, let on from the stop cock any proportion of water according to the temperature of its heat, which will become instantaneously rarefied into steam, and travelling ten feet through the red cylinder it explodes with immense power, which may be graduated by letting on more or less water as occasion may require, from the stop cock, not unlike the miller with his gate, and stop as suddenly.

The furnace does not require to be more than eleven feet by three; the whole expence in generating steam sufficient to drive two run of stones upon this principle will not exceed two hundred and twenty dollars. This is saving of one half or more of the fuel, besides the enormous expence of boilers as well as the room, and can be employed for all kinds of wheel work without the ordinary danger of bursting or getting out of repair.

Any further communication may be had by applying to the original proprietor, who is willing to grant privileges to any person wishing to have an interest in this principle.

COTTON BALING PRESS.—The following notice of an improved cotton press, is handed to us by an intelligent friend, to whom it was addressed when leaving Liverpool in June last: [Norfolk Beacon.]

"We beg to inform you that we make a very complete Cotton Baling Press, composed entirely of iron, by the machinery of which, with the power of only two men, a bale of cotton of 300 wt. may be compressed into a cube of 26 inches, or an oblong form, in a very short time; so as to give full as high a degree of pressure, as that possessed by any packages of cotton, which we have seen from the United States.

We have sold a number of them for Demarara lately, where they are considered much superior to all other baling presses—both as to their principle, and with reference to their great strength and durability.

We shall be obliged by your naming them to your Charleston, Savannah or New-Orleans friends, by whom, we presume to think, they will be considered an acquisition; and if such as come to Liverpool would favor us with a call, we would show them one erected. We are, &c.

lars, to the corporation, to assist in bringing water into the village of Newburgh.

It appeared in evidence, that the plaintiff in a waggon, with one or two other carriages in company, was travelling on the Little Britain road. He had a boy on the load of hay with him, who kept a look out, and informed when the carriages were going to attempt to pass. By his zig-zag manœuvring he was enabled to delay the carriages for an hour or two, and by that means broke up a visiting party the company was on. CHRONICLE.

South America. We have accounts from Buenos Ayres to about the beginning of September. The affairs of the patriots were quite prosperous. They had one vessel at sea that had lately made a prize of a valuable Spanish ship; and several smart privateers were fitting out, one of which was the late American privateer True Blooded Yankee.

The Creeks. A good deal is said about the dissatisfaction and hostility of the Creek Indians. We are cautioned not to give too easy credit to many reports from this quarter. But it appears that some difficulty was seriously apprehended from the measures pursuing by our government and its agents. 800 regular troops are said to be already in the nation, and several other bodies are moving into it, and, with the requisition made by general Gaines on Georgia, it is estimated that the whole force under his command will nearly amount to 4000 men.

The North West. A new and strong fort is to be built at the Spring Wells, three miles from Detroit, and there is a report that several of our vessels on Erie are to be raised and put in preparation for service. The British are said to be active in measures to build flotillas on that lake and on Huron.

Extract of a letter from an American officer to his friend in Baltimore, dated Detroit, Oct. 18.

"There was a trial here last week, which, in its effect, is of national consequence. A lieutenant in the British navy undertook to take some deserters on our side, with a party of armed men, some of whom he landed, and caught one of his deserters. Some of our citizens assembled, and surprised the sentry, and finally obliged the officer to go to Detroit, where he was compelled to give bail for his appearance. He was tried according to law, by a jury of six foreigners and six citizens, who brought in a verdict that the officer had not taken the deserter by force; that he had told him only to go into the boat, and the fellow went. From the positive evidence I heard, and from an after conversation with the judge, I think there could be no reason in the world to acquit him of that charge. They, however, brought him in guilty of a riot, and he was fined by the court 4 or $500. Chief-justice Woodward, who gave the sentence, said that this punishment was the sentence of the other two judges, that he differed from it, and that the lieutenant ought to be also pilloried and imprisoned.

"As circumstances occurring, are reported to the United States merely by letter, and often misrepresented, it may be well to inform you, that one of our soldiers shot and killed an Indian last week, for impudently levelling a rifle at a party of our soldiers. The circumstance has made some noise here, as the Indian was under the protection and charge of his Britannic majesty. The British have brought in a coroner's verdict of murder; and some letters have passed between the British colonel James and governor Cass. Our governor has been pretty severe with his pen, and treated the "bulwark" rather roughly. The affair, however is dying away."

"October 20.--The British civil authority have offered a reward of 500$ for the apprehension of the soldier who killed the Indian. This will inevitably set the Indians on the hunt for him. But to prevent any ill consequences, the general will send to colonel James a very spirited remonstrance, and threats of retaliation."

In the above letter, a good deal of animosity is said to exist between the citizens of Michigan and the Canadians; but the military on both sides treat each other with great civility.—Patriot.

PENNSYLVANIA ELECTION. Extract of a letter from Harrisburg to the editor. "The political complexion of the ensuing legislature will stand thus:

	Rep.	Fed.	maj.
Senate	20	11	9

Majority in joint ballot . . . 66

Being two more than the majority in 1814. The third party in that state have not one member, we believe, in either branch.

Moving Stones. We have heard a good deal more about the moving stones noticed in our last, and the statements are so plausible, that we would believe the fact—if we could. If the phenomenon has really happened, the most perfect measures should be taken to establish a record of it.

Valuable. A coal mine has been discovered at Greenbush, opposite Albany, N. York—appears warrant the belief that it is large and extensive. Situate as it is, it may be more valuable than a mine of gold. And in a pond, near the village of Binghamton, Broome county, N. Y. there has been discovered a great bed of marl, which being made up and burnt like brick, turns out to be very pure lime, which slacks with great facility, and forms an impalpable power of nearly three times its original bulk.

The Mediterranean fleet, having accomplished all its object, was expected to sail for the United States about the 1st of October.

Copy of a letter from captain Lewis Warrington, commanding the United States sloop of war Peacock, to the Secretary of the Navy, dated.

New-York, Nov. 2, 1815.

"I have the honor to inform you, that the United States sloop Peacock arrived at this place on Monday evening last, after an absence of nine months.

"As by the arrival of the Tom Bowline and Hornet, you have been made acquainted with our transactions up to the 29th of April, I shall commence from our separation from the latter. In May, we reached the Isles of St. Paul and Amsterdam, (our second rendezvous) where we found a letter for us, which had been left a few days before by the Macedonian brig, informing us of the President's action and probable capture. Here I had intended remaining some time, to rejoin the Hornet; but being carried to leeward, in chase of a strange sail, we were not able to regain them and were at last compelled by a severe gale to bear up, and on the 8th of June made the Island of Java. From that time until the 29th, we were cruising in the Strait of Sunda, where we made four captures; two of which were burnt, a third was given up to carry 150 prisoners into Batavia, and the fourth released, as from her we learned that a peace had been made.

"From the different captures, we obtained about fifteen thousand dollars in specie, and gold to the amount of four or five thousand dollars more. We have on board ten chests of opium. The first prize was loaded with pepper, and a few bales of coarse goods for the Malay market; some of which (as we had no room to stow them away) we distributed amongst the crew, as they were much in want of thin clothes. Of the money, five thousand dollars were divided by me amongst the officers and men.

"From Java we proceeded to the Island of Bourbon, where we procured bread and other articles, for which we were much in want, as we were on an allowance of half a pound of bread per man. From Bourbon, which we left in August, we made the best of our way to the United States, touching for a few days at St. Helena."

☞ The vessels captured by the Peacock were the ship Union, laden with pepper and piece goods, divested and burnt; ship Venus, made a cartel of; ship Brio, burnt; ship Nautilus, 14 guns, 130 men, captured after a single broadside from the Peacock, which killed 7 and wounded 16 men. The P. had none killed or wounded, nor was she damaged. The Nautilus commenced the firing, though she had intelligence of the peace, and on making it known was released by captain Warrington.

St. Stephens, Oct. 6.

In order to allay public anxiety which has been for some time on tip-toe, relative to the result of the talk lately held with the Creek Indians at fort Jackson, we have taken considerable pains to get the most authentic information on the subject. By a gentleman of undoubted veracity, immediately through the nation, and who arrived here last evening, we learn that the conference had certainly broken up, without effecting its object. The Big Warrior and his party (who lately fought with the U. States) together with the several tribes who had been at war against us, have determined to oppose the running of the line. The Big Warrior stated that in either case destruction to their nation was inevitable—that if they suffered the line to be run, their country would be too limited to subsist by hunting, and that they had as well die by the sword as with famine—that they had been deceived—that his party had been promised pay as regular soldiers of the United States—that their pay had been denied them—and that they felt it right in consequence, to hold possession of their lands. The Indians were moving off from the road, and showed evident signs of dissatisfaction, though no hostilities or depredations have yet been committed.

Snow in Canada. A letter from Quebec of October 29, says—"The first snow, this season, made its appearance yesterday morning, on the mountains north of this city."

The Danes, Swedes and Dutch have been loud in their complaints for injuries received of the Algerines. It is understood that the latter have purchased a peace.

ERRATUM. The following error was made by the gentleman who transcribed for us, from the original, the letter on "naval affairs" inserted last week: six weeks, instead of "six months," should have been given as the time required for arming frigates.

Cotton Manufactures.

Copy of a circular letter, addressed to their distant friends, by the cotton manufacturers of Providence, Rhode-Island.

PROVIDENCE, October 20, 1815.

SIR—The manufacturers of cotton in this town and vicinity, having taken into consideration the discouragements under which they now labor, from the competition with foreign goods, have resolved on presenting a memorial to congress, praying for relief and encouragement, and have appointed a committee to correspond with the manufacturers in other parts of the union. The committee take the liberty to enclose to you a copy of their memorial to congress, and to request you to co-operate with them by your advice and influence, and respectfully suggest the expediency of calling a meeting in your neighborhood, and of presenting a petition to congress, similar in its prayer to the one to be presented from this vicinity.

The committee would be happy to receive a communication from you of the steps taken on your part, and will gladly avail themselves of the benefit of your advice and assistance.

TO THE HONORABLE THE SENATE AND HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES, IN CONGRESS ASSEMBLED:—

The petition of the undersigned citizens of the United States, being a committee appointed by and acting for and in behalf of the cotton manufacturers residing in Providence and its vicinity, respectfully sheweth:—

That, in consequence of the interruption of commerce, and relying on the favorable disposition uniformly manifested by the government of the United States towards domestic manufactures, your petitioners have, at a great expence of money and labor, erected and put into operation extensive works for manufacturing cotton goods. Most of the establishments for this object have been completed within a few years, and owing to the numerous and unavoidable difficulties always attendant on the introduction of new branches of business, and the embarrassments arising from the situation of foreign relations of the country, the proprietors have hitherto been prevented from reaping the reasonable profits which they calculated to obtain. During the continuance of the late war, in addition to the ordinary expenses and difficulties of prosecuting the business, they had also to struggle against the enormous advance in the price of almost every article they used, together with the trouble, cost and delay which accrued from the necessity of transporting by land the raw material and every other commodity required for the supply of the manufactories, and for the support and maintenance of the people employed therein. The same burthensome expense and disadvantage were also experienced in conveying the goods, when finished, to distant markets for sale.

But, while your petitioners have had to lament that the circumstances of the times did not permit them to realize the profits which they had a right to expect, they had the satisfaction to perceive, that the nation was deriving great and important benefits from their labors, receiving from the skill and industry of our own citizens vast supplies of useful and necessary commodities, at moderate prices, calculated for universal consumption, and at a period when they could not be obtained from abroad; and that employment and the means of earning a comfortable livelihood were at the same time extended to thousands of poor people, dependent on their labor alone for support, and who must otherwise have been reduced to a state of misery and want. The event has also fully proved, in the opinion of your petitioners, that by due encouragement on the part of government to domestic manufactures, there may be insured to the country, from this source alone, an abundant and regular supply of the most essential and important kinds of cotton goods, at fair prices, and independent of foreign nations.

Your petitioners would now respectfully represent that, in addition to the accumulated embarrassments and losses under which they have labored, the pressure of which has been so great during the last year, as to induce many of the manufacturers to contract their business, and some to suspend it entirely;—the free and unrestricted admission, at present allowed into the United States, of cotton fabrics of foreign production, not only extinguishes the hope of a reasonable profit in future from the manufacture of similar goods at home, but threatens the speedy destruction of the establishments already erected for that purpose, and the loss of the immense capital invested in them. They, therefore, earnestly entreat the interposition of your honorable body, to preserve them from impending ruin. They are the more encouraged in this application, as they conceive the time propitious for government to extend its fostering care to the manufactures of the country, and are convinced that the request accords with the general feelings and wishes of the people, and with the best interests of the nation.

As an eligible mode of effecting the object in view, your petitioners would respectfully submit to the consideration of congress, the expediency of prohibiting by law the importation of all cotton goods (nankeens excepted) the production of countries beyond the Cape of Good Hope, and of augmenting the duty on those of a coarse texture imported from other parts of the world.

It is well known that the cotton fabrics of India are made from very inferior stock, and that they are so badly manufactured as to be of little intrinsic value compared with the substantial and durable manufactures of our own country, and it is believed that almost every nation of Europe has found it expedient to discourage their use, by subjecting them to very heavy duties, or have prohibited their importation entirely; and it is deserving of particular observation, that their consumption is interdicted in England, although they are the production of her own colonies. It is also a weighty consideration, that being made wholly of a material of foreign growth, so far as their introduction is permitted, they operate to deprive our own citizens engaged in the cultivation of cotton, of their best and surest market, and thus injuriously affect one of our most important branches of agriculture.

In order to show the extent and importance of the cotton manufacture in the United States, your petitioners beg leave, respectfully, to state, that it has been satisfactorily ascertained, that in the small district alone, comprised within a circle of thirty miles from Providence, there are not less than one hundred and forty manufactories, containing in actual operation more than 130,000 spindles, and capable of holding a much larger number, few of them having yet received their full complement of machinery. The quantity of cotton which, in their present state, they spin in a year, may be computed at 29,000 bales, which, when manufactured into cloth of the descriptions commonly made, will produce 37,840,000 yards, the weaving of which, at the average price of eight cents, amounts to 2,227,200 dollars, and the total value of the cloth will exceed six millions of dollars. To complete the manufacture from the raw material, until the goods are fit for market, it is estimated would afford steady and constant employment to 26,000 persons. But the benefits resulting from this vast amount of labor are much more extensively diffused than if the whole were done by people constantly engaged in the business, a considerable portion of it being performed by those who are partially occupied in other pursuits, particularly the weaving, which is almost wholly executed at the farm-houses throughout the country, few of which are to be found not supplied with looms. In this estimate are not intended to be included the numerous classes of persons engaged in occupations indirectly connected with and dependent upon the manufacture, such as those employed in furnishing the various kinds of machinery used in the works, in supplying the people with provisions and other necessaries and conveniences, in transporting goods to and from the manufactories, together with those engaged in the coasting trade, in bringing the raw material and other commodities required for the use of the establishments, and in conveying the manufactures to market.

From this cursory view of the subject, a faint representation is exhibited how intimately the cotton manufacture, although but in its infancy, is united and blended with almost every other occupation, thus creating an interest, in a greater or less degree, in all classes for its maintenance and success, and involving in its destruction very disastrous consequences to the whole body of the community.

Your petitioners know of no description of persons who are not, either directly or indirectly, benefited by this branch of manufacture, except a few capitalists engaged in the trade to India, a commerce affording employment for comparatively but few of our ships and mariners, far less, it is humbly conceived, than would be necessary to carry on the coasting trade arising from the manufacture at home of the same quantity of goods imported from thence. Nor does it afford a market for a single article of our own production, but operates as a continual and destructive drain of the specie of the country, the scarcity of which is at this moment most severely felt. It may be also worthy of remark, that the augmentation of the revenue arising from the increased consumption of indigo and other articles used in dyeing, and the various commodities and materials required in the erection of the works and in the different processes of the manufacture, many of which are subjected to heavy duties, would, it is humbly believed, nearly, if not entirely, remunerate the treasury for the loss occasioned by the interdiction proposed.

Your petitioners are aware, that it has been a favorite maxim with some, that commerce should be left free and unrestrained; and while they are far from being disposed to controvert its correctness as a general rule, subject like all others, according to circumstances, to particular exceptions and modifications, they beg leave respectfully to suggest, that they believe it far safer, and more agreeable to the dictates of political wisdom, to follow in the beaten track of successful experience, rather than pursue a course of policy not sanctioned by the practice of any other commercial and manufacturing people, and resting solely on opinion and theory for its support. All those nations which have carried commerce and manufactures to the greatest extent, have judged it expedient to protect their citizens against foreign competition. No government has been more vigilant and rigid in this particular than that of England—a policy which it has steadily pursued for ages, and which has been crowned with unexampled success. While the same principles continue to be persevered in by other nations, a contrary practice on the part of the United States would subject us to a species of colonial dependence, rendering us at once the victim of our own liberality, and a prey to foreign cupidity and caprice.

Your petitioners would endeavor to avoid encroaching upon the time of your honorable body, by the repetition of arguments of a general nature, which have been often urged, and which must readily occur to every reflecting mind; but deeming the subject of primary importance in a national point of view, and deeply affecting their individual interests, they persuade themselves it will not be considered obtrusive, succinctly to enumerate some of the particular and immediate advantages, which they conceive the country would derive from the extension of the patronage of government to the manufacture in question.

It would insure a constant and competent supply, at reasonable prices, of articles wanted for general and daily consumption, not liable to be interrupted by the hostility or injustice of foreign nations.

The internal coasting trade, which has always been considered as the most advantageous to a nation; a trade worthy to a high degree of public encouragement, would be thereby promoted and extended; and by a mutual interchange of commodities between the remote sections of our extensive country, would have a powerful tendency to bind and link together the various parts, in the bonds of reciprocal dependence and friendship.

By a portion of our population being engaged in manufactures, a market would be created at home for the productions of agriculture, nor subject to be destroyed or materially injured by the enmity or jealousies of foreign governments. This consideration is of the more importance in the present state of the world, when a general pacification has taken place between the nations of Europe, which promises to be of long duration, forbids the expectation that the productions of the United States will continue to command such high prices abroad as during the last twenty years, while those nations were engaged in the most destructive and sanguinary wars.

A sure and regular demand would be produced for a considerable portion of the cotton raised in the United States, continually augmenting with the means of manufacturing it, and the increasing consumption of the goods.

It would enlarge the field of useful industry and enterprise, and by multiplying the sources of wealth and the means of subsistence, would encourage population and emigration to our country of foreign artists and others, bringing with them the latest improvements in manufacture and the mechanic arts.

The vast capital already invested in these establishments would be preserved, and by its active and successful employment, would continue to contribute largely to the riches and prosperity of the nation.

Your petitioners would further respectfully suggest, that the cotton fabrics of India usually imported into the U. States, being of a coarse texture and cheaply made, their prime cost is very inconsiderable, and paying only an ad valorem duty, they afford but a small income to the treasury; and the loss incurred by their exclusion might, it is humbly conceived, in a great degree, if not wholly, be restored, by increasing the duty on the coarser kinds of cotton goods imported from other parts of the world.

They therefore pray your honorable body to take their case into your serious consideration, and that a law may be passed prohibiting the importation of all cotton goods, (nankeens excepted) the production of places beyond the cape of Good Hope, and laying such duty on those of a coarse texture imported from other countries, as shall give to your petitioners the necessary protection and relief, and as congress in their wisdom may deem expedient.

And as in duty bound, will ever pray,

Taurino Cloth.

To the editor of the National Advocate—SIR, I have read with peculiar pleasure, your various numbers on domestic manufacture, and believe they cannot fail to interest every American who peruses them, as they contain irrefutable truths of as deep importance to our national independence as to the individuals concerned therein.

I confess, however, that I was not a little disappointed in finding you pass over, without notice, the Taurino Cloth Manufacture. You, perhaps, sir, are unacquainted with it: if so, let me recommend it to your notice, and that you indulge yourself with a visit to Rahway, New-Jersey, where you will see the establishment of Mr. Shotwell and others. This cloth is made from the hair of hides collected at the various tanneries, with a small mixture of wool. You will see the advantage gained by this invention, and the useful employment of an article hitherto most commonly thrown away, at a glance; and if you are so lucky as to find Mr. Shotwell at the factory on your visiting it, I am convinced you will be treated with all the attention which was experienced by yours, &c.

A Friend to Improvements.

We were unacquainted, until a few days ago, with the Taurino manufacture alluded to in the foregoing communication. Although we have not availed ourselves of a visit to Rahway, we have visited the agents and proprietors in this city, and have been much pleased with their exhibition of cloths and carpetings. The finish of stamping and coloring will render their carpeting an article of choice and beauty; but their cloth was more the subject of our admiration; it contains, we are told, but one-fourth part wool, the rest is hair; and as a coarse warm clothing it has many advantages; cheapness and durability will be found among them, and it possesses a property of repelling water which wool alone has not.

We consider, that for sailors' jackets in stormy weather, and for our Indian supplies, these cloths will be found a valuable and economical substitute for many of our importations. We were informed by Mr. Shotwell, that the opinion of that great and good man, our reverend squire, Mr. Jefferson, had been received regarding them, and we requested a copy of the letter for the purpose of laying it before the public. We give it in preference to any remarks of our own.

MONTICELLO, Feb. 10, 1814.

Messrs Shotwell and Kinder,

"Your favor of December 24th came but by our last mail, and with it the piece of cloth made of wool and hair, which you were so kind as to send me. I pray you to accept my thanks for this present, which, while it is an acceptable mark of good will, shows also how important a resource we have in an article, hitherto mostly thrown away, towards supplying our stock of wool not yet quite equal to our wants. Although our flocks of sheep are multiplying rapidly in this state, they are still so far short of what are necessary for clothing our laborers, that we are obliged to mix half cotton in their clothing. This has, by no means, the substance you give with hair.

"I rejoice in this progress towards a real independence; and while I hope a permanent support to those generally to whose spirited enterprise we are likely to be indebted for it, I add sincere wishes for success to your particular exertions; and with a repetition of my thanks, I tender the assurances of my respect.

TH: JEFFERSON.

We shall only further state, that we understand that this establishment has obtained a charter, with the capital of 400,000 dollars, and that, at the present infancy of the establishment, it is capable of delivering 500 yards of this cloth per day. Is not this an improvement worthy of public and national patronage? Unless we could place the cloth before the eyes of our readers, we could not pretend to convince them, that, from the hair of oxen, together with a small mixture of wool, it could be equal to what it really is.

We may, perhaps, visit Rahway, and be enabled, on a future day, to say more on this subject, which we really consider a national improvement, and does credit to America for the ingenuity which brought it to its present perfection. Nat. Adv.

Defence of New-York.

Report of the committee of defence to the common council, November 6, 1815

The committee of defence having completed the duties assigned them by the common council in the summer of the last year, in relation to the defence of this city, beg leave now to lay before them a brief report of their proceedings.

On being furnished by brigadier general Swift, of the corps of engineers, with a plan for the defence of the city against the then expected attack, the committee immediately took the necessary steps to have it executed and completed. The plan embraced—first, a line of defence on Long Island from the Wallabout to Gowane's creek, enclosing completely the peninsula on which the village of Brooklyn is situated; next, a line of defence at Harlem, from Benson's Point, at the mouth of Harlem creek, across the Island to the Hudson river, in the neighborhood of Manhattanville; also, works of defence at Hellgate and Sandy Hook, to defend those approaches to the city; at Williamsburg, on the Long Island shore, to secure that position, between Brooklyn and Hellgate; and at Prince's Bay, to prevent a landing in the rear of the works on Staten Island. The principal works at Brooklyn were, forts Greene, Cummings, Firemen, Masonic and Lawrence, connected together by lines of intrenchment, and fort Swift, a strong detached position within the line, commanding its whole extent, and also covering the fortifications on Governor's Island. The principal works at Harlem were, forts Clinton and Fish, and Nutter's battery, near McGowan's Pass, with a line of towers, or block-houses, Nos. 1, 2, 3 and 4, along the Ridge; and then forts Laight and Horn near the Bloomingdale road, with an intrenched line extending towards the North river. These works, including those at Benson's Point, on Mill rock, and at Hallett's Point, seemed to form a complete northern line of defence against any, but an overwhelming force.

The accomplishment of a plan of defence so extensive might easily be supposed to require immense labor, and the expenditure of vast sums of money.

The committee finding, from the embarrassed state of the finances of the general government, that little, or no assistance could be expected from that quarter, and that the extensive works, with the various other preparations of defence, must chiefly depend on the energies of the city, determined immediately to make an appeal to the patriotism of their fellow citizens, for that aid and co-operation, and for those extraordinary efforts, which the alarming crisis of affairs appeared to demand. They made the appeal; and, as they fondly anticipated, it was not made in vain:—their fellow citizens, of all ages and classes, eagerly stepped forward to meet the crisis, and cheerfully afforded the requisite aid of personal labor, and pecuniary contributions; the spirit of party seemed to be banished for a season, and the only rivalry among them was, who should be foremost in the patriotic work. It is believed that more than 100,000 days labor were voluntarily bestowed by our fellow-citizens on the fortifications of the city. In addition to their efforts, much and very important aid was received from the inhabitants of Long Island, and the other neighboring counties. The spirit which animated the citizens of New-York, spread to the state of New-Jersey; large companies of the yeomanry of that sister state, from the distance of thirty or forty miles, offered their services, and frequently wrought with fidelity upon the fortifications of Brooklyn and Harlem, rendering very important aid in the progress and completion of the works.* The defences progressed with great rapidity, and the patriotism of our fellow citizens, in contributing personal labor, saved to the government immense sums of money, which the works would otherwise have cost.

The committee soon found, that the superintendence of the works, the arranging of the fatigue parties, and the various other concerns, incident to the defence of the city, which were daily multiplying on their hands, demanded the whole of their time and attention: they accordingly determined to meet daily, for the transaction of the business committed to their charge. This they continued to do for several months, until the completion of the works, and the increased improbability of an hostile attempt during that season, in their opinion, justified a less strict attention on their part.

While the danger of invasion was imminent and increasing, the commander-in-chief of this military district made requisitions on the states of New York and New Jersey, of large detachments of their militia, for the defence and protection of this city; and the committee were informed by him, that his whole dependence was upon the patriotism of the corporation for their pay, subsistence and camp equipages, as he was entirely destitute of the means of providing even for their accommodation or subsistence. The paymaster's, the contractor's, the quartermaster's, the ordinance departments were all, in fact, destitute of money; tents, barracks and camp equipage were immediately wanted for the accommodation of the large detachments of militia thus called into service; arms and cannon were to be procured, the deficiency of ammunition was to be supplied; gun carriages were to be made or repaired; and vessels were to be purchased to form obstructions in the harbor. All these subjects, and many more, (none of which could be neglected with safety to the city) required that immediate measures should be taken to raise a sufficient sum to meet these very great and unexpected calls for money.

The committee accordingly recommended to the corporation, to borrow one million of dollars, for the purposes of defence. This recommendation being promptly acceded to, a loan was opened, and the sum required speedily subscribed, and placed at the disposal of the committee. Furnished with these means, they were enabled not only to supply the wants of the several departments, to cause the works of defence to go on with rapidity, to procure whatever might be deemed necessary for defence; but also to provide many things for the comfort and convenience of their fellow-citizens, who had left their families and domestic comforts, and who were in arms for the defence of our city.

Soon after the loan was filled, an arrangement was made with the general government, for their final assumption and payment of most of the advances, which the committee were required to make by the exigency of the times; and they have since happily effected a settlement with the treasury department, embracing all the principal expenditures and advances made by them. In virtue of this settlement the sum of $1,100,009 87 cents of the six per cent. stock of the United States has been received and placed to the credit of the corporation; also the further sum of $53,000 in treasury notes. Some few items, however, not included in the settlement, amounting to $9,265 22 cents though not yet received, are admitted by the accounting officers of the treasury and will speedily be paid; and certain others, amounting to 37,422 being for damages awarded to the proprietors of grounds occupied by the fortifications, will require legislative provision before they can be settled; these several sums, with the sum of $4,629 16 cents being the balance of cash on hand, amount to $1,204,326 25 cents making a probable gain to the corporation, of about $150,000.

The terms upon which the arrangement with the government was made, for the assumption of those advances from the dark and unpropitious appearance of our national affairs at that time, presented to the committee at first, but a faint prospect of the corporation being fully indemnified for all the money they were called upon to expend; but the times were then portentous; the safety of the city was in jeopardy, and the honour of the country, which would have been deeply tarnished by the fall of New York, left no alternative. The risk was to be encountered, though it should terminate in the loss of the whole, and the public feeling called for the sacrifice, if a sacrifice it should eventually prove to be.

The committee have reason to believe, that the vigorous efforts which were made in this city, to place it in a respectable state of defence, were the means, under Providence, of preserving it from attack; possibly from the unhappy fate of the seat of our national government. They think they will not be charged with vain boasting, when they assert their belief, that, from the strength of the works of defence, and the high state of the discipline of our patriotic militia, who had assembled to defend them, that had the enemy, at the period of their completion, ventured an attack, they would have met with as gallant a repulse as they experienced at New Orleans.

The committee avail themselves of the present occasion, respectfully to recommend to the corporation to press upon the general and state governments the propriety of adopting measures to maintain and preserve the works of defence, which now encircle the city; as, in their opinion, it would be an expensive and dangerous policy, a lavish of property, and a reflection upon the nation, to suffer the Forts, Redoubts and Batteries, so recently and so effectually erected for our defence, and upon which so much patriotic exertion has been bestowed, so soon to fall into ruin and decay, and thus return to the defenceless state in which we were in the summer of the last year. In the present state of the world, no human eye can foresee how soon this country may (which God forbid) be again involved in a state of war; but every individual can conceive how much influence our being properly prepared to receive and repulse an enemy, would have in deterring him from such violations of our rights and national honour, as might lead to so unhappy an event.

The alacrity with which the citizens of New York when called upon, seconded the efforts of their municipal authorities, must be highly gratifying to the corporation, and will be to them a sure pledge that their constituents, should any future occasion call for similar sacrifices, will not diminish the reputation which they have acquired by their great and unparalleled exertion.

The committee subjoin a general statement of their expenditures, and a copy of their minutes for the information of the common council; and submit to them the report of general Swift, which is accompanied by a portfolio of drawings of the works of defence, executed in an elegant and masterly style. They cannot close their report without expressing the high opinion they entertain of the talents and services of that excellent officer. The judgement displayed by him in the formation of his plan of defence, his zeal and indefatigable personal attention to the execution of it; and his frank and amiable deportment in his communications with the committee, excited their high respect and warm esteem; gained the confidence of their fellow citizens, and will justify the corporation in enrolling the name of brigadier general JOSEPH G. SWIFT, among the benefactors of the city of New York.

They therefore recommend that his portrait have a place in the gallery of paintings belonging to the corporation; that he be requested to sit for that purpose, and that the committee be authorised to employ some suitable and skillful artist on the occasion.

All which is respectfully submitted.

GOVERNOR'S SPEECH.

[Paragraphs on local affairs omitted.]

The general tranquility of our country since the last meeting of the assembly, calls for our devout acknowledgments of the Divine Goodness; especially when we reflect upon the distress and bloodshed with which, during the same period, other nations have been afflicted. We have had occasion indeed to be humbled under the frowns of Heaven in the unusual and destructive tempests which have recently and extensively visited our shores. In other respects our return to the various employments of peace has hitherto been as prosperous as our late multiplied embarrassments could be supposed to admit. It was not to have been expected that the pursuits of commerce, after long interruption and amidst the convulsions of the civilized world, should resume at once their former activity. But the prospects are favorable. The indication of a general peace in Europe, and what is equally satisfactory, the more enlarged views of the subject which seem to be entertained on this side of the Atlantic, afford much reason to hope that maritime enterprise will ere long receive its proper encouragement and reward. It now appears to be very generally admitted, that commerce is not only to be tolerated, but that it is even to be protected by the gradual establishment of a competent naval force. A disposition in the American people, thus to recur to the earliest policy of their government, is as gratifying to the feelings of patriotism as it is auspicious to the national welfare. We have solid grounds for believing that a steady adherence to that tried system, would rapidly reduce our present burdens, and would accomplish at no distant period, the views of the illustrious founders of the republic, in elevating it to an unrivalled state of moral and political greatness.

We look to the councils of the Union to realize these hopes. But it should be remembered that the prosperity of the nation cannot be fully attained without the instrumentality of the respective state governments.—They are the immediate guardians of the public morals, and of all those valuable interests which are dependent upon personal security and social order. On the several state authorities therefore we are principally to rely for that sound internal polity, without which the exterior grandeur of any nation, in whatever it may consist, is but the splendid covering of licentiousness or of despotism. The duties resulting from a trust of this magnitude need not be mentioned.—They will be found however not so much in swelling the number of our statutes, as in giving them a wholesome and vigorous execution. To possess the power of enacting laws involves no absolute necessity of displaying it. In a community already well organized, the wisdom of its legislature will be discovered in preserving a stable order of things, rather than in multiplying new regulations. To maintain nevertheless the several departments of government in their due operation, to remedy the evils which experience may have disclosed, and, in a word, to provide for the changes incident to all human affairs, will unavoidably demand the occasional and discreet exercise of the legislative authority.

New Jersey Manufactures.

In the legislature of New Jersey on Tuesday the 31st ult. the committee to whom was referred the petition of Charles Kinsey and others, cotton and woollen manufacturers, REPORTED—

That the pressure of the late war and the necessities of the state, which imperiously required that every description of property should bear a just proportion of the public burthens, having happily ceased, it appears to your committee reasonable and right that the relief asked for by the petitioners should be granted to those infant establishments in every part of the state. The crisis which called for their contributions found them willing contributors, and the more especially, as the prohibition of the introduction of foreign manufactures afforded them, so long as it lasted, up to the period of peace, ample protection and encouragement, and placed the means within their power. That state of things is materially changed. The assessments to which they have heretofore submitted without a murmur, must be discontinued, or by far the greater part of these young establishments must droop, languish, expire and disappear, under the too powerful competition of their rival European institutions. The triumph of the latter would throw our country back in a great degree to that state of dependence from which it was our boast and our glory to have escaped. We shall be independent in name only, if, through the discouragements or neglect of our own governments, our citizens are made thus tributary to strangers, and compelled to rely on foreign countries for so important a portion of our conveniences, or comforts and our consumption. Under these impressions, the committee feel it a duty to recommend to the house the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That in the act to be passed to raise the sum necessary for the support of government for the ensuing year, the tax heretofore laid on cotton and woollen manufactures, or on the spindles employed therein, be discontinued, and the same excised from the list of certainties or articles specifically taxed.

Read and agreed to by the house.

Weld's Travels.

In the 2d vol. of the WEEKLY REGISTER, under the head of "Travellers in America," several persons were pretty severely lashed for the falsity of their narrations, as well as their want of candor and liberality. Among them was Mr Weld; and we are happy, from his own pen, to justify what we said of his work.

From the Boston Palladium.—Isaac Weld, junr. author of a book called Travels through America, having made a number of illiberal remarks and misstatements respecting the country, wrote the following observations on a leaf of his book by way of confession and excuse.

"This book was first published in the year 1799, and I have now, for the first time since that period, read it through. Excepting the two concluding lines I find no part I do not believe to be strictly correct; but there are a great many passages which I regret ever having written, because they bear the appearance of illiberality from not being properly qualified. I have marked most of them. I remember, with great pleasure, the time I spent in America, and should be glad to visit the country again. It is extremely to be lamented that our younger days, in general, are devoted to travelling, when our judgments are not matured, nor our knowledge of mankind extensive. I should now write a very different book from the same notes, from the same materials. As to the style, I find it careless in the extreme; but in fact I never corrected the manuscript. I was so unadvised to make it a present to the publisher, Stockdale; and he, impatient to get his profit, sent it to press with all its errors, without affording me an opportunity of altering a syllable. He also printed edition after edition, without giving me any notice, until the copies were so multiplied that the emendations would have probably been little, or not at all regarded by the public. He has reaped a great harvest from the sale of it; and excepting a few impressions of the first edition, I have not had a copy to present to a friend, without purchase. The Americans, I have been informed, are dissatisfied with this work; yet I believe very few of them have read it. There are but three or four pages in all, that can offend, and I certainly wish I had never written those; indeed I sometimes regret having ever written the book. The sale has been much beyond its deserts, and I find the work has been translated into French, German and Italian; so that, much as I wish to re-model or correct, it now would be a futile task. As there is a probability, I understand, that this copy may reach America, I have written these few remarks in it, not without a wish that those who have known me in America may perchance read them. I am not lost, as many would suppose, to a sense of what there is really great and good in America, and much there is, undoubtedly, to admire and to love.

Militia Fines.

Opinion of chief justice Marshall relative to the collection of militia fines.

WILLIAM MEADE,

vs.

The deputy marshal of the Virginia district.

Motion to be discharged under a writ of Habeas Corpus.

By the return of the deputy marshal it appears that William Meade the petitioner was taken into custody by him and is detained in custody on account of the non-payment of a fine of forty-eight dollars, assessed upon him by the sentence of a court martial for failing to take the field in pursuance of general orders of the 24th March, 1813, the marshal not having found property whereof the said fine might have been made.

The court-martial was convened by the following order—

November 8th, 1813.

BRIGADE ORDERS.—A general court martial to consist of lieutenant-colonel Mason, president, &c. will convene at the court-house in Leesburg, on Friday the third day of next month for the trial of delinquencies which occurred under the late requisition of the governor of Virginia and secretary of war for militia from the county of Loudon.

(Signed)

HUGH DOUGLASS,

Brig. gen. 6th Brig. of Va. M.

The court being convened, the following proceedings were had. It appearing to the satisfaction of the court that the following persons of the county of Loudon were regularly detailed for militia duty and were required to take the field under general orders of March 24th, 1813, but refused or failed to comply therewith, whereupon this court doth order and adjudge, that they be each severally fined the sum annexed to their names, "to wit, William Meade $48." On the part of the petitioner the obligation of this sentence is denied.

1st. Because it is a court sitting under the authority of the state, and not of the United States.

2d. It has not proceeded according to the laws of the state, nor is it constituted according to these laws.

3d. Because the court proceeded without notice.

1. The court was unquestionably convened by the authority of the state and sat as a state court. It is however contended that the marshal may collect fines assessed by a state court for the failure of a militia man to take the field in pursuance of orders of the president of the United States. The constitution of the United States gives power to congress to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the union, &c. In the execution of this power, it is not doubted that congress may provide the means of punishing those who shall fail to obey the requisition made in pursuance of the laws of the union, and may prescribe the mode of proceeding against such delinquents, and the tribunals before which such proceedings should be had. Indeed it would seem reasonable to expect that all proceedings against delinquents should rest on the authority of that power which had been offended by the delinquency. This idea must be retained while considering the acts of congress. The first section of the act of 1795 authorises the president, "whenever the United States shall be invaded, or in imminent danger of invasion" to call forth such number of the militia of the state or states most convenient to the place of danger or scene of action as he may judge necessary to repel such invasions and to issue his orders for that purpose to such officer or officers of the militia as he may think proper."

The 5th section enacts "that every officer, non-commissioned officer or private of the militia who shall fail to obey the orders of the president of the United States in any of the cases before recited, shall forfeit a sum not exceeding one year's pay and not less than one month's pay to be determined and adjudged by a court martial." The 6th section enacts "that courts martial for the trial of militia shall be composed of militia officers only."

Upon these sections depends the question whether courts martial for the assessment of fines against delinquent militia men should be constituted under the authority of the United States or of the state to which the delinquent belongs. The idea originally suggested that the tribunal for the trial of the offence should be constituted by or derive its authority from the government against which the offence had been committed, would seem to require that the court thus referred to in general terms, should be a court sitting under the authority of the United States. It would be reasonable to expect that if the power were to be devolved on the court of a state government, that more explicit terms would be used for conveying it. And it seems also to be a reasonable construction, that the legislature when in the 6th section providing a court martial for the trial of militia held in mind the offences described in the preceding section and to be submitted to a court martial. If the offences described in the 5th section are to be tried by a court constituted according to the provisions of the 6th section, then we should be led by the language of the section to suppose that congress had in contemplation a court formed of officers in actual service, since the provision that it "should be composed of militia officers only" would be otherwise nugatory. This construction derives some aid from the act of 1814, by that act courts martial for the trial of offences such as that with which Mr. Meade is charged are to be appointed according to the rules prescribed by the articles of war. The court in the present case is not appointed according to those rules. The only argument which occurs to me against this reasoning grows out of the inconvenience arising from trying delinquent militia men who remain at home by a court martial composed of officers in actual service. This inconvenience may be great and well deserves the consideration of congress—but in so construing a law as to devolve on courts setting under the authority of the state a power which in its nature belongs to the United States. If however this should be the proper construction, then the court must be constituted according to the law of the state.

On examining the laws of Virginia, it appears that no court martial could be called for the assessment of fines on the trial of privates not in actual service. This duty is performed by the courts of enquiry, and a second court must sit to receive the excuses of those against whom a previous court may have assessed fines, before the sentence becomes final or can be executed. If it be supposed, that the act of congress has conferred the jurisdiction against delinquent militia privates on court martial constituted as those are for the trial of officers, still this court has proceeded in such manner that its sentence cannot be sustained.

It is a principle of natural justice, with which courts are never at liberty to dispense, unless under the mandate of positive laws, that no person shall be condemned unheard, or without an opportunity of being heard.

There is no law authorising courts martial to proceed against any person without notice, consequently such proceeding is entitled unlawful. In the case of the courts of enquiry sitting under the authority of the state, the practice has, I believe prevailed to proceed in the first place without notice, but this inconvenience is in some degree remedied by a second court, and I am by no means prepared for such a construction of the act as would justify rendering this sentence final without substantial notice, but be this as it may, there is a court martial, not a court of enquiry, and no laws exist authorising a court martial to proceed without notice. In this case the court appears so to have proceeded; for this reason, I consider its sentence as entirely nugatory, and do therefore direct the petitioner to be discharged from the custody of the marshal.

Dinner to Mr. Clay, &c.

A public dinner was given to Mr. Clay, late one of our envoys at Ghent, by his fellow citizens of Lexington, Ky. on the 7th ult. After the cloth was removed, the usual number of toasts were drank, which, though highly characteristic of gallant Kentucky, are omitted, as our object is simply to record what Mr. Clay said on that occasion.

The 6th toast was—"Our able negotiators at Ghent—Their talents for diplomacy have kept pace with the valor of our arms in "demonstrating" to the enemy that these states will be free."

Mr. Clay here rose, and said that he felt himself called on by the sentiment just expressed, to return his thanks, in behalf of his colleagues and himself. He did not, and was quite sure they did not, feel that in the service alluded to, they were at all entitled to the compliment which had been paid them. They could not do otherwise than reject the demand made by the other party, and if their labors finally terminated in an honorable peace, it was owing to causes on this side of the Atlantic, and not of any exertion of theirs. Whatever diversity of opinion may have existed as to the declaration of the war, there were some points on which all might look back with proud satisfaction. The first related to the time of the conclusion of the peace. Had it been made immediately after the treaty of Paris, we should have retired humiliated from the contest, believing that we had escaped the severe chastisement with which we were threatened, and that we owed to the generosity and magnanimity of the enemy what we were incapable of commanding by our arms. That magnanimity would have been the theme of every tongue, and of every press abroad and at home. We should have retired unconscious of our own strength, and unconscious of the utter inability of the enemy, with his whole undivided force, to make any serious impression upon us. Our military character, then in the lowest state of degradation, would have been unretrieved. Fortunately for us, Great Britain chose to try the issue of the last campaign. And the issue of the last campaign has demonstrated, in the repulse before Baltimore, the retreat from Plattsburgh, the hard fought actions on the Niagara frontier, and in that most glorious day, the 8th of January, that we have always possessed the finest elements of military composition, and that a proper use of them only was necessary to ensure for the army and militia a fame as imperishable as that which the navy had previously acquired.

Another point which appeared to Mr. C. to afford the highest consolation was, that we fought the most powerful nation, perhaps in existence, single-handed and alone, without any sort of alliance. More than thirty years had Great Britain been maturing her physical means, which she had rendered as efficacious as possible, by skill, by discipline, and by actual service. Proudly boasting of the conquest of Europe, she vainly flattered herself with the easy conquest of America also. Her veterans were put to flight or defeated, while all Europe (he meant the government of Europe) was gazing with cold indifference, or sentiments of positive hatred of us, upon the arduous contest. Hereafter no monarch can assert claims of gratitude upon us, for assistance rendered in the hour of danger.

There was another view of which the subject of the war was fairly susceptible. From the moment that Great Britain came forward at Ghent with her extravagant demands, the war totally changed its character. It became as it were a new war. It was no longer an American war, prosecuted for redress of British aggressions upon American rights, but became a British war, prosecuted for objects of British ambition, to be accomplished by American sacrifices. And what were those demands? Here, in the immediate neighborhood of a sister state, and territories, which were to be made in part the victims, they must have been felt, and their enormity justly appreciated. They consisted of the erection of a barrier between Canada and the United States, to be formed by cutting off from Ohio and some of the territories, a country more extensive than Great Britain, containing thousands of freemen, who were to be abandoned to their fate, and creating a new power, totally unknown upon the continent of America: Of the dismantling of our fortresses, and naval power on the lakes, with the surrender of the military occupation of those waters to the enemy, and of an arrondissement for two British provinces. These demands, boldly asserted, and one of them declared to be a sine qua non, were finally relinquished. Taking this view of the subject, if there be loss of reputation by either party, in the terms of the peace, who has sustained it?

The effects of the war, were highly satisfactory. Abroad our character, which at the time of its declaration, was in the lowest state of degradation, was raised to the highest point of elevation. It was impossible for any American to visit Europe without being sensible of this agreeable change, in the personal attentions which he receives, in the praises which are bestowed on our past exertions, and the predictions which are made as to our future prospects. At home, a government, which, at its formation, was apprehended by its best friends and pronounced by its enemies to be incapable of standing the shock of war, is found to answer all the purposes of its institution. In spite of the error which had been committed (and errors had undoubtedly been committed) aided by the spirit and patriotism of the people, it is demonstrated to be as competent to the objects of effective war, as it had been before proven to be to the concerns of a season of peace. Government has thus acquired strength and confidence. Our prospects for the future are of the brightest kind. With every reason to count on the permanence of peace, it remains only for the government to determine upon military and naval establishments adapted to the growth and extension of our country and its rising importance, keeping in view a gradual but not burthensome increase of the navy. To provide for the payment of the interest, and the redemption of the public debt, and for the current expences of government. For all these objects, the existing sources of the revenue promises not only to be abundantly sufficient, but will probably leave ample scope to the exercise of the judgment of congress, in selecting for repeal, modification or abolition, those which may be found most oppressive, inconvenient or unproductive.

The 13th, and last toast was—"Our guest Henry Clay—We welcome his return to that country, whose rights and interests he has so ably maintained at home and abroad."

Mr. Clay rose, and in a few words thanked the company for their kind and affectionate attention. His reception had been more like that of a brother than a common friend or acquaintance, and he was utterly incapable of finding words to express his gratitude. He compared his situation to that of a Swedish gentleman, at a dinner given in England by the Society of Friends of Foreigners in Distress. A toast having been given complimentary to his country, it was expected, as is usual on such occasions, that he should rise and address the company.

The gentleman, not understanding the English language, rose under great embarrassment, and said, "Sir, I wish you to consider me a foreigner in distress."—"I wish you, gentlemen, (said Mr. Clay, evidently much affected) to consider me a friend in distress."

Foreign Articles.

The scraps of foreign news which have reached us since our last, are of little importance. But the following items are of some interest.

By our latest advices from Paris, the public mind appears excessively agitated by the devastations and impositions on France by the allies, especially the Prussians, with whom there is almost every day some disturbance. The old ministry of France have retired—and a complete change has been made. The king, in every respect, mental as well as corporeal, appears very weak and feeble, and exceedingly depressed in spirits. Those on whom the crown will "legitimately" descend are unpopular and hated; and there is a talk of raising the duke of Orleans to the throne, when the present incumbent is removed. Serious differences are said to exist between the English and Prussians, who do not treat each other with common civility, which extends even to the commanders in chief of the respective forces—the reason is not assigned. Louis has not yet organized a new army, and it is said he will hardly be able to do it, without a conscription. The public places, the museum, &c. are despoiled and desolated by the Prussians, and the provinces are ravaged wherever the allied troops pass.

The Prussian officers in Paris omit no opportunity to retort with interest upon the French officers their former conduct in Berlin. In the coffee houses they will not suffer any French officers to be attended to before them. In the theatres they will not permit any places to be kept for company excepted, whilst they are in want of a seat.

At Madame Catalan's benefit, a party of Prussian officers took possession of places intended for others. The police was called in, and a fracas ensued, but the Prussians ultimately kept possession.

Generals Caesar and Constantin Faucher, brothers, have been tried by a military tribunal in France, for a conspiracy against the king, and sentenced to be executed. They were executed at Bordeaux, agreeably to their sentence, on the 23th of September.

The archduchess Maria Louisa (Bonaparte's late empress) by a formal act, has renounced, for her own person and that of her son, every title of majesty, and all pretensions whatever to the throne of France. She will hereafter take the titles of archduchess of Austria and duchess of Parma; her son will be called the hereditary prince of Parma.

By a letter from Bordeaux under date of the 30th September, (says the Democratic Press) we learn that much sensation has been excited in Paris the preceding week, in consequence of the following circumstance. Louis XVIII. had ordered an historical play, and was in the royal box attending to the performance, when the young heir apparent was crowned on the stage, and upon the instant the audience, as though animated by one will, shouted with one accord, vive le Napoleon the second. The king immediately retired from his box. Scenes of a similar nature are frequent, not only in the streets of Paris, and under the windows of the Tuilleries, but in various parts of France.

The Floridas. A report prevailed in London

September 14, that the Floridas had been ceded to Great Britain by Spain. See below.

Major general Proctor has been publicly reprimanded for his conduct in Upper Canada, and lieutenant Mullins has been broken for his behaviour at New Orleans.

The plague is at Mecca, and it is said that 70,000 had fallen victims to that cruel disorder by the last of June.

Bonaparte. Captain Maitland, (says a London paper of Sept. 16) commanding the Bellerophon, arrived at London on Thursday, and delivered to sir Hudson Lowe, the new governor of St. Helena, 4000 pieces of gold found among the articles that appertained to Bonaparte. It is said that the governor will take care of that money for the purpose of giving it to its owner in such proportions as will not endanger the safe keeping of his person.

We have a copy of the instructions of the British government to the admiral and general who is to command at St. Helena—they are too long for insertion in this number from the late hour at which they were received. They appear pretty liberal in some respects, though exceedingly strict to prevent all chance of escape. The last article of these instructions is as follows:

"If he should fall seriously sick, the admiral and general are each to appoint a physician to attend him together with his own physician, and to report daily the state of his health. If he should die, the admiral is to send his body over to England."

It is reported that Lucien Bonaparte's wife has been assassinated near Rome.

Ney has been permitted to see his friends.

A treaty of commerce between England and France is spoken of. It is also said that the latter has agreed to abolish the slave trade. Happy for mankind, would it be, if the allied princes exerted themselves as much to protect the white as the black people from slavery!

Some of the French fortresses still appear to hold out.

The allied armies.—A London paper of September 15, says—The force of the allied troops now in the territory of France is stated to be as follows:—

Austrians	250,000
Prussians	230,000
Russians	200,000
English, Hanoverians, &c. under the command of the duke of Wellington	80,000
Bavarians, Württembergers, &c.	132,000

In all 890,000

If we include the staff officers and persons belonging to the retinue of the sovereigns, the suits of the generals, and officers, &c. the number of the allies in France will amount to near 1,000,000.

Treaty with France. London September 15—Hamburg, Dutch, and Flanders mails arrived this morning. Another version of the terms on which peace is, or is to be made, is circulated at Brussels. The integrity of France will, it is said, be respected, with these exceptions:—

Savoy	to be ceded	to Sardinia,
Porentruy		to Basle,
Landau		to Germany,
Part of Luxemburg, Namur, Hainault, and some fortresses in French Flanders		to Belgium.

France to pay the expenses of the war; to restore all her plunder in the works of arts, &c; and to maintain 200,000 allied troops in her principal fortresses till the conditions are fulfilled, for which two years are allowed. We give this statement merely as we find it.

Mr. Brougham, (says the London Statesman) will take a conspicuous part at next session of Parliament, in bringing before that body the treatment of Napoleon by the British ministry.

It was rumored at Paris on the 21st September, that the emperors of Russia and Austria and the king of Prussia, were to leave that city in a few days.

French stocks—5 per cents. 28 f. 25; bank shares 1002 f. 500.

Austrian credit. Accounts from Vienna state the general stagnation of commerce throughout that monarchy. The depreciation of the public funds is such, that there is paid 338 florins treasury notes, and 1690 florins bank notes, for 100 florins cash.

New French ministry—appointments by the king. Of foreign affairs—the duke de Richelieu, peer of France.

Of war—the duke of Feltre, peer of France.

Of marine and of the colonies—viscount Dubouca, lieutenant general.

Of the interior—count Vau Blanc, prefect of the department of the mouths of the Rhone.

Of general police—the Sieur de Cazes, counsellor of state.

His majesty has not yet disposed of the places of minister of justice and of finances.

The king has created M. Lynch, mayor of Bordeaux, a member of the house of Peers.

The Sieur de Montchemu, colonel, is appointed commissary to the island of St. Helena—to watch over Bonaparte.

Fouche has been banished, under the character of ambassador to Saxony. What has become of the rest of the old ministers is not stated.

The military council of revision at Bordeaux have revoked the sentence of the 2d council of war, which had condemned two soldiers to be shot for hoisting the tri-colored cockade.

Postage. By a late act of the British parliament relative to the forwarding and receiving letters to and from foreign parts, it is enacted, that the postmaster general shall receive a sea postage of eight pence on every single letter brought by vessels (other than packet boats) from places beyond the seas into Great Britain, except from the Cape of Good Hope, the Mauritius, and the East Indies; two pence of which to be allowed to the captain of the vessels by which such letters are received. A penalty of two hundred pounds is inflicted on the captain who shall open any letters with which he may have been so entrusted; and he is required to forward all his letters (except those for his owners) to the post office with the least delay possible, immediately after his arrival, and to sign a declaration of their faithful delivery in the presence of the person authorized by the postmaster-general. Until this is done, and produced to the collector of the customs, he will not be permitted to report. Every letter found on board his vessel, in his own possession, in the possession of any of his crew, or of any passenger on board, subjects the person on whom, or in whose baggage it is found, to a penalty of five pounds.

STEAM FRIGATE.—We are induced to insert the following account of our steam frigate, from the London Pilot, as well to shew the formidable character, she bears as to say, that, beyond all doubt, there is a far better, and most probably a perfectly accurate detail of all the particulars that belong to her, in the office of the British admiralty. Our courtesy is such that we have nothing curious that we do not delight to shew the British officers who honor us with visits, though the fact is notorious that in peace they act the part of ENEMIES by taking plans of all the works and places they see, by standing orders from their superiors. This is a fact that cannot be too seriously impressed on the minds of all our officers, having charge of vessels, forts, &c.

"The following is given as a correct description of the steam-frigate, lately launched at New-York: Length on deck 300 feet, breadth 200 feet; thickness of her sides 13 feet, of alternate oak plank and cork wood; carries 44 guns, four of which are 100 pounders; waist-guns 60 pounders, quarter-deck and fore-castle guns 42 pounders. In case of any attempt to board in action, the machinery is so admirably contrived as to enable her to discharge on her adversary's decks, 100 tons of boiling water per minute, at the same time that it brandishes 300 cutlasses with the utmost regularity over her gun-wales, and works an equal number of heavy iron pikes of great length, darting them from her sides with prodigious force, and withdrawing them every quarter of a minute."

From Hamburg papers.—They write from Paris (August 25) that there is at Draguignan (in Province, near Frejus) a secret society of Bonapartists, which has been lately discovered and the place of their meeting shut up. At their meetings was displayed a flag on which was written: The Emperor or Death. Several of the members have been imprisoned. There are many similar societies in other parts of France.

On St. Louis's day, the house of a schoolmaster at Paris was illuminated with the following grammatical inscription: "Preterite: I did suffer, thou didst suffer, he did suffer. Present: I enjoy, thou enjoyest, he enjoyeth. Future: I shall live, thou shalt live, he shall live."

The salary of the French counsellors of state in actual service is 16,000 francs ($3,200) and that of the masters of requests is 6,000 francs ($1,200) per annum.

The duchess of Angouleme on her passage through Poitiers, was greeted by the troops there with Vive l'Empereur!

Arras has surrendered to the allies.

Servia. The following is an extract of a letter from Orschow, in Servia, dated in January last:

"The news which we regularly receive from Vienna, announce to us the progressive march of the operations of the congress, which are approaching their close, however multiplied and important the objects of discussion. But such is the inconsistency inherent in human wisdom, that instead of making a selection and following the natural order in the discussion of the interests of the human race, instead of putting all that is merely secondary, or of a nature less urgent, it appears to us that they have purposely applied themselves to questions in the inverse ratio of their importance. What were the early objects of their deliberations? Discussions about precedency, conferences on the affairs of Switzerland, confidential debates on matters public and notorious, altercations about Saxony before the state of Germany was understood, transactions as to Poland which were so many displays of force with a view of avoiding explanation; on all hands protestations of fidelity and magnanimity, bitter reproaches on the disproportion of sacrifices, gigantic pretensions decorated with the name of legiti-mate re-constructions—in fine, discussions on the abolition of the slave trade. Here an involuntary indignation takes possession of every honest man, of every well regulated mind.——The august council of sovereigns, the fathers of the European family, are occupied at Vienna, with the fate of the negroes of Congo and of the coast of Guinea; they extend even to them their generous solicitude! But that the feeling of admiration may not be interrupted, we must take care not to look around us. We must not listen to the groans of an unfortunate nation, whom the Turks are exterminating and mowing down by thousands, not more than four days journey from Vienna! We must avert our looks, we must not enquire into what is passing in Servia. All compassion is reserved for the negroes, and none for the Servians. The ferocious musselmenn massacre, impale them, violate their women and children, compel them to abjure the religion of their fathers, and convert, with insatiable barbarity, all that flourishing country into one vast and gloomy tomb. The bones of the Servians strew their native soil; the corpses of their bravest warriors, pierced with pious wounds, cover the banks of the Danube; burial is denied them, and their still palpitating limbs are devoured by dogs and wild beasts—the towns in ashes, the villages burnt and smoking, the churches profaned, thrown down, destroyed, the priests delivered up to the most horrible punishments—such is the frightful contrast which Servia presents by the side of the brilliant fetes and tumultuous pomp of the congress. Ye, who represent the interests of Europe, if you arrest not the torrent in its course—if you look on with indifference, and see your children sacrificed—if, slaves to abject passions and criminal jealousies, you permit a falling edifice to be cemented with the blood of Christians—if you entertain the idea of saving an empire marked with the seal of reprobation, woe to you, to your dynasties and alliances.”

AMERICAN BRAVERY.—From a late Irish Magazine.

We have to congratulate our unhappy countrymen, who cannot find securities for Mr. Grattan, nor repose under Sir John Newport's rocking statute, that their destined country, their asylum, has again triumphed over another nation of pirates. The gallant Decatur, commanding an American squadron in the Mediterranean, engaged a superior force of Algerines, on the coast of Spain, on the 20th of June; and after an action of two hours, the invincible republicans succeeded in completely defeating the minor or second rate sea-robbers. The admiral was killed, and his ship, the Mezoura, of 40 guns, was sent to New-York to sport the captured crescent, with the Union jack of her fellow sufferer, the Macedonian. Another large vessel was drove ashore, where the crew attempted to escape, but the Spanish peasants collected the fugitives and restored them to the gallant conquerors. Tipperary people! arise from your police cradles, shake off the cords that bind you to your pallets, by the laws of Alfred, take your children to the country of Franklin, where there are no Grattans to demand securities for leave to breathe, nor Newport's to put you to sleep with the bayonet, nor spectacles made by oppressors to look down your chimnies; nor ev-droppers employed to catch the conversation of your children. [In part incorrect. The ship was restored.]

Dublin, September 7. State of the country.—We learn from various communications the lamentable fact, that a general and alarming commotion is rapidly spreading throughout the county of Tipperary, proceeding chiefly from the consequences of the tythe system, combined with the present general distress. In open day, the country is traversed by armed bands from 15 to 25 in number; night increases the number to hundreds, and they seem abundantly supplied with fire arms.

In almost every parish within fifteen miles circuit of Cashel, the people refuse to submit to the recent acreable charges, and have, it is said, unanimously resolved to pay no higher tythes than two shillings per acre. This offer not being accepted, the people are every where setting out the tythes of their corn, hay, potatoes, “in kind,” and under circumstances of alarming exasperation.

The high sheriff has, it is said, written pressing letters to government for a large increase of the military force in the county of Tipperary, and announced his utter inability to cope with the insurgent bands now at open war with the tythe system, and spreading terror throughout the land.

[The poor oppressed people have little hope of any good effects from resistance. The priest of Baal are too powerful to be moved by partial risings. May the people of the three kingdoms, in one body, exert their strength, and put down—down forever, the wretches that fatten on their blood and sweat! “Perish the invaders” of the poor man's field!]

Mentz, September 12. Jerome Bonaparte is at Gopfinger, where he will remain until the castle of Elwanging is prepared for his reception. He is treated with the usual respect shown to princes.

Paris, August 18. Yesterday 10,000 muskets were to have been delivered from the magazine at Vincennes, to two Russian commissioners: it appears that these arms are given to Russia by a particular arrangement. The two commissioners presented themselves, in fact, to receive the arms in question, but retired without taking them in consequence of a discussion in which neither they nor the commandant of the castle had any share. [This probably means a resistance by the people, which the free press of Paris dares not to state.]

The two preceding days 15,000 muskets and 87 pieces of cannon were delivered to the English and Prussian troops. The portion reserved for Russia is, it is said, all that remains now to be given out. After the completion of the delivery, the blockade of the castle of Vincennes will be raised, and that fortress will be included in the capitulation of Paris.

Eleventh Military Division.—Copy of the letter written by the count de Labisval, lieutenant-general of the armies of his catholic majesty, general-in-chief of the left, grand cross of the military order of St. Ferdinand, to the most excellent lord the count de Viomenil, general-in-chief of the 11th military division:

Head-quarters, Ustaritz, 3d Sept. 1815.

M. General—I have received the official news which announces to me that the army of the right, under the orders of general Castanos, has withdrawn itself from the French territory; and, conformably to what I had the honor of offering to your excellency, the troops which are under my orders, have this day commenced to put themselves in motion: to-morrow they will commence re-entering Spain, and on the 6th of this month, the evacuation of the French territory will be entirely completed.

The conduct of the army which I command has been conformable to the orders which I received from my sovereign, and to the friendship which reigns between the two nations.

Notwithstanding the menaces which some local authorities have indiscreetly lavished, the good discipline of my troops has not been impaired. The Spanish soldiers have lived like brethren and faithful allies with the pacific Frenchmen. The horrors which have been committed in their country by the satellites of Bonaparte, have excited in their bosoms no other impression than the desire of manifesting to the world that their hearts are incapable of entertaining any feelings of vengeance, and that the same arms which have chased away those hordes of wretches are disposed to unite themselves with the troops of Louis XVIII. to maintain together the sacred, the august family of the Bourbons.

I hope that for the future it will not be necessary, and I very sincerely desire that his majesty Louis 18th may not have hereafter to repent of his being deprived of the succor of 60,000 Spaniards, who would have considered and defended his cause as their own, and who will always serve as a prompt support to good Frenchmen.

I have the honor to be, with very particular regard, your excellency's very humble and most obedient servant,

The count DE LABISVAL.

Rennes, Sept. 14.—Gen. count Taubentz, commanding the 6th corps of the Prussian army, has made a requisition on this city, to be furnished in three days, of the following articles:

480,000	rations of bread
240,000	" fresh meat
15,000	" salt meat
45,000	" rice
90,000	" onions and other vegetables
45,000	" butter and lard
240,000	litres of beer
120,000	" wine
24,000	" brandy
15,000	lbs. of tobacco
60,000	bushels of oats
360,000	weight of hay and straw.

London, Sept. 15. Our foreign exchange, has risen considerably, and is now almost as favorable as during the last peace. In Holland it is almost at par. In France and at Hamburgh, it is still a little below, but as on the one side they reckon according to the value of gold, and on the other according to that of silver, we cannot have a par completely exact. It had besides been calculated that the payment of the subsidies to the foreign powers and the expenses of our troops upon the continent, would have a very unfavorable effect upon our exchange; but, by the manner in which these payments have been arranged, that effect has been scarcely sensible. The lowest price of gold during the peace of 1814, was between 4*l*. 5*s*. and 4*l*. 6*s*. sterling per oz. except doubloons, which were at one time at 4*l*. 3*s*. Gold is now quoted at 4*l*. 1*s*.; doubloons at 4*l*. 4*s*. Silver has never been lower than 5*s*. 7*d*. and that is now its present price. The quantity entered for exportation on Tuesday last, was 96 ingots of gold, weighing 44,445 ounces. In this sketch of the state of exchange, we ought not to omit the great alteration that has taken place in the situation of Ireland in that respect, and which arises from the low price of its produce, grain and other articles of consumption. The exchange with Dublin and Cork, which was lately between 5 and 7, is now quoted at 11.

September 20. The officers appointed by lord Bathurst to make discoveries in Africa, and particularly to discover the course of the river Niger, which is still a problem among geographers, are, major Peddie, captain Campbell and Mr. Gondry.

London, Sept. 24.—The question of indemnity which England demands for the efforts which she made in the war of Spain, has terminated, after long discussions, by the cession of the two Floridas, east and west. But this tongue of land has no real value at the moment; it offers only sandy deserts and unhealthy coasts. There must be cities built there and harbors constructed; but even all this will give no importance to a single line of coast, while the country situated behind these coasts shall not be put in cultivation and become productive. Moreover, this belongs to the United States. When they shall have cultivated it, they will desire to possess themselves of the Floridas, which can be useful only to them. We fear then that the occupation of these two provinces will not prove, in the end, sound policy. It will even be a heavy charge to the treasury, for Spain is obliged to draw every year 151,000*l*. from Mexico, to support her establishments in the Floridas.

McCall's Ferry-Bridge.

Copy of a letter from Theodore Burr to Reuben Field bridge-builder, Waterford, New-York.

Harrisburg, Feb. 26, 1815.

Dear Sir—I can now inform you, with a considerable degree of satisfaction, that I have at length succeeded in getting up the long arch at McCall's ferry. This arch is without doubt the greatest in the world. Its length, between the abutment and pier, is three hundred and sixty feet four inches; the chord line of the arch, three hundred and sixty-seven feet. The width of the main part of the bridge is thirty-two feet; the wings of the pier spread eleven feet eight inches on each side, which makes a base of fifty-five feet four inches. At the abutment, the wings spread seventeen feet each, which makes a base of sixty-six feet. The altitude or rise of the arch is thirty-one feet. The arch is double, and the two segments are combined by king-posts seven feet in length between the shoulders, and are united to the arch by lock-work. Between the king-posts are truss-braces and counteracting braces. The arch stands firm and remarkably easy, without the least struggling in any part of the work.

It will be difficult to convey to you, by the description, the process by which we finally succeeded in surmounting the almost unconquerable difficulties opposed to its erection, not only by nature, but by all the elements combined.

In the first place, we raised it on floats lying in the water, ranged along the shore nearly a quarter of a mile below the abutment. The floats were placed at proper distances, with their ends to the shore, and on each of them were raised two bents or frames, varying in height to correspond with the curve of the arch. This made sixteen bents, on which the grand and enormous structure was raised, amidst tremendous storms and tempests, accompanied with floods and whirls and the bursting of waters. The scene at times was truly terrific. Frequently in the darkest nights we were under the necessity of going between the floats, and from one to the other, on small timbers, over a depth of one hundred feet water, in order either to shorten or lengthen out the ropes by which they were fastened, and to brace off or haul in the floats, as the water rose or fell. It took $1500 worth of ropes to stay the works against the flood and storms that we often had to contend with; and you must understand that storms of wind are much more frequent and tremendous at this place, than almost any other, owing to the great height of the mountains which closely border the river on each side.

From the time we commenced till we got the arch on the floats was ten weeks; during the whole of which time the water was never stationary, but continually either rising or falling. At one time it was twenty feet above common low-water mark; but in general it rose and fell from ten to twelve feet.

You will now observe that the arch stood lengthways up and down the river, along a shore of huge and uneven points and projections of rocks, which kept us always in jeopardy, in consequence of the rising and falling of the water, as I before observed. On the 17th of December, we had the whole in readiness to move up to the abutment, and on the same day the anchor-ice began to run a little. The next (which was the day we had fixed upon to move the arch to its place) the ice ran in still greater quantities, and about one o'clock it stopped for the space of about half a mile, and began to crowd the floats. It continued to move for more than one hundred miles above, where the river is from one and an half to two miles wide; whereas at this place you will observe it is only six hundred and nine feet in high water; and in low water the whole river runs in the space of three hundred and forty-eight feet. In this state it has been sounded by doctors Preston, Marshall and Baley, gentlemen interested in the bridge, and ascertained to be one hundred and fifty feet in depth; and it will perhaps not be improper to observe here, that taking a view of the great extent of country through which the Susquehanna runs, the number of great and almost innumerable smaller streams that empty into it in its course, there is in all probability running in this space of three hundred and forty eight, and under the long arch, at least fifteen times the quantity of water that passes under the Union Bridge at Waterford.

The ice continued to run during the 9th, 10th, and 11th, and pressed so hard against the floats that it raised up the outer ends of some two feet, others three feet; some less and some none at all; so that the scaffolding began to stand in all directions, the braces breaking and bursting out the spikes and bolts and the arch careening heavy towards the shore, touching only here and there upon the timbers which supported it; but as yet it had sustained no injury. The only chance of saving it now depended on the ice either becoming strong enough to support it, or gradually melting away so as to go off easy, without tearing the whole with it. I determined upon trying it on the ice, and on the 12th we fixed our capstan on the ice, and fastened ropes to it and to the arch to sustain it from falling, and also put some braces between it and the rocks on the shore.

From this time till Christmas we could do but little, in consequence of a thaw which took all the ice out of the river except about half a mile that first stopped; which we also expected would go, but it did not. Soon after, the weather became severe and hove in a mountain of ice upon us, the average height of which, for about a mile above and below us, was ten feet above the surface of the water at the shores. It did not, however, effect our works so much as might have been expected. The outer ends of the floats had settled down about a foot by the thaw; but this hove them up something worse than they were at first. At the same time the whole body of ice moved down, from twenty five to thirty feet, which bore so hard against the floats, that they pressed so hard against the rocks, that it broke and mashed more than half of them to pieces. Still the arch remained unhurt and the scaffolding stood beyond expectation.

On the 28th we commenced leveling the ice, in order to take the scaffolding and arch off the floats on to it. I had 18 men employed at that business; and I presume that on an average they were in, up to their arms, forty times each in one day. But it will be necessary to explain to you the nature of the ice here: It is made up of floating ice from one-fourth inch to two inches thick. It forms from fifty to two hundred and fifty miles above the bridge, where the water is not very rapid but very wide; and in some winters runs constantly, for three or four weeks, without stopping. From the head of Turkeyhill falls to within three-fourths of a mile of the bridge, a distance of about fifteen miles, there is almost one continued fall, the bed of the river abounding with rocks that break the ice very fine. The river being so long and wide above, there is an immense quantity of this ice formed, and so very narrow at the bridge, that there it becomes an immense mass of from twelve to fifteen feet deep, before it stops. When this takes place, all the ice from above drives beneath into the deep water, until it becomes from sixty to eighty feet deep; and you may, by digging down three feet, take a pole sixty feet long, and with the strength of your hands run it down the whole length, and find no termination of what is called the mush ice.

On the 29th, we began to bridge a space of about fifty feet from the floats, which was soft, in order to move the arch sideways to where the ice was stronger. It took us from the 29th to the 8th of January to prepare one-half of the arch for moving. This was Sunday; and by evening we had eight capstans, with each a double-fold tackle fast to it, and with the assistance of about fifty citizens of the vicinity we made a move of four feet.

On the morning of the 9th, we fourfolded all the capstans, except one, and moved the one-half of the arch off sideways, forty-six feet, on to the runners one hundred and eighty-five feet long. On the 10th, we fixed the cross-runners (upon which we moved it sideways) on to the runners that extended lengthways with the arch, and confined all tight together. On the 12th, in the forenoon, it rained; in the afternoon we levelled the ice for a road, before it would freeze again. The 13th, we moved the arch seventy-seven feet; the weather soft. 14th, we made some rollers; the weather still soft but snowing. 15th, had but few hands; moved the arch fifty feet, 16th, we introduced the rollers every where, and moved the arch 217 feet in three hours. 17th, made a move of upwards of 300 feet. 18th and 19th, got up the one half of the arch.

We now commenced upon the other half, which we fitted and got up in eight days. Now we wheeled to the right and left, one half of the arch to the abutment, and the other half to the pier; fitted the butts to their places; cut off the scaffold-posts at bottom, some more some less, from one to twelve inches, so as to bring the whole arch to its perfect height and curve, and then united the centre. On Monday, the 30th, about 9 o'clock at night, we had the arch every where keyed up, and on Tuesday morning it stood of itself. Along the middle way of the arch the scaffolding had fallen away six or seven inches; but less and less towards the abutment and pier. To have an idea of the cause of this, you must understand, that there is a regular ebbing and flowing in the river at this place, once in twenty-four hours, of from two to four feet, which has a proportionate effect on the ice, causing it to rise and fall from fifteen inches to two feet, which at the same time is continually working itself down stream, slowly and imperceptibly to the eye.

On Tuesday morning, as I observed, the arch supported itself. We examined every part of it, drove some keys, and made every thing tight as possible. In the afternoon, we began to cut away the scaffolding, and got down two-thirds of it before dark; then stopped an hour for refreshment, and, before we began again, had two large fires made, on each side, about sixty feet from the abutment or shore. We then set to cutting down the remaining part of the scaffolding, which was completed about half past 8 o'clock. The whole now exhibited the grandest spectacle I ever saw. Aided by the light of the fires, we could plainly see the shore, and the arch rising from the abutment and extending itself west out of sight. It was a joyful moment to my brave fellows; and you may well suppose they gave way to the impulse, in loud and repeated hurrahs. The next day was set apart as a day of rejoicing.

The centre of the arch is sixty-one feet from common low water to the lower, and seventy feet four inches to the upper segment, and fifty-two and sixty-one feet four inches from the surface of the ice when it was put on. During the whole of this struggle, the humane feelings and kind disposition of the inhabitants, for twelve to fourteen miles distance, on both sides the river, were manifested to a degree that I believe was scarcely ever equalled. They voluntarily assisted from day to day; so that from the 8th of January to the 1st February, I had of this class from forty to one hundred and twenty men every day; and none ever discovered more zeal, or behaved with more order and decorum, in any service, where the most exact discipline was rigorously enforced. They came early, staid till dark, and returned home after night. Some attended every day; whilst others at times would ride day and night to notify and bring on troops. One day we could call on Lancaster co. the next on York, and sometimes on both in the same day, and for the most part we did not want for men. To move an arch of such an enormous weight, fifty and sixty feet in the air, was no small business; and, had it not been for the friendship of these people, I almost doubt whether I should ever have effected the object.

What is perhaps remarkable, is the fact, that (although liquor was handed round in great abundance) there were but two persons, during the whole time, that were the least intoxicated. And what is still more remarkable, there was but one man that was injured; that was Augustus Stoughton. He fell fifty-four feet, hit on the braces twice, then into the water. He in a few days was again at work; and no other person hurt.

On the whole, we were from the 1st of October till the 1st of February, in doing what might have been done in four weeks of steady weather, without floods.

It is a long arch, and you have a long letter; yet it does not explain to you one-half the difficulties we had to encounter, in getting it to its destined place.

I am, sir, respectfully, yours.

THEODORE BURR.

Mr. Reuben Fields.

CHRONICLE.

GLORIOUS NEWS.—Kingston Jam. Oct. 3.—Accounts have reached this city, via Santo Domingo, of the arrival there of an American schooner, in nine days from Carthage, the master of which stated, general Morillo had been repulsed in an attack made upon Boca Chica, with the loss of 1300 killed and 300 prisoners. A number of the royalists had in consequence joined the Carthaginian army.

Three vessels had arrived at Carthage from the United States, with flour, which readily sold at 25 dollars per barrel.

Specie, Stocks, &c.—At Philadelphia, specie, American 17, Spanish 20 per cent. advance—treasury notes 6 per cent. do. Six per cent. loans 98½. At Baltimore, specie 19 a 22; treasury notes, none in the market; 6 per cent. loans 101. At Charleston, specie 9 per cent. prem. Treasury notes 2 per cent. dis. 6 per cent. Stock 90 a 100. At Boston 6 per cent. loans 82½; treasury notes 12½ dis.

New York bank notes are at 6 per cent. ad. at Philadelphia, Virginia at par, North Carolina one per cent. ad. Baltimore 3 per cent. dis. bills on Boston 118 a 120. New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore bank bills are, respectively, at 12½, 18, and 19 a 20 per cent. discount at Boston.

British in Canada.—The Boston papers, on the authority of "gentlemen from Canada" expressly contradict the reports we have had relative to an increase of the British force in that country. They say that the troops there do not exceed 10 regiments, of 500 men each.

THE CREEKS, &c. From the Georgia Argus, November 1.—We learn from a gentleman who passed through the Creek Nation last week, that the commissioners are how engaged in running the Indian boundary line, and was informed by col. Hawkins, (who had so far recovered his health as to attend with the other commissioners) that they would finish in about six weeks. Our informant further states, that the Indians had disappeared, and it was not known where they had gone—that the commissioners apprehended no danger of an attack. We fondly hope that they may not, but we have our fears.

We understand that the commissioners progress rapidly in running the line; it was expected that they would reach the Chatahoochie river, by Sunday night last.

We understand that orders have not yet been issued for detaching the militia to Fort Hawkins.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS. The exigencies of the nation, during the late war, has raised up an astonishing zeal in all parts of the United States, to secure all those advantages of roads, bridges and canals, &c. which our country so happily presents to us.

Gen. Jackson, on his journey from Tennessee to the seat of government, has every where received the most polite attentions from the people. The general appears to have won the hearts of all he associated with, by his frank and graceful manners. In the field, at the table, or in the ball-room, he seems quite at home.

French consuls.—Mr. D'Ambreucq, as consul general, to reside at Philadelphia, and Messrs. Cazeaux, Guillemin, and Couteaux, as consuls at New York, Savannah and Norfolk, have been recognized by the president of the United States.

COTTON. Extract of a letter to the editor from a friend in the Mississippi territory—"Our crops of cotton are more than half rotten—and, strange to tell, although this thing has been creeping on us for three years, our planters, merchants, philosophers and all, are unable to assign the cause."

Success to agriculture. There are no people in the world who earn money, honestly, so rapidly as our cotton, tobacco and sugar planters. Cotton, Sea-Island, 48 to 50, and short staple from 25 to 27 cents per lb.—first quality tobacco has sold as high 25¢—sugar 18 to 20¢ per cwt. at the places where they are produced. But these prices can hardly be maintained. They have given money, a southern and south-western direction.

Negotiations with Algiers, Tunis and Tripoli!

If there is any American that has the least spark of patriotism within him—any principle in his bosom that tells him he has a country—who can read the despatches from Decatur and Bainbridge inserted below, and not feel his heart glow with an honest pride, he must be made of curious "stuff" indeed! What Europe, armed cap-a-pie, has attempted for centuries; what fell jealousy and commercial baseless has prevented the accomplishment of by vast fleets and numerous armies, has been effected by a small American force, with a celerity and promptitude that cannot fail to make a lasting impression on the fears of the barbarians. Algiers, the haughty and the proud, with Tunis and Tripoli, have done more than excuse us from the odious tribute which they have for ages exacted of christendom—they have made reparation for wrongs committed, or suffered, as well as given us the best guarantee they could of good behavior in future. Whatever we required has been done—but we asked and obtained nothing but justice, and that our gallant tars would have. It is thus that, a few years hence—the man is living who will see it—this republic will negotiate with all nations for her rights, and pay her tribute, for the enjoyment of natural privileges, whether it is to be levied in the shape of duties by a British order in council, or is demanded in an annual stipend by an Algerine divan; when, from the cannon's mouth of our Independence's, Washington's, Franklin's and Warren's, Hancock's and Adams', Montgomery's and Wooster's, Pike's and Lawrence's, and enough other ships of the line, America shall seek peace in the punishment of those who violate it. Justice, simple justice, I trust, will always guide the councils of my country; and this, in due time, I doubt not, she will have the power to command.

Tunis and Tripoli have difficult affairs to settle with other pirates—let them manage it as they can or may. It is not our concern.

The following unofficial particulars are interesting:

We are charmed (says the Columbian) with the verbal particulars we have received of Decatur's negotiation and cruise.—When the officers from our sloops of war boarded the Algerine frigate, they affected to wonder that Algerines, after hoisting the bloody flag, should strike to Americans; it is no disgrace, replied the corsair, to strike our colours, since we see two British vessels captured by you, composing part of your squadron. [These were the Macedonian and Epervier.]

Commodore Decatur refused to have the treaty concluded on shore, as invited by the dey of Algiers,—or on any other spot than the quarter-deck of the Guerriere—there the Algerines agreed to pay down for spoliation,—there they gave up the American prisoners,—and there they agreed to the recognition of the civilized usage of exchanging prisoners in any future war with us.

Extract of a letter from an officer of the U. S. navy, dated "The Bay of Naples, Sept. 10, 1815.

"This being the first opportunity since we left Algiers, I use it. We left Algiers the 8th July, and on the 15th arrived at Cagliari, for water and refreshments; on the 25th sailed for Tunis, and on the following day anchored in the bay, in a fine position. The commodore immediately made his compliments to the bey, signifying to him that, as he had permitted two brigs, prizes to the United States' flag, to be taken from under his batteries by an English ship of war, contrary to the usages of war and civilized nations, he having power to resist this violation of his port; the purpose of his visit was to demand indemnity for this breach of good faith, and he would expect the indemnity to be sent on board by a given hour on the day named: the commodore sent an estimate of the value of the prizes, and although there appears to have been great consternation, the demand was promptly complied with, and the indemnity sent on board; having accomplished this service by the 2d August, we sailed for, and on the 5th anchored before Tripoli, where we had a similar ceremony to perform, and which was conducted in the same smooth, cool, decided way, without any palavar, which would leave room to doubt that we should do as we said.

The bey of Tripoli appears not to have had so much of the ready at command, but showed equal readiness with his neighbor to comply with his demand; falling short of the indemnity required, he signified that there was a Danish family in his possession, consisting of nine persons, and two other Europeans, whom he was willing to deliver up to make good the indemnity demanded; the commodore did not hesitate a moment, and we had the satisfaction to see them soon after arrive on board our squadron. I need not say how gratifying this cruise must be to every American soul, how delightful it was to see the stars and stripes holding forth the hand of retributive justice to the barbarians, and rescuing the unfortunate, even of distant but friendly European nations, from slavery.

"There is a report here that some Dutch ships of war have had a rencontre with an Algerine squadron which terminated without any thing decisive on either side; but it is very doubtful. There is also a report of the capture of several Swedish vessels by the Tripolitans and Algerines. I guess we are clear of them for some years at least; they see we are not only willing but able and determined to put them on their good behavior all along shore. If other nations do not do so, they ought to suffer. I hope our government will not think we ought to go to sleep, because our character is up."

The Guerriere, com. Decatur, and the Enterprise have arrived at New-York. Other vessels of his squadron have arrived at Newport. The whole of our force, late in the Mediterranean, may be hourly expected at various ports, except the unfortunate Epervier (of which we have no tidings) and the frigates United States and Constellation, and sloops of war Ontario and Erie, which remain for the present to observe that the treaty stipulations with the Barbary powers be rigidly adhered to.

A fleet of eleven sail of vessels of war was seen 60 miles off our coast on Sunday last. Bainbridge's squadron has, therefore, probably, all arrived.

Copy of a letter from commodore Decatur to the secretary of the navy, dated U. S. ship Guerriere, bay of Tunis, July 31, 1815.

SIR—I have the honor to inform you, that upon my arrival at this anchorage, I was made acquainted with the following transactions, which had taken place here during our late war with Great Britain.

Two prizes, which had been taken by the Abellino privateer, and sent into this port, were taken possession of by a British vessel of war, while lying within the protection of the Bey of Tunis. The consul having communicated to me information of this violation of our treaty with Tunis, I demanded satisfaction of the Bey. After some hesitation and proposing a delay of payment for one year, my demand was acceded to, and the money, amounting to forty-six thousand dollars, was paid into the hands of the consul, Mr. Noah, agent for the privateer.

I shall proceed immediately for Tripoli, and will give you early information of the further proceedings of this squadron. The Bey of Tunis has now lying in this harbor, nearly ready for sea, three frigates and several small vessels of war.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your obedient servant,

STEPHEN DECATUR.

Hon. B. W. Crowninshield, secretary of the navy.

Extract of a letter from commodore Decatur to the secretary of the navy, dated U. S. ship Guerriere, Messina, August 31st, 1815.

"I have the honor to inform you, that immediately after the date of my last communication, I proceeded to Tripoli. Upon my arrival off that place, I received from our consul a letter; in consequence of the information contained in this letter, I deemed it necessary to demand justice from the bashaw. On the next day the governor of the city of Tripoli came on board the Guerriere, to treat in behalf of the bashaw. He objected to the amount claimed by us, but finally agreed to our demands. The money, amounting to the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars, has been paid into the hands of the consul, who is agent for the privateer.

The bashaw also delivered up to me ten captives, two of them Danes, and the others Neapolitans.

During the progress of our negotiations with the states of Barbary, now brought to a conclusion, there has appeared a disposition on the part of each of them, to grant as far as we were disposed to demand.

I trust that the successful result of our small expedition, so honorable to our country, will induce other nations to follow the example; in which case the Barbary states will be compelled to abandon their piratical system.

I shall now proceed with the squadron to Carthage, at which place I hope to find the relief squadron from America."

Extract of a letter from commodore Bainbridge to the secretary of the navy, dated U. S. ship Independence, off the Bay of Tunis, September 6th, 1815.

"I had the honor of making communications to you from Carthage on the 10th ultimo, from which place I sailed with the Independence, Congress, Erie, Chippewa and Spark, destined for Tripoli, having learned that a misunderstanding existed between the bashaw of that place and our consul residing there. On my way I called at Algiers, to exhibit this additional force off there, presuming it would have some weight in preserving the peace which had just been made; for, the only mode of convincing these people is by ocular demonstration.

On my arrival off Tripoli I learned that commodore Decatur had been there with the first squadron and had adjusted our differences which existed at that place. Our consul at Tripoli informed me that the exhibiting of our naval force before Tripoli, had produced a most favorable change in the disposition of the bashaw for preserving the peace with us.

At Tripoli, learning that the bey of Tunis was restless towards the United States, I immediately proceeded with the vessels with me for that place.

On my arrival at Tunis, I learned by a letter from our consul there, that the bey and his officers were friendly disposed towards us.

Having, agreeably to your instructions, exhibited the force under my command to all the Barbary powers (and which, I believe, will have a tendency to prolong our treaties with them) I have only now, in further obedience to those instructions, to return with the squadron to the United States.

Extract of a letter from the same to the same, dated U. S. ship Independence, Malaga Roads, September 14th, 1815.

"I arrived here yesterday, under the expectation of meeting here the first squadron, but, to my regret, commodore Decatur has not yet come down the Mediterranean, and where the squadron with him is, I know not; for the last I learned of them was off Tripoli, which place they left on the 9th ultimo.

As the squadron has to return this autumn, in pursuance of your orders, it is very desirable that it should leave this sea as soon as possible, to avoid the inclemency of the winter on our coast, particularly on account of the smaller vessels. The Independence, Congress, Boxer, Saranac, Chippewa and Spark are here; the Erie I expect every hour from Malta, where I had sent her; the Torch and Lynx are at Carthage. All these vessels will be prepared immediately to return; but they cannot sail till the other squadron has joined us."

Envy, Hatred and Folly.—The opinions of the Montreal Herald of Sep. 30, on the operations of the American squadron in the Mediterranean, are absurd, ludicrous, invidious, and rancorous. We copy them for the amusement of our readers.—Columbian.

"The treaty of peace said to have been made between Algiers and the U. States, has not been officially made known in America, but both in England and France it has been spoken of by the last advices. If it be correct, mutual restitution of persons and effects have been made by both parties. In plain English, Algiers has not been at all humbled by the republicans; and if we could hear the two sides of the nature of the dispute, we might find that the Algerines have made a peace more honorable than degrading to themselves. As com. Decatur must have known the Dutch were also at war with Algiers, and having had the credit of capturing a kind of "bulk of a frigate" from the enemy; and probably finding the rest of their vessels out of reach, he wisely patched up a peace to preclude the possibility of being eclipsed by the superior talents of Mynheer, who will meet no enemy to fight. Peace will be made with the Dutch also; but Decatur will crow about being before-hand, without cause of boasting of the terms."

Flour.—American flour was selling at St. Bartholomews three or four weeks since, at from 3 to $6 per bbl.

Great Crop.—Evan Evans, esq. of Washington City, informs the editor of the FREEMAN, that last season he raised on a lot containing 1 acre 76 perches, (being part of square no. 61 in that city) eighty two bushels first quality barley. The ground and the grain were exactly and carefully measured.

The Independence 74, is thought to be the fastest sailer, on every wind, in our navy. This is really good news; to unite celerity with force is indeed a grand desideratum in naval affairs especially, and will afford something more for the information of the British, who thought they knew every thing, and were superior in every thing, belonging to shipping. She also appears so light and airy on the water, that the captain of a British frigate, who was for a considerable time in company with her, supposed she was only a large frigate.

Shipwrecks. Our papers are filled with accounts of shipwrecks. Never, perhaps, has there been so great losses on the ocean, for the same length of time, as for the three or four months last past.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER

N o. 13 of VOL. IX.] BALTIMORE, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 25, 1815. [WHOLE NO. 221.

Hæc olim meminisse juvabit.—VIRGIL.

PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, No. 29, SOUTH CALVERT-STREET, AT $5 PER ANNUM.

☞ A supplement to the present number will issue with our next, and so afford room for the conclusion of the editor's letter to Mr. Cobbett, which has extended to a greater length than was expected. The "act of the congress of Vienna," commenced in this paper, will be concluded in regular succession, as we usually manage long articles.

Handsome compliment.

It would be extreme affectation in the editor to assert, that he feels no pleasure in the many handsome things which distinguished gentlemen are polite enough to say of his work. The continued support it receives, affords a good assurance that the WEEKLY REGISTER has, in a considerable degree, met the expectations of its original friends and patrons. Though the subscription list is not quite so large as it was during one period of the war, it is more valuable, because more select, and is daily receiving additional names of the highest respectability. The industry and care that created this establishment, will, with the blessing of Providence, still sustain it.

Among the many compliments received, the following has peculiar force and beauty; and may, perhaps, be inserted without exciting an impression in the mind of any derogatory to the feelings or motives of the editor. It is extracted from a letter lately received from a gentleman who has filled one of the high offices of the republic with honor to himself and utility to his country:

"Your work is of sterling worth. It rises in merit as it progresses. Like sound Madeira, it improves by age. May your success be equal to your utmost wishes."

* * * The editor is prepared to furnish complete files of the WEEKLY REGISTER, bound or in sheets, to those who wish them. Orders, accompanied by the cash as required below, will be promptly attended to. Application must be made to the editor or his immediate agents, for the work is not in the market, nor is it likely to be. Its number is counted, and those now in hand are all that ever will be offered to the public. The stock is daily diminishing; and she only reason that exists for inviting gentlemen, at present, to purchase what they may hereafter desire and not be able to obtain, is simply this—that the capital invested in them is heavier than is convenient—and, that the money, for a part of them, could be advantageously used to give ease to the editor and his business; for he has no apprehension that they will long remain on his hands, and certainly believes that twice the number he has will be demanded in a very few years. The REGISTER is a work sui generis as to the past, and cannot be supplanted or supplied.—Gentlemen, also, may find it more expedient to take the files now, than suffer them to grow up to a value that may seriously check the desire to have them.

The conditions of the sale of complete files are absolutely these:

VOL. IX.

For the 4 years from September 1811 to September 1815,	$20
Current year in advance to Sept. 1816	5
Extra Supplements of 12 sheets each to vols. 5, 7 and 8	3

Treasury notes, or bills of most of the incorporated banks of the United States, and of many of those unincorporated, taken in payment.

The files will be sent to any part of the union as directed, at the cost of the subscriber. If in sheets, they may be sent by mail, at the common rate for newspapers; but if bound they must be forwarded in some other way. And for the future, will be delivered in volumes or weekly numbers, as preferred.

AGENT AT RICHMOND.

JOHN MADDOX is the editor's agent at Richmond, Va. and orders through him will be duly attended to; as well as the orders of his numerous agents in many parts of the United States.

Legislature of New Jersey.

TRENTON, November 6, 1815.

On Monday last Mahlon Dickerson, esq. took the oath of office as governor of the state of New-Jersey; on which occasion he delivered the following

ADDRESS:

Gentlemen of the Legislative Council,

In taking upon me the administration of the government of the state, in obedience to the will of the Legislature, I have assumed a task attended with many difficulties, and with a responsibility which fills my mind with apprehensions that my best efforts will fail to give satisfaction to those who have honored me with this distinguished mark of their confidence.

It cannot be presumed that it will be in my power, to perform the various and complicated duties attached to my office, without falling into many errors. Those errors, however, I trust will not be attributed to any culpable neglect on my part, nor to any want of devotion to the interests of our country.

It is a matter of great consolation to me, that in many of my most important duties, I have constitutional advisers, whose knowledge, judgment and experience justly entitle them to the confidence of the public; and who, from duty as well as inclination, will cheerfully give their aid in all measures calculated to promote the peace and prosperity, and to maintain the lawful rights of the state.

The manner of my appointment while it gratifies my feelings, and demands my warmest acknowledgments, affords me a pledge that I shall experience the indulgence, and the cordial and generous support, of both houses of the Legislature.

And the liberality already displayed, justifies the hope, that harmony will prevail in our councils, and that the public business will receive no detriment from the jarring of local interests, or the collision of party.

Total, $373,120,900

The number of dwelling-houses, by the returns of the assessors, subject to taxation, is 127,400, exempt from taxation, 518—averaging about nine inhabitants to each dwelling-house.

This state's quota of the United States' direct tax, viz. $360,283—would operate as a tax upon the above assessment at the rate of 31 cents and five mills upon every hundred dollars.

The Republic's Glory.

To say that we are proud of the result of the expedition against the Barbary powers, but coldly expresses what we feel on the subject. Never was any thing so decisive and complete—all done, as it were, by the mere terror of our "fir built frigates, with a bit of striped bunting at the mast-head." Who expected that justice would have been got so easily? Whose heart does not beat with pleasure that it was obtained so fully and so promptly? The humiliation of the powers of Barbary has done even more to exalt us in the estimation of the world, than our victories over their "great and good ally," and raised up for us a character that, no doubt, will be cherished as a part of the national strength.

To convey to our readers, and preserve for future use, whatever appertains to the superlative negotiation, we have collected, from various sources, the following letters, statements, &c.

From a Newport, (R. I.) paper.—We learn, from the officers of the Flambeau, [one of the squadron arrived at that port,] that the treaty concluded by commodore Decatur with the dey of Algiers, were such as com. D. thought proper to dictate.—The following, we learn, are some of the principal articles of the treaty: The dey agrees to restore the American prisoners in his possession, without ransom—to pay 10,000 dollars for the brig Edwin and cargo, of Salem, captain Smith, which he had captured three years since—to restore a cargo of cotton which he had confiscated, belonging to the Hon. Wm. Gray, of Boston—to allow the Americans to send into their ports, and dispose of them, any prizes which they should capture from any power which the United States should, in future be at war with; and they further agree, that in case any power should be at war with the United States, that power shall only have liberty to send in their prizes for supplies, and to remain only 24 hours to procure them, and not upon any consideration to have permission to dispose of the vessels or cargoes—the dey further agrees, that in case an American citizen should be taken under the flag of any other nation with whom they may be at war, he shall be immediately liberated, and given up to the consul—in case of the ship-wreck of an American vessel, the captain shall have permission to land his cargo without paying any duties, and may remain there until he has an opportunity of reshipping it; or the cargo may be disposed of, upon paying the customary duties. No presents or tribute, are in future, to be paid by the United States to the dey.

The frigate and brig captured by com. Decatur, was not restored by virtue of any article of the treaty, but given up by com. Decatur as a present, and at the earnest entreaties of the dey, who represented the danger he was exposed to from his subjects, in consequence of his having signed a treaty with such favorable terms to the United States, particularly the restoring of captain Smith and crew, without ransom, and paying $10,000 for his vessel and cargo, a condition, which the dey said, they had never before submitted to, in the case of any Christian nation whatever. The brig was, however, detained at Carthage by the Spaniards, on the ground that she was captured within their territory, they being then at war with Algiers.

The treaty with Algiers was signed on the 4th of July, and on the 6th, the brig Epervier, captain Shubrick was despatched to the United States with a copy of the treaty; her not having yet arrived, scarcely a doubt remains but that she must have foundered in the severe gales of August last.

The American squadron proceeded from Algiers to Tunis, com. Decatur having learnt that the bey had permitted an English frigate, during our war with Great Britain, to come in and take from the harbor of Tunis, two prizes which had been sent in there by the privateer Abellino, of Boston. The commodore demanded, that the bey should pay $40,000 for the two prizes which had been given up; the bey, after deliberating a short time, agreed to pay the money to the American consul, as a restitution to the owners of the privateer, for the two vessels.

From Tunis, the squadron proceeded to Tripoli, where com. D. learnt that a prize vessel had also been permitted to be taken out of their harbor by a British sloop of war, and that the American consul had been compelled to take down his flag. On the arrival of the squadron off the town, com. Decatur sent in and demanded, that the bey should pay the sum of $30,000 to the owners of the privateer, for the vessel which had been given up. The bey refused, and assembled a great number of his troops from the country to defend the batteries, and threatened to declare war immediately against the United States; but finding that the American squadron were prepared to chastise him, he then requested an abatement of the sum demanded, as he said, he had not so much money, and upon the American consul's informing com. Decatur that he should be satisfied with $25,000, the commodore agreed to receive that sum, provided the bashaw would deliver up to him ten Christian slaves, among whom was one who had been particularly attentive to the officers of the Philadelphia frigate while in Tripoli; and also, that as the American consul had been compelled to take down his flag, he should now reshoist it under a salute of 31 guns from the Bashaw's castle. The above terms were readily complied with by the Bashaw.

Commodore Decatur having thus gallantly settled all our differences with the Barbary powers, and having been joined by com. Bainbridge, to whom the command of the squadron was surrendered, the fleet proceeded to Algiers, and from thence to Malaga and Gibraltar, from which place commodore Bainbridge sailed on the 7th of October in the Independence 74, with the frigates Macedonian and Congress, 7 brigs and 3 schooners, in all 13 sail, bound to this port, where they are to remain during the winter.

From the Richmond Enquirer.—Extract of a letter to a gentleman of Richmond, dated U. S. ship Constellation, off Messina, Sept. 1, 1815—

"The only letter, I can flatter myself that has ever reached either my mother or yourself, was by the brig Epervier. As the commander's despatches were sent out by that vessel—you are now in full possession of all the circumstances relative to our treaty with the dey, and of course can say whether the treaty was such a one as you expected—or of such a nature, as was likely to give general satisfaction to the government. Though an honorable one, and on such terms that with propriety it could not be rejected—for the dey granted every demand made, still I think the commodore was rather hasty.*—Had we cruized six weeks longer we should have destroyed the whole of their navy: placed it entirely out of their power to commence for many years any depredations on our commerce, and finally made peace on the same terms we have it now. But peace with this people was certainly the most desirable object, and as we have it on our own terms, we should not complain. From Algiers we sailed for Cagliari, in Sardinia, to procure water and fresh provisions—necessaries we stood much in want of—for that most horrid complaint, scurvy, began to make its appearance in most of the vessels; and rendered our return into some friendly port of the utmost importance. This is a poor miserable place, and though I was tired after our long cruise, of the ship and sea, still I preferred being actively employed out, than remaining in Cagliari—and did not regret again putting to sea on the fourth day after our arrival, to bend our course once more towards Barbary and settle some differences with the bey of Tunis, unknown to our government when we sailed; but which the commodore took all responsibility as their representative to settle. The cause of complaint was this: During our war with England one of our privateers sent into Tunis four prizes, all of which were received and promised protection. Two were seized by the bey and sold at a reduced price, he becoming the sole purchaser, while the other two were taken out of his ports under the battery, by a British brig, and carried off. Our consul remonstrated in vain and was finally threatened with a secret visit from some of his turban'd majesty's faithful subjects, if he said any thing further on the subject.

Prudence, of course, dictated silence until an opportunity should present to do the United States justice: and as soon as our squadron arrived, he forwarded his communications to the commodore, who demanded and obtained remuneration for all the prizes. They were valued by our consul at $65,000, every cent of which his majesty paid, assuring the commodore double the amount would be paid with pleasure, rather than go to war with America. You must know the commodore had given him his choice, the money to be paid in 12 hours after the demand, or hostilities would commence.—Thus ended our difficulties with the most formidable of all the Barbary powers, and though we had no fighting, still this demand was made before their walls, in sight of six frigates, as many corvettes and brigs, with fifty gun-boats capable of acting in two harbors. As the commodore was indisposed the day the money was to be paid, captain Gordon, the second in command, was ordered to wait on the bey, received the amount and passed the necessary receipt. By this good turn of fortune, I had the pleasure of being introduced to his majesty—and seeing something of the manners of the Barbary court. To enter into every minutia respecting this visit and my sensations, &c. &c. would exceed the limits of the letter. I will therefore say nothing at present on the subject, but wait till I can in person talk over my travels, and tell you all—for I hope the time is not far distant ere I once more turn my face to the west and embrace in my native land, the only one of freedom under the sun—those friends I have left behind.

"We remained off Tunis seven days, when we again weighed anchor and stood to sea, destined on a visit to our old friend the bashaw. He like his brothers dey and bey, had taken advantage of our war with England, to seize some American vessels laying in his harbor, and sent them to Malta to be disposed of for their original owners. They were vessels sent in by our privateers, and valued by our consul at $9000. A sum painful indeed—but painful as it was, the British consul was villain enough to persuade the poor foolish old bashaw to deliver them up to him—assuring him that the people of the United States would never have it in their power to make a demand on him for the violation of the treaty. That England would destroy the whole of our navy, and that he need never fear a second American fleet off Tripoli.—How must this son of John Bull have felt when he saw our little squadron off the town—composed chiefly of vessels captured from his majesty. As there was a great degree of treachery connected with this business, the commodore demanded $50,000 for the prizes giving as usual, short time for consideration—In this he has been equally fortunate.—The money paid without the least difficulty.—Thus, my dear uncle, have we, in the space of 90 days, settled with three of the barbery powers, whipped one, and made a peace on our own terms—and exacted tribute from two others.—we left the unhealthy coast of Africa on the 7th, and once more steered for a Christian port, and arrived in Syracuse on the 10th, but was disappointed in having any intercourse with the shore, for the people who are chiefly composed of priests, are so superstitious that they will have no communication with any vessels in less than thirty days after leaving the coast of Barbary. We were again compelled to put to sea without seeing any of those curiosities this place is so celebrated for, or procure any of those necessities we so much required after our long cruise. The opening to the ear of Dionisius could be distinctly seen from our decks.—The remains of the tower of Archimedes, which it is said to have fired the Roman gallees, was also pointed out—and we had the satisfaction of procuring fresh water from the fountain of Arethusa. On the third day after entering the harbor, we were again under way, and the commodore kept the shore close on board. We had for five days a fine view of Ætna and the adjacent country—the whole coast appears to have been formed from Lava, and we passed several villages built entirely from this substance.—On the 5th day after leaving Syracuse, we entered the straits of Messina, and anchored the same evening off the town where we immediately procured pratique and are now enjoying ourselves in every pleasure a gay Sicilian town affords.—The harbor here is one of the finest in the world, when you have once entered it, but the most difficult of access.—The whirlpool of Charybdis stands immediately at its mouth, while the rock of Scylla, no less formidable, stands about five miles above the opposite shore—to avoid one, you are apt to run on board the other, and it requires the greatest skill to bring a vessel in without some accident. Though these places are dangerous, they are certainly not as formidable as represented by the ancients. We have now been here ten days, and in daily expectation of sailing for Naples—thence to Leghorn, and so on up to Carthage—where we calculate on finding our commodore Bainbridge with orders to send us home.”

* Perhaps not—as he wished to avail himself of the first moment of terror to extort his own terms.

From the Columbian.—Dutch Degeneracy. Accounts received in New-York from the Mediterranean, relative to the conduct of the late Dutch squadron, though very laughable, teach us how a people lose energy and honor, and courage, by losing liberty. The Dutch frigates were in fact blockaded in Spanish ports, till the American squadron attacked and captured some Algerine cruisers, when the remainder escaped into Malta. Then the Dutch came out, and lay before Algiers, to the number of six or seven frigates or ships of war. When it was known at Malta, that the dey had made peace with the Americans, two Algerine frigates put to sea, and entered the harbor of Algiers, fighting their way through the Dutch squadron !!!—The reader, acquainted with the former history of the Dutch, would scarcely believe that these officers and seamen, are the countrymen of the De Witts, of De Kuyter, and Vaptromp. The same squadron, we hear, bought a renewal of the former treaty between Holland and the dey, for four hundred thousand dollars; which treaty stipulates the payment of an annual tribute.—Compare this treaty with that negotiated by DECATUR and his secretaries of legation! The Dutch, in truth, are without skilful naval officers—they lack experience; those who were qualified to command, went into the service of Bonaparte, and are out of fashion now in common with honor and talents, in France and Holland. No power in Europe can raise a navy to rival England—America, —free America! you are the sole hope of a degraded and benighted world—May your stars shine through all futurity—and your example yet give freedom to mankind.

FOREIGN OPINIONS. Messina, (Sicily) Aug. 23.—On Saturday, the division of the American squadron, consisting of three frigates, one corvette, two schooners and a brig, commanded by commodore DECATUR, dropt anchor in this port. That brave officer has the glory of having, after thirty-five days absence from the new world, concluded the most honorable peace for the great nation which he represents, and very much to the advantage of the commerce of this country. Although the tenor of the treaty has not yet been published, it is, however, known, from good authority, that the regency of Algiers has been obliged to pay him the amount of the prizes taken during the war; and the regencies of Tripoli and Tunis have been obliged to indemnify the American government for all the prizes which have been made in their ports by foreign nations.

BARBARIAN RESPECT. Boston, Nov. 14. The bey of Tunis has written a letter to the president of the United States, justifying the deposing of his predecessor in office, and shewing his superior right to the beyship.

Extract of a letter from an officer on board the U. S. ship Macedonian, to his friend in New-York, dated off Tripoli, August 9th, 1815.

“We left Cagliari the 24th July, and 25th anchored in the bay of Tunis, where the commodore dictated the terms of a treaty to the bey—compelled him to pay for two prizes, sent into Tunis by an American privateer, and given up to the English—got indemnity for a cargo sold by an American captain to a Jew, who refused to pay for it, (with the approbation of the bey.) While we lay off Tunis, went ashore but once. We left the ship early in the morning, and landed at the Galletta, the principal defence of the town, where we provided ourselves with horses and asses, rode round the lake at the head of which stands the town. The lake is connected with the sea by a small canal, and forms a natural salt-work. The lake is no where more than three feet deep, and when the tide is out, it leaves on the shores of the lake, which are very level, a coat of salt. In riding round this lake to the city, we passed not less than 4 or 500 piles of salt as large as haystacks. There are hundreds of acres of the shores of this lake over which the water flows, not deeper than six inches, so that a great part of it evaporates every tide and leaves the salt, which is scraped together and carried off on camels to the high grounds, where it is deposited in large piles. The water of this lake is so much saltier than the ocean (owing to its shallowness and small out-let) that it is much more difficult to row a boat through it; and wherever the oar falls, it leaves a fine spot of salt. We arrived at the city at nine in the morning—took breakfast with the American consul, who treated us as politely as his attention to the public business would admit. The city is an irregular built place, the houses of stone, and the streets so narrow, that you can with difficulty pass an ass, loaded with wood, without tearing your clothes. We were glad to leave the place and get on board our ship again, after visiting a Turkish steam bath, the only thing worth seeing in the city. August 2d, we weighed anchor and sailed for Tripoli, where we arrived the 5th. We stood off and on until the 9th; in the mean time, the commodore concluded a treaty, by the terms of which we received 25,000 dollars for spoiliations on our commerce, and released ten Italian prisoners, which was called $5000 more."

SEAMANSHIP.—Extract of a letter from an officer of the U. S. brig Enterprize.—"We sailed on the 6th of August, at 2 o'clock, with a strong breeze from the northward and eastward; this continued two days—on the third, about noon, it began to blow a gale, until 10 at night, when it blew so hard we had the comfort of reflecting that it could not blow much harder, nevertheless it did increase and continued for about three hours with a fury altogether inconceivable. All the sails were taken in and the yards lowered on deck, and after every thing else had been done, capt. Kearney ordered the guns to be thrown overboard, and the carpenters to stand by to cut away the masts—before these orders could be executed the wind began to abate, and we happily saved our guns and masts—the wind continued with violence till day light, but the force of it was spent. Our gallant little brig rode through the storm with great ease, and without the least injury. "You were wishing," said the captain to me, "to see a storm at sea,"—said I, "and my curiosity is completely gratified."—"If it is not you are very unreasonable, for a harder one never blew on the Atlantic—old Boreas has been getting a new pair bellows, and seems determined to try them on us."

Two days after this we spoke the ship Parrot, of Liverpool—she had lost her mizen mast and foretop mast in the gale and was leaky—the capt. informed us he was one of a fleet of ninety six sail from Jamaica, under convoy of the Warrior, of 74 guns, and a sloop of war—the convoy was dispersed in the gale—he saw two vessels go down—the next day he saw the wrecks of two others—had on board the crew of a fifth, whom he had saved—and had spoken a sixth in distress. He was apprehensive that the greater part of the fleet was lost, &c. he never saw so tremendous a gale in his life. He was surprised at the appearance of our vessel—for we were as snug as if we had just come out of port. For this we are indebted, under Providence, to the excellence of our brig's crew and officers.

"6th September.—The land we made yesterday proves to be the coast of Spain, between Capes St. Vincent and St. Mary's; at noon our main and foretop-masts were carried away in a singular manner; the weather was perfectly serene and the sky cloudless—the wind light and we were going under easy sail, when a sudden whirlwind carried away the top-masts, sails, rigging and all—while not a breath of it was felt on deck. We did not feel the least shock nor was the motion of the vessel the least impeded, in short no indication of it was seen heard or felt and except the man at the mast head, no one could tell how or when it happened."

Copy of a letter from commodore Decatur, to his excellency the marquis Circello, secretary of state and minister of foreign affairs to his majesty the king of Naples.

U. S. SHIP GUERRIERE,
Naples, September 8th, 1815.

SIR—I have the honor to inform your excellency, that in my late negotiation with the bashaw of Tripoli, I demanded and obtained the release of eight Neapolitan captives, subjects of his majesty, the king of the two Sicilies. These I have landed at Messina. It affords me great pleasure to have had it in my power, by this small service, to evince to his majesty the grateful sense entertained by my government of the aid, formerly rendered to us by his majesty, during our war with Tripoli.

With great respect and consideration, I have the honor to be, your excellency's most obedient servant,
STEPHEN DECATUR.

*His excellency the marquis Circello,
Secretary of state, &c. &c.*

NAPLES, 12th Sept. 1815.

SIR—Having laid before the king my master the paper you have directed me, dated the 8th inst. in which you were pleased to acquaint me, that in your last negotiation with the bey of Tripoli, you had freed from the slavery of that regency, eight subjects of his majesty, whom you had also set on shore at Messina; his majesty has ordered me to acknowledge this peculiar favor as the act of your generosity, which you have pleased to call a return for the trifling assistance which the squadron of your nation formerly received from his royal government during the war with Tripoli.

In doing myself the pleasure of manifesting this sentiment of my king, and of assuring, you in his name, that the brave American nation will always find in his majesty's ports the best reception, I beg you will receive the assurances of my most distinguished consideration.

Marquis CIRCELLO,
Secretary of state and minister of foreign affairs.

Com. Decatur, commander of the Squadron of the U. S. of America.

Foreign Articles.

According to our last accounts the following, and several other, French fortresses had not yet submitted—Longwy, (which had been twice bombarded) Landau, Salins, Strasburg, Chariemont, Neubrisac, Brest and Antwerp.

40,000 people of the Lower Pyrenees offered their services to the prefect to drive out their "deliverers," the Spaniards. The south of France is greatly disturbed. Tranquility is restored in Corsica. The white flag flies there.

The French funds fell from 63 to 56, on the late change of ministers.

The Turks, it is said, have assembled an army of 200,000 men, but whether to act against the Servians and others in insurrection, or against Austria or Russia, seems doubtful. The latter powers appear to be preparing for them.

The Portuguese and Spanish courts are reported to have some misunderstanding.

French sovereignty! Orders were received that no French vessel should clear out without a passport from lord Wellington, (the actual ruler of France,) and permits are given to any part of the world, except the coast of Africa.

English trade to South America. On the 29th of June, there were, according to letters received in London, 27 English ships in the River Plata.

French memoirs. Carnot, says a Paris paper, has published a second memoir. It is printed at Rouen, and consists of a sheet and a half. I do not yet know of any person, who has read it, except the duke of Otranto, though several persons of consequence announce its existence. Its object is to point out the means of delivering France from the foreign armies.

There has also been issued from the press another memoir, much more extensive, and which consists of a strong appeal from the protestants on the occasion of the horrors which have been committed in the south. These horrors are detailed in it. "Ministers of Louis XVIII, will you be more cruel than the ministers of Louis XIV!" is one of the apostrophes of this memoir.

British morality. It appears determined by the British authorities, that a note or other bill, drawn in a foreign country, and, not having the British stamp on the paper, is irrecoverable in a British court of law! This is, at least, what we suppose to be the meaning of some late things we have seen.

Labdoyere. We have already given an account of the gallant manner in which this distinguished man met his "murderers"—[He was certainly as much "murdered" as the famous duke d'Enghein was]. He advanced boldly and firmly—told those appointed to kill him to "make ready—present—fire." To the honor of France be it said, that they were a party of the royalists who had rallied round Louis, at Ghent, who shot him. None else could be found for the odious service—and even they were encircled by a body of FOREIGN bayonets, in the hands of Prussians.

Protection. It is stated in the Paris papers that "the prince regent of England has honored the pope with a regiment of Irish Roman Catholics for his guard." While his arms are defending the "Holy Father" we think he ought to silence his priests who are clamoring to heaven for his destruction—as their robes requires they should do.

Bullion.—London, September 21. Yesterday the price of gold was dull at 88s. and dollars heavy at 5s. 6d.

The spoilers. A traveller who has lately arrived in England from the continent, affirms that he met 40,000 Prussians without arms, and without regimental clothing, who were pushing with all haste to France to supply themselves with both. He also understood that there was another column of a like number marching to the same destination for the same purposes.

The sum of 1,165 dollars has been subscribed for the relatives of the seven Saxon grenadiers, shot for mutiny by order of prince Blucher. Two hundred dollars of this money was sent by a person of the highest rank.—Hamburg Correspondent, Sept. 8.

The Prussian troops at Nantz, 5,000, had marched to join other forces directed against Brest and Antwerp, which had not submitted. They had hoisted the white flag, but refused to surrender to the allies or British. In the former port were 40, and at the latter 30 sail of ships of the line, besides frigates. These will perhaps be destroyed, or added to the British navy.

The 6th edition of the Causes and Character of the late war with Great Britain, which was originally published at Washington, has made its appearance in London.

The emperor of Austria is about to assume the title of "Protector of the liberties of Italy."

It is now said that 202,000 of the allies are to remain in France, until the last farthing of the tribute is paid, &c. The treaty, if any there is, has not yet been published.

Departure of the allied sovereigns. The emperor of Russia quitted Paris on the 28th Sept. taking the route of Brussels.—The emperor of Austria departed soon afterwards, and the King of Prussia was expected to leave the city about the 10th of October.

We have a report that war was expected between Russia and Sweden.

The congregation of missionaries at Rome, has published a census of the Christian prisoners, among the Infidels; by which it appears there are 49,000 in the regencies of Tunis and Algiers. His holiness intends appealing to the European powers for their ransom. [He had better appeal to the Americans.]

King Louis has softened the dismissal of the old ministry by conferring distinctions upon all, Fouche excepted, whose name is not mentioned.

Ney.—There seems to be some great difficulty attending the trial of marshal Ney. The government is, probably, afraid to meet the case fairly. He is still confined, but enjoys extraordinary privileges.

The military orders of St. Louis and of military merit, have been given by the king of France to 34 general officers in the Russian service, for their mildness and forbearance when in France.

A London paper, of Sept. 23, mentions a report, that lord Melville was to be appointed governor of India, vice the earl of Moira. The latter is complained of for his present Indian war, and the expensiveness of his establishments. It is said he had 100 elephants and 1000 camels.

Spain.—An insurrection, of which we had the most pleasing hopes, was raised in Spain, near Corunna, the latter end of September, headed by one of the old patriots, general Portier. He issued a spirited proclamation to the people of Galicia, and many joined him to shake of the tyrant Ferdinand and his vile priests. We have a report that he has been defeated and taken prisoner, but are not willing to believe it. There is much disaffection in Spain, and well there may—for it is understood that in the old castles and prisons there are confined no less than 50,000 of those who were most active in the revolution; of those who labored the most to put the ungrateful fool on the throne. The soldiery are said to be generally discontented. Vigor to the man that strikes for freedom, civil and religious. We shall hear of this.

"Legitimacy."—The "Holy Father" has piously shut up all the private schools and places of instruction which grew up from the nature of things while the "estates of the church" had some portion of freedom under the tyrant Bonaparte.

Ireland is in a most distracted state. The grievances of the people, by the pressure of the tythes added to their other burthens, seems insupportable. A desultory, but dreadful war, prevails in several counties; and new associations; somewhat after the manner of the former "United Irishmen," appear to be forming in various parts. Martial law is proclaimed, and many troops are sending from England to Ireland—some fighting has taken place between the people and the regular troops. Amerrick is the chief seat of the insurrection, but it is progressing in other counties. The mail coaches are attacked, houses burnt, cattle killed, and men murdered—that priests, who never officiate for the people, may live in luxury and debauchery. The following may elucidate the nature of the thing so much complained of:—"The protestant rector of the parish of the Royal Oak, county of Carlow, levies under the imposition of the tythe system, not less than £3000 annually, and within the extensive populous district, there is not one protestant. It can be no great matter for our astonishment to learn, that discontent thrives in a community, so oppressed to maintain a man, who exacts such a heavy revenue from their industry, in the name of God, to spend it in another country, without the shadow of utility or appearance of it to the sufferers."

The seamen, in many English ports, assemble in large bodies to urge employment and an increase of wages.

Rome, Aug. 10. Our secretary of state is much engaged: nothing transpires respecting the nature of the business going forward; except it be some new arrangements for the government of the papal legations which have recently reverted to our possession. At the residence of the ex-consul of Naples, or rather the ex-agent of Murat, several books of free-masonry and secret societies were found, which were ordered to be burnt by the public executioner. Louis Bonaparte makes several visits to the cardinal secretary of state, for the purpose, it is supposed, of obtaining permission for his mother and rest of the family to reside in the Roman states.

Paris, Sept. 26. We are assured that some of the most oppressive articles for France enacted in the ultimatum of the allied powers, are modified or suppressed.

The discipline is very severe amongst the English troops. They write from Amiens that a Hanoverian soldier was shot for having robbed and ill used his hostess.

Sept. 27. It was believed that there will not be a treaty of peace, properly so called, but only a declaration of all the powers on the measures necessary to draw closer the cords of peace and friendship which unite them.

Savary and L'Allemand have arrived at Malta, where, it is said, they will be retained as prisoners of war.

Paris, Sept. 29.—We are assured that the treaty of peace so strongly desired, and so impatiently expected, was signed this morning. Yesterday evening there still remained some difficulties to smooth away; they originated, it is said, in England. The Emperor Alexander passed a part of the night in discussing them—in removing them; and he has had the glory of terminating the great work which is to contribute to the happiness of the world. That monarch this morning quitted the capital, where he has left behind him the noblest and most honorable recollections.—Gazette de France.

London, Sept. 28.—The Morning Chronicle asserts that the emperor Alexander, in displaying an army of 172,000 infantry and 26,000 cavalry declares, he will support France against any unjust demands. The most intimate harmony subsists between the cabinets of St. Petersburg and Thuilleries.

London, Sept. 26.—The Prussian commandant at Paris, baron Muffling, has published, that until the murderer of Kean, an Englishman, was discovered, he should levy a daily contribution of 2000 francs on the citizens of the Boulevards of Coblentz.

[Kean was an army contractor. He had an amour; and afterwards dismissed his mistress, who threatened to be revenged. His body was found pierced with a sword.]

BONAPARTE.

[From the London Courier.]

Interesting documents relative to the manner in which Bonaparte is to be treated.

Letter from earl Bathurst, secretary of state, to the lords of the admiralty.

"Drowning-street, July 30, 1815.

"MY LORD—I wish your lordships to have the goodness to communicate to rear-admiral sir Geo. Cockburn, a copy of the following memorial, which is to serve him by way of instruction, to direct his conduct while general Bonaparte remains under his care. The prince regent, in confiding to English officers a mission of so much importance, feels that it is unnecessary to express to them his earnest desire that no personal restraint may be employed than what shall be found necessary faithfully to preform the duties, of which the admiral, as well as the governor of St. Helena, must never lose sight, namely, the perfectly secure detention of the person of general Bonaparte. Every thing which, without opposing the grand object, can be granted as an indulgence, will, his royal highness is convinced, be allowed the general. The prince regent depends further on the well known zeal and resolute character of sir Geo. Cockburn, that he will not suffer himself to be misled imprudently to deviate from the performance of his duty.

"BATHURST."

MEMORIAL.

When general Bonaparte leaves the Bellerophon to go on board the Northumberland, it will be the properest moment for admiral Cockburn to have the effects examined which general Bonaparte may have brought with him.

His money, his diamonds, and his saleable effects (consequently bills of exchange also) of whatever kind they may be, must be delivered up. The admiral will declare to the general that the British government by no means intends to confiscate his property, but merely to take upon itself the administration of his effects to hinder him using them as a means to promote his flight.

The examination shall be made in the presence of a person named by Bonaparte; the inventory of the effects to be retained shall be signed by this person as well as by the rear admiral, or by the person whom he shall appoint to draw up the inventory.

The interest or the principal (according as his property is more or less considerable) shall be applied to his support, and in this respect the principal arrangements to be left to him.

For this reason he can, from time to time, signify his wishes to the admiral till the arrival of the new governor of St. Helena, and afterwards to the latter; and if an objection is to be made to his proposal, the admiral or the governor can give the necessary orders, and the disbursement will be paid by bills on his majesty's treasury.

In case of death he can dispose of his property by a last will, and be assured that the contents of his testament shall be faithfully executed.

As an attempt might be made to make a part of his property pass for the property of the persons of his suite, it must be signified that the property of his attendants is subject to the same regulations.

The disposal of the troops left to guard him must be left to the governor.

The latter, however, has received a notice, in the case which will be hereafter mentioned, to act according to the desire of the admiral.

The general must constantly be attended by a officer appointed by the admiral, or if the case occurs, by the governor. If the general is allowed to go out of the bounds where the sentinels are placed, an orderly man at least must accompany the officer.

When ships arrive, and as long as they are in sight, the general remains confined to the limits where the sentinels are placed. During this time all communication with the inhabitants is forbidden. His companions in St. Helena are subject during this time to the same rules and must remain with him. At other times it is left to the judgment of the admiral or governor to make the necessary regulations concerning them. It must be signified to the general, that if he makes any attempt to fly, he will then be put under close confinement, and it must be notified to his attendants, that if it should be found that they are plotting to prepare the general's flight, they shall be separated from him, and put under close confinement.

All letters addressed to the general or to persons in his suite, must be delivered to the admiral or governor, who will read them before he suffers them to be delivered to those to whom they are addressed. Letters written by the general or his suite, are subject to the same rule.

No letter that does not come to St. Helena through the secretary of state, must be communicated to the general or his attendants, if it is written by a person not living in the island. All their letters addressed to persons not living in the island, must go under the cover of the secretary of state.

It will be clearly expressed to the gentlemen that the governor and admiral have precise orders to inform his majesty's government of all the wishes and representations which the general may desire to address to it; in this respect they need not use any precaution. But the paper on which such request or representation is written must be communicated to them open, that they may both read it, and when they send it accompany it with such observations as they may judge necessary.

Till the arrival of the new governor, the admiral must be considered as entirely responsible for the person of general Bonaparte, and his majesty has no doubt of the inclination of the present governor to concur with the admiral for this purpose. The admiral has full power to retain the general on board his ship or to convey him on board again, when, in his opinion, secure detention of his person cannot be otherwise effected. When the admiral arrives at St. Helena, the governor will upon his representation, adopt measures for sending immediately to England, the Cape of Good Hope, or the East Indies, such officers, or other persons, in the military corps of St. Helena, as the admiral, either because they are foreigners, or on account of their character or distinction, shall think it advisable to dismiss from the military service in St. Helena.

If there are strangers in the island whose residence in the country shall seem to be with a view of becoming instrumental to the flight of general Bonaparte, he must take measures to remove them. The whole coast of the island, and all ships and boats that visit it are placed under the surveillance of the admiral. He fixes the places which the boats may visit, and the government will send a sufficient guard to the points where the admiral shall consider this precaution as necessary.

The admiral will adopt the most vigorous measures to watch over the arrival and departure of every ship, and to prevent all communication with the coast, except such as he shall allow.

Orders will be issued to prevent, after a certain necessary interval, any foreign or mercantile vessel to go in future to St. Helena.

If the general should be seized with serious illness the admiral and the governor will each name a physician who enjoys their confidence, in order to attend the general in common with his own physician; they will give them strict orders to give in every day a report on the state of his health. In case of his death, the admiral will give orders to convey his body to England,

Given at the war office, July 23, 1815.

Opening of the sessions of the two chambers.

ROYAL SITTING, OF OCT. 7, 1815.—The members of the chamber of peers and the deputies of the departments, in the habits of their new costume, occupied at an early hour the places assigned them.

At 11 o'clock the king of Prussia, dressed as a plain individual, without any decoration and with very few attendants, entered the tribune, which he had himself selected in the upper galleries, and most retired part of the hall.

A tribune had been prepared in front of the throne for the duchess of Angoulême; but as her royal highness could not assist at the ceremony, the seats were withdrawn.

The prince royal of Bavaria, and the principal generals of the allies occupied the tribune reserved for the diplomatic corps.

At a quarter past noon salutes of artillery announced the departure of the procession, which arrived in about an hour. The king was received at the head of the grand stair case by M. Cothard, eldest president, the secretaries and assistants, and by a deputation from each chamber.

Having rested a short time in an adjoining saloon, his majesty entered the hall, preceded by the heralds at arms, the ministers of his household, and the marshals of France—The ministers of the portfolio and of state having previously taken their places. The prince Talleyrand, grand chamberlain, continued near the king, who had on his right his royal highness the count D'Artois, the duke de Berry, and the prince of Conde, and on his left the duke d'Angoulême and the duke of Orleans—M. Dambray, the chancellor, placed himself on a seat to the left of the throne.

The members of the two chambers and the spectators rose with repeated shouts of "live the king! live the Bourbons!" All continued standing while the speech was delivered by the king, covered and seated—his majesty expressing himself in the following terms:—

GENTLEMEN—When, last year, for the first time, I convoked these Chambers, I felicitated myself in having, by an honorable treaty, restored peace to France.

She began to taste of the fruits, which all the sources of prosperity, again opened, had produced.

A criminal enterprize, seconded by the most inconceivable defection, arrested its course.

The evils which that ephemeral usurpation has occasioned to our country, have deeply afflicted me—but I must here declare, that could they have affected none but myself, I would have blessed the dispensation of Providence.

[His Majesty was here interrupted by acclamations of "Live the King," and a general movement of the assembly.]

The proofs of affection, which my people have given me in the most critical moments, have solaced all my personal sufferings; but those of my subjects oppress my heart.

And to terminate this state of uncertainty, more grievous than war itself, I have deemed it proper to conclude with the powers, who having overthrown the Usurper, now occupy a large portion of our territory, a convention which regulates our present and future relations with them.

This Convention will be communicated to you, without restriction, as soon as it shall have passed its last form.

You know, gentlemen, all France will know the deep sensations which I have felt; (here his Majesty manifested an emotion which was communicated to the assembly) but the safety of my kingdom required this great determination, and having taken it, I feel the duties which it imposes.

I have this year decreed, that a considerable portion of my civil list shall be yielded to the treasury of the state—and my family, informed of the decision, have offered me a proportionate gift.—(Grateful emotions.)

I have directed similar diminutions of the pay and expenses of all my servants, without exception.

I shall at all times be prepared to share in the sacrifices, which imperious circumstances may impose on my people.

The statements will be placed before you, and you will know the importance of the economy, which I have ordered in all the departments of my ministers, and in every branch of the administration.

Happy, if those measures could meet the charges of the state. In every result I calculate on the devotion of the nation and the zeal of the two chambers.

But, Gentlemen, other cares, more agreeable, and not less important, convene you to-day. It is to give greater weight to your deliberations, and to increase my own information, that I have created new peers, and that the number of deputies from the departments has been augmented.

I trust I have been successful in my selections—and the zeal of the deputies, in those difficult conjunctures, is an additional proof that they are animated with a sincere attachment to my person, and an ardent love of country.

It is, then, with grateful joy and complete confidence that I behold you assembled around me; assured that you will never lose sight of the fundamental bases of the happiness of the state, frank and loyal union of the chambers with the king; and respect for the constitutional charter.

That charter, which I have carefully meditated before I gave it, to which reflection daily increases my attachment, which I have sworn to maintain, and to which you, commencing with my family, are about to swear obedience, is, without doubt, like all other human institutions, susceptible of improvement; but we should never forget, that, connected with the advantage of amelioration, is the danger of innovation.

Many other important objects present themselves to our labor.

To cause religion to re-flourish—to purify the morals, to establish liberty on respect for the laws; and to render them more and more analogous to these great views; to give stability to credit; to re-compose the army; to heal the wounds which have lacerated the bosom of our country; finally, to assure internal tranquility, and thence to produce respect for France from abroad—these are the great objects to which all our efforts should be directed.

I cannot flatter myself that so much can be accomplished in one session; but if, at the close of the present legislature, it shall appear that we have approached these great ends, we shall have cause of satisfaction with our own endeavors.

I shall spare nothing to attain this result; and to reach it, I calculate, gentlemen, on your most active co-operation."

Renewed plaudits and shouts of "live the king! live the Bourbons!" testified to his majesty the unanimous sentiment of the two chambers, in which the spectators were permitted to mingle the lively expression of their vows.

The king invited the peers to be seated, and the same request was transmitted to the deputies by the chancellor. The princes took the oath in these terms, and repeating successively the formula:

"I swear to be faithful to the king, to obey the constitutional charter and the laws of the kingdom."

It was impossible, without interest, to hear the respectable prince of Conde pronounce this oath, with the effusion of a profound sensibility.

The new peers and all the deputies took the same oath, with this addition for the upper chamber—"and to conduct myself as becomes a good and loyal peer of France;" and for the lower chamber, "as becomes a good and loyal deputy."

This ceremony was interrupted for a moment by a remarkable incident. We believe we heard one of the peers, M. de la Bourdonnaye Blossac add to the prescribed obligation, except what concerns the catholic religion.

One of the deputies of Tarn, M. Domignon, said, "before taking the oath, I ask of my lord the king, permission."

A movement of surprise manifested itself in the assembly. The duke de Richelieu having received the order of the king, said

According to the immemorial usage of the monarchy, no one, in a similar ceremony, can speak without the express permission of the king. The king directs that the ceremony proceed.

M. Domignon only said "I swear."* The chancellor, after the oaths were taken, said

By order of the king, the session is declared to be opened. The peers and the deputies are invited to repair on Monday next to their respective chambers to commence their sittings.

The assembly separated to the cries of "live the king!" and his majesty was re-conducted with the usual ceremony.

Talleyrand, though dismissed from the ministry, appears still to be really at the head of affairs in France.

At Gibraltar, Oct. 7, Spanish accounts had been received, which stated that in three of the most populous provinces in Spain, the revolutionists had collected a force of 25 or 30,000 men, and that General Mina was to return from France to take the command. At Malaga it was reported that Austria had declared war against Spain.—Columbian.

By a gentleman just arrived in the mail stage, who left the ship Fair Trader below, we learn that the insurrection in Spain had been suppressed, and the leader, Porlier, who was betrayed by his followers, had been shot.—Phila. Reg.

Right of Suffrage.

FROM THE GEORGETOWN GAZETTE.

LAW INTELLIGENCE. South-Carolina, Georgetown District—Fall Term, 1815.

The State vs. Fargues McDowell, gaoler of Georgetown district—tried before his honor Judge Nott.

This was an indictment upon the following clause of the 11th section of the election law, A. D. 1721, Brevard's digest, vol. 1st, page 276. "If any person or persons whatsoever, shall on any day appointed for the election of a member of the commons house of assembly as aforesaid, presume to violate the freedom of the said election, by any arrest, menaces or threats, endeavor or attempt to overawe, fright or force any person qualified to vote, against his inclination or conscience; or otherwise by bribery obtain any vote, or who shall, after the said election is over, menace, despitefully use or abuse any person because he hath not voted as he or they would have had him; every such person so offending, upon due and sufficient proof made of such his violence or abuse, menacing or threatening, before any two justices of the peace, shall be bound over to the next general sessions of the peace, himself in 50% current money of this province, and two sureties, each in 25% of like money, and to be of good behavior, and abide the sentence of the said court, where, if the offender or offenders are convicted or found guilty of such offence or offences as aforesaid, then he or they shall each of them forfeit the sum of 50% current money of this province, and be committed to gaol without bail or mainprize, till the sum be paid."

*It is said that M. Domignon is a protestant, and only meant to say, "excepting what concerns religion."

The indictment stated "that Fargues McDowell, on the 10th of October, A. D. 1814, with force and arms at Georgetown, in the district and state aforesaid, at an election then and there holden, under and by virtue of the constitution of the said state, for one senator and four representatives and members of the general assembly of the said state to represent the election district of Winyaw in the said state, the said 10th of October being a day duly appointed for holding the said election, did presume to violate the freedom of the said election by arrest, menaces and threats; and that the said Fargues McDowell did then and there, by arrest, menaces and threats, endeavor and attempt to menace, fright and force a certain Jacob R. Parker (the said Jacob R. Parker being then and there duly qualified to vote for the said senator and representatives and members of the said general assembly) to vote against the inclination and conscience of him the said Jacob R. Parker, to the evil example of all persons in the like case of offending, against the act of the general assembly of the then province, now state of South Carolina, in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the same state aforesaid."

The evidence adduced by the state proved, that Jacob R. Parker was convicted of an offence the previous term, and that a motion for a new trial was made, and the prisoner remanded to gaol, with an order of court that he should be bailed until his motion was determined. Parker not having obtained bail, McDowell permitted him to go at large with a promise that he should be subject to his controul. The prisoner had, frequently during such license, driven the mail stage a considerable distance from town and had generally lived with his family out of the gaol and conducted himself according to his own will until the morning of the Election, when McDowell sent for him and reprimanded him for having gone the preceding evening a few miles with a letter for one of the candidates who was obnoxious to him. After this preliminary conversation the gaoler interrogated him as to the manner in which he intended to vote, and finding that the obnoxious candidate was one of his favorites, he remonstrated with him on the impropriety of such a vote; finding that Parker was determined to vote for that gentleman, he resorted to the power of his office, and threatened to confine him if he voted for Mr. ——. He was hurrying the prisoner to gaol when several gentlemen came up and remonstrated with him on the illegality of his conduct. All was unavailing and the unhappy victim was committed to prison in spite of the constitution and laws of his country. A party of gentlemen, sometime afterwards waited on the defendant, and again informed him of the heinousness of his offence—he was inflexible, and Parker remained his prisoner until the ensuing morning, when he was bailed.

The attorney general, with the warmth and energy of the patriot, the intelligence of the statesman and the lawyer, portrayed in glowing and correct colors the enormity of the transaction. The defence set up by Robert A. Taylor, esq. was, the ignorance of the defendant, the humanity of his previous conduct, and the violation of the prisoner's parole of honor, concluding with an eloquent appeal to the jury not to minister at the altar of faction by surrendering his client a victim to the prosecution. His honor judge Nott, in a luminous and concise charge explained the law and evidence to the jury, and commented upon the importance of preserving inviolate the elective franchise, by punishing the first attempts made against its purity. The jury retired and in a few minutes returned a verdict of guilty.

CHRONICLE.

Among those who visited Gen. Jackson at Lynchburg, was Thomas Jefferson, who partook of a splendid entertainment given to the hero, by the corporation of that town, of which nearly 300 gentlemen were present. The general's lady is with him, to whom, also, due respect was paid by the ladies of the place.

Mr. Jefferson's toast, at the dinner-party, was in the following beautiful terms:—"Honor and gratitude to those who have filled the measure of their country's honor."

Gen. Jackson toasted Mr. Monroe as Secretary at War.

HENRY CLAY was elected to congress before his return from Ghent. Some doubts having arisen whether he could at that time be legally elected a representative of the people, a new election was ordered, and he has been unanimously chosen.

Acceding banks. Among the banks that acceded to the proposition of the secretary of the treasury, was the Farmers and Mechanics bank of Cincinnati, whose name was not given in the list, by the accidental delay in the transmission of its prompt assent to the treasury department.

THE PEACE ESTABLISHMENT. An able writer in the Boston Patriot, has commenced a series of essays addressed to Henry Clay, respecting the peace establishment of the army. He points out with great energy the disadvantages we suffered at the commencement of the last war, and shews us that like causes will produce like effects in their operation. To guard against that apathy and inertness that must grow up in a mere routine of garrison duty, and keep up the esprit du corps, he proposes some increase of the army, with the formation of camps of instruction, and the employment of the soldiers on military roads, fortresses, &c. The public, at large, we believe, has sincerely deplored the too great economy of the last congress, and there seems a general disposition "to correct the procedure."

Pennsylvania election. Our correspondent at Harrisburg requests us to correct an error in the statement he sent us, shewing the strength of parties in the legislature of Pennsylvania. The House of representatives consists of 71 rep. and 26 fed. the senate of 20 rep. and 11 fed. making a joint majority of 55, instead of 66, as stated before.

THE FLORIDAS. It seems a matter of certainty that the Floridas have been ceded to Great Britain, and we are sorry for it; for we can see in the possession of them by that power nothing else than a preparation for some new quarrel with the United States. The part that Spain held was barren and unprofitable, and can be of no service to Britain except to form a rallying point for the savages she may enlist against us; which will, probably, lead to the utter extinction of the Creeks. But what does Britain care for that? Havoc is her holiday amusement.

THE CREEKS. Extract of a letter from a gentleman at the Creek Agency, to his friend in Milledgeville, dated Oct. 27, 1815:

The price of American stocks in England is said to have been as low as 85—this may be stock-jobbing.

"We have travellers passing daily, and their report is, that the Indians are as friendly as they ever saw them. A Cussetan chief was here to-day. He came for the express purpose of informing Mrs. Hawkins, that two Seminole Indians had come up to let them know that it was all peace and friendship throughout their land—that they had been assisting the British till the white people had taken all their land—and had it not been for that, they might have had it yet. They now say they have thrown down their arms, and if the British wish to fight those engaged in running the line, they might do it themselves—that they were tired and sick of war.

A Steam-boat, to ply between New London and New Haven, has been contracted for—thus completing a line of steam-boats (with two short portages) from New London to Baltimore. We shall soon have them all along the coast; and direct, from ports the most distant, to others.

"More of legitimacy."—Many of our royal editors who talk of "his majesty's" ships being at sea, &c. give us further evidence of their "legitimacy" by sentences like this—"The Spanish ship ———, was robbed of her provisions and charts by a Carthaginian privateer." Why robbed? Carthage is one of the united provinces of the republic of Granada, and is at war with Spain, just exactly as we were with Great Britain during our revolution. There is not one shade of difference—the people of Granada have solemnly proclaimed their independence, as we did, and I pray they may support it as successfully. Are our editors prepared to say that the prizes we made during the revolution were "robberies?" Some of the captures we made, of arms, ammunition and clothing, during that glorious struggle, were considered by many of the great and good of that day, as special acts of Providence in our favor. Let the republicans of South America be no more stigmatised by the people of the republic in the north of this continent, and let us hear no more about the "robberies" of Spanish vessels by Carthaginian privateers until prepared to say that all who took part in our revolution were scoundrels. I heartily wish the republicans success, and earnestly desire that by any lawful means—any means allowed by the laws of nations, they may force bigotted Spain, governed by madmen and fools, to acknowledge them "free sovereign and independent." Every feeling of our heart, as men or Christians, as republicans or traders, is interested in the result of the war that is carrying on by Spain against the freedom of the new world.

Separation of Maine.—In the Eastern Argus, a respectable paper printed at Portland, is commenced an examination of the policy and justice of forming the district of Maine into a new and separate state.

JOSEPH McMINN, governor of Tennessee, ordered, Oct. 29, a thousand riflemen to be detached from the 1st and 2d divisions of the militia, and equipped for a six month's tour of duty, according to the requisition of general Gaines.

[We have reason to believe that this detachment will have no duty to perform, than to be in readiness.]

The Barbary powers. The grand Seignor despatched one of his agas to Tunis and Algiers, commanding their governments in the most pointed terms, to respect the Austrian flag, which they promised to do. We had a better mediator with these powers. The fact shews that some degree of respect is paid to the Ottoman Porte. The emperor of Morocco, it is said, has declared war against Russia, Prussia and Naples. Tripoli has made war upon the Danes, and captured several vessels.

"A slippery trick." When the British evacuated fort Niagara, they cut away the halyards and steps and greased the flag staff, so as to prevent the American flag from being immediately raised. They did the same noble feat at New York in 1783. How magnanimous!

Specie. We hear, (says a Philadelphia paper) that considerable sums in specie have been sent from England to New Orleans, Savannah and Charleston for the purchase of Cotton.

Capt. Sinclair, of the navy, is appointed to the command of the frigate Constitution. But previous to his taking charge of that ship it is understood he is to survey York river, with a view to a naval depot and dock yard to be established in its waters—for which they are so happily fitted, as described in the eloquent letter from a naval officer, published in the REGISTER, of the 4th inst.

General Brown. On Thursday last, (says a New-York paper of the 18th inst.) arrived in the steam boat, from New Haven, maj. gen. Brown and suite, consisting of his aids, col. Jones and maj. Fraser, and Dep. Q. M. G. Brown. The general has so far completed a survey of the military posts in his division, extending from the Potomac to Maine, having visited Detroit, Niagara, Sackett's Harbor, (his head quarters) Plattsburgh, Boston, Portland, Portsmouth, Castine, Newport, New London, and other posts, amounting to upwards of forty, and travelled nearly 2,500 miles in his tour. The warm and respectful attention paid to this distinguished officer in every part of his route, is no less gratifying to the patriot than honorable to the citizen. In the eastern states, his first appearance on official duty, has been welcomed in a truly grateful manner. Gen. B. it is said, will remain in town about a week or ten days.

Commodore Decatur.—The Algerines, Tunisians, and Tripolitans have been reduced to humiliating terms by this chivalric commander. He has given them such an electric shock, as was never before discharged from a Christian battery. Decatur may be termed the "champion of Christendom." The terms which he has obtained for the vindication of his country's honor, are, "indemnity for the past, and security for the future," he demanded from these barbarians, (who exist only as the monument of European disgrace) as a member of the Christian family, a release from slavery, "of Christian prisoners," and obtained it. This is a glory which never encircled the brows of a Roman Pontiff; nor blazed from an imperial diadem.—Boston Gazette.

NAVAL COURT MARTIAL. Sentence of a court martial, held on board the U. S. Ketch Vesuvius, for the trial of Robert Cranston, midshipman of the United States ship Java, on charges and specifications exhibited by captain O. H. Perry.

On Friday, at 11 o'clock, A. M. the court met pursuant to adjournment, and the proceedings read over in open court; and the court was then cleared to deliberate on the testimony which had been delivered, and after a most candid investigation, and on mature reflection, the court was of opinion, that part of the 1st specification of the 1st charge had been proved, inasmuch as it had been proved to the satisfaction of the court, that the prisoner, Robert Cranston, had made use of reproachful and abusive language to midshipman Handy. The prisoner pleading guilty of the 2d specification, obviates the necessity of an opinion from the court. The court is of opinion, that the 3d specification of the first charge is fully proved, and that the 4th specification of the said charge is as fully established. The court does, therefore, find the prisoner, Robert Cranston, guilty of the 1st charge.

The court is also of opinion, that the specification of the 2d charge, is clearly and amply proved, and does in consequence find the prisoner, Robert Cranston, guilty of the 2d charge.

The guilt of the prisoner being so clearly established, and the offences being in violation of the 15th and 3d articles for the better government of the navy of the United States, the court feels itself in duty bound to sentence the prisoner, Robert Cranston, to be dismissed from the navy of the United States, and the said Robert Cranston is therefore hereby dismissed from the navy of the United States; and that this sentence may operate as a lesson of admonition to the young officers of the navy, and particularly to those amongst whom the prisoner has so long associated, the court does also adjudge that the sentence be publicly read on the quarter deck of the United States frigate Java, and published in the newspaper called the "National Intelligencer," printed and published in the city of Washington.

Navy Department, Nov. 10, 1815.

Approved,

Newport, Nov. 16. We announce the arrival here of our gallant squadron from the Mediterranean under commodore BAINBRIDGE, consisting of the

The Flambeau, 18, had previously arrived.

The fleet stopped some time in Gibraltar, where the gallant commodore reciprocated civilities with the British commander-in-chief, general Dorr; who, with several of his officers, dined on board the Independence. The American officers were frequently on shore at the rock.

The United States, 44, Constellation, 38, with the sloops Erie and Ontario, are to remain in the Mediterranean. The United States arrived at Malaga in 21 days from Boston.

Worcester, Mass. Nov. 15. On Monday, the 6th inst. a white-headed eagle was killed in this town, near Lond-Pond, whose wings, when extended, measured 7 feet and 10 inches.

St. Louis, (I. T.) Oct. 28.—A few days ago, a treaty of amity and friendship was concluded here with the headmen and warriors of the Kansas nation of Indians.

On the 8th ult. the Indian treaty was concluded at Detroit, and signed by the principal chiefs and warriors of the Wyandots, Chippewa, Ottowas, Potawatamies, Shawanees, Delawares, Miamies and Seneca nations. It embraces peace and revives the treaty of Greenville, in August 1795, and all others subsequent.

Extract of a letter from captain Philips, commanding at Fort Clark, to a gentleman in this place

"The Potawatamies of this river with many other Indians from the neighborhood of Michigan lake have passed down and are daily passing for the purpose of making their winter hunt. I have in no wise limited them in their bounds, they appear friendly; so that should beef cattle be about to be sent to this place it would be well that those concerned in driving them through should be apprised of this fact, in order to guard against accidents.

HARTFORD CONVENTION AFFAIRS! The following will be exceedingly useful to add to any new sett of tables about the commerce of the "nation," that a future Hartford meeting may publish—to which they might add another table, shewing that all the produce of all the "nation," for foreign markets, for one year, would not lade these vessels:

Arrivals and departures from New-Orleans, from March to September, 1815—five months.

	ARRIVALS FROM	DEPARTURES TO

Of the vessels arrived, 161 ships, 69 brigs, 40 schrs. 9 sloops—tons 64,053. Of do. departed, 123 ships, 54 brigs, 30 schrs. 6 sloops—tons 51,812.

A Salt spring has been discovered on the west branch of the Wyalusing creek, Pen.; 90 gallons of the water of which makes 56 lbs. of salt.

The whale fishery. Twenty-five ships, manned with 21 men each, have left Nantucket for the southern whale fishery, since the war.

Two vessels which arrived at City Point, (Richmond) from England, had cargoes invoiced at 400,000£ sterling. We like to see the Virginians doing their own commerce.

Freights, in British vessels, were brisk at Charleston at 2½ d. per lb. for cotton, and even 3d was given, while many American vessels were lying idle at the wharves. The equalization of duties however, will give our ship-owners a chance of carrying some part of our own produce to the British market.

CORSETS. The city inspector reports the death of 75 persons (of whom were 25 men, 13 women, 15 boys and 22 girls) during the week ending on Saturday last—of whom 12 died of consumption.

This disease has, for several years past, formed a frightful proportion of our weekly obituary. A proportion not to be charged to our climate solely. Among its victims, at least two-thirds are females, and we are authorised by one of the most intelligent physicians of this city, to state, that in very many of the cases of female consumption that have come under his observation, the disease has been produced by the wearing of corsets. Such an intimation, from a respectable source, should not be lost upon parents.—New-York paper.

Act of the Congress of Vienna.

The powers who signed the treaty concluded at Paris on the 30th May, 1814, having reassembled at Vienna agreeable to the 32d article of that act, with the princes and states in alliance with them, to complete the dispositions of the said treaty and to add to it other arrangements rendered necessary by the condition in which Europe was placed at the conclusion of the last war, desiring now to comprise in one common transaction the different results of their negotiations, that they may be sanctioned by their mutual ratifications; have authorised their plenipotentiaries to collect into a general instrument, the dispositions of greater and permanent interests, and to join to this deed, as integral parts of the arrangements of congress, the treaties, conventions, declarations, regulations and other particular acts, which are found cited in the present treaty.—And the aforesaid powers having named as plenipotentiaries to congress, viz. (Here follow the names and titles of the plenipotentiaries arranged in the alphabetical order of their courts.) Those of the plenipotentiaries who were present at the close of the negotiation, after having exhibited their full powers, which were found to be in good and due form, have agreed to place in the said instrument, and to sanction with their common signature the following articles.

Union of the duchy of Warsaw to the Russian empire.

Article 1. The duchy of Warsaw, with the exception of the provinces and districts, which are otherwise disposed of in the following articles, is united to the empire of Russia. It shall be irrevocably joined to it by its constitution, to be possessed by his majesty the emperor of all the Russias, his heirs, and successors forever. His imperial majesty is invested with the right of giving to this state, while it enjoys a distinct administration, any interior extension which he shall judge convenient. He will take along with his other titles, that of czar, king of Poland, conformably to the protocol appointed for the titles attached to his other possessions.—The Poles, subjects respectively of Russia, Austria, and Prussia, shall obtain a representation and national institutions, regulated after that mode of political existence which each of the governments to which they belong shall judge useful and convenient to give them.

Limits of the grand duchy of Posen.

2. That part of the grand duchy of Warsaw which his majesty the king of Prussia shall possess in full sovereignty and property, for himself and his successors, under the title of the grand duchy of Posen, shall be comprised within the following limits:

In proceeding from the frontier of Eastern Prussia to the village of Neuhoft, the new limit will follow the frontier of Western Prussia, as it subsisted from the year 1772 up to the peace of Tilsit, to the village of Lubitsch, which will belong to the duchy of Warsaw; from thence there shall be drawn a line, which, in leaving Konefania, Grabouice, and Izytno to Prussia, passess the Vistula near this last place, on the other side of the river which falls into the Vistula opposite Izytno, to the ancient boundary of the district of Nitze near Gross Opoczko, so that Sluzewo shall belong to the duchy, and Pyzebranow, Holleondez, and Maziejewo to Prussia. From Gross Opoczko it shall pass Chlewiska, which shall remain with Prussia, to the village Pizbyslau, and thence by the villages Pioski, Ohelmice, Wilowiczki, Kobilinka, Woyczya, Orchowo, to the city of Powidz.

From Powidz the line shall be continued by the city of Spluzce, to the point of the confluence of the rivers Wartha and Proсна.

From this point it shall be continued up the course of the river Proсна, as far as the village of Koscielnavies within a league of the city of Kalisch.

There leaving to that city (on the left bank of the Proсна) a semi circular territory, measured by the distance between Koscielnavies and Kalisch, the limit shall return to the course of the Proсна, and allow it, ascending by the cities Grabew, Wiczuszow, Boleslawico, in order to terminate near the village of Gola, at the frontier of Silesia, opposite to Petachia.

Salt mines of Wieliczka.

3. His imperial and royal apostolic majesty shall possess in full property and sovereignty the salt mines of Wieliczka, as well as the territory that belongs to them.

Boundary between Galicia and the Russian territory.

4. The Thulweg of the Vistula, shall separate Galicia from the territory of the free city of Cracow. It will serve at the same time as a boundary between Galicia and that part of the former duchy of Warsaw, re-united to the states of his majesty the emperor of all the Russias, as far as the vicinity of the city of Zawichost.

From Zawichost to the Bug, the dry frontier shall be determined by the line described in the treaty of Vienna, 1809, subject to the ratifications which by mutual agreement may be made in it.

The frontier, in proceeding from the Bug, shall be re-established between the two empires, as it existed before the said treaty.

Restitution of the Circle of Tarnopol, &c. to Austria.

5. His majesty the emperor of all the Russias cedes to his imperial and royal apostolic majesty, the districts which have been detached from Eastern Galicia, in virtue of the treaty of Vienna, 1809, of the circles of Zloozaw, Brzezan, Tarnopol, and Zaleseyk, and the frontiers shall be re-established on that side as they existed before the epoch of the aforesaid treaty.

Cracow declared a free city.

6. The city of Cracow, with its territory, shall be considered henceforth as a free, independent, and strictly neutral city, under the protection of Russia, Austria, and Prussia.

Limits of the territory of Cracow.

7. The territory of the free city of Cracow shall have for its boundary on the left bank of the Vistula a line, which, commencing at the village of Wolica, at the place where a rivulet near that village flows into the Vistula, shall ascend this rivulet by Olo, Kosehmiki to Czulice, so that these villages are comprised within the frontier of the free city of Cracow; thence passing the villages, it shall proceed by Dickanowice, Carlice, Somosrow, Karnicowice, which shall likewise be included in the territory of Cracow, to the point where the limit which separates the district of Keszczowice from that of Olkuza, commences; from thence it shall follow that limit between the two said districts, to terminate on the frontiers of Prussian Silesia.

Privileges granted to Podgorza.

8. His majesty the emperor of Austria, desirous to contribute on his part to facilitate the relations of commerce and good neighborhood between Galicia and the trading city of Podgorza, grants to that city the privileges of a free commercial city, in the same extent as they are enjoyed by the city of Budy. This freedom of trade shall extend to a circumference of 500 toises from the barriers of the city of Podgorza. As a consequence of this permanent concession which shall nevertheless be under stood to extinguish none of the rights of sovereignty belonging to his imperial and royal apostolic majesty, Austrian custom-houses shall not be established but in places beyond the before mentioned demarkation. There shall not moreover, be formed in it any military establishment which may threaten the neutrality of Cracow, or restrain the liberty of commerce, the enjoyment of which his imperial and royal apostolic majesty wishes to bestow upon the city and arrondissement of Podgorza.

Neutrality of Cracow.

9. The courts of Russia, Austria and Prussia, engage to respect and to cause to be respected in all time coming, the neutrality of the free city of Cracow and its territory; no armed force shall enter it upon any pretext whatever.

In return it is understood, and expressly stipulated, that there shall not be granted in the free city of Cracow, or on its territory, any asylum or protection to refugees, deserters, or criminals pursued by law belonging to the territories of one or other of the said high powers; and that, upon a demand being made by the competent authorities to surrender such individuals, they shall be arrested and delivered without delay to the guard, which shall be appointed to receive them on the frontiers.

Constitution, academy, and bishopric of Cracow.

10. The arrangements that relate to the constitution of the free city of Cracow, its academy, its bishopric and chapter, as they are stated in the 7th, 15th, 16th, and 17th, articles of the additional treaty regarding Cracow, shall have the same force and validity as if they had been literally inserted in this act.

General Amnesty.

11. There shall be a full, general and particular amnesty in favor of all individuals, of whatever rank, sex, or condition they may be.

Sequestrations and confiscations removed.

12. In consequence of the preceding article, none shall be in future harrassed or prosecuted in any way on account of any participation, direct or indirect, at any time whatever, in political events, civil or military, in Poland. All processes, prosecutions or accusations, shall be renounced, provisional sequestrations, and confiscations shall be removed, and no act, proceeding from a cause of this kind, shall be persisted in.

Exception.

13. From these general dispositions, with respect to confiscations, are excepted, all cases, where the edicts or sentence, pronounced en dernier resort, shall have already received their entire execution, and shall not have been annulled by subsequent events.

Free navigation of rivers.

14. The established principles, on the free navigation of rivers and canals, through all the extent of ancient Poland, as well as on the frequenting of the harbors, the circulation of the productions of the soil, and of industry among the different Polish provinces, and in the transit commerce, such as they are declared in the 24th, 25th, 26th, 28th and 29th articles of the treaty between Austria and Russia, and in the 22d, 23d, 24th, 25th, 28th, and 29th, of the treaty between Russia and Prussia, shall be invariably maintained.

Cessions of Saxony to Prussia.

15. His majesty the king of Saxony renounces forever for himself and all his descendants and successors, in favor of his majesty the king of Prussia, all his rights, and titles to the provinces, districts and territories, or parts of territories, of the kingdom of Saxony hereafter mentioned, and his majesty the King of Prussia shall possess those countries in full sovereignty and property, and shall unite them to his monarchy. The districts and territories thus ceded shall be separated from the rest of the kingdom of Saxony by a line which shall be henceforth the frontier between the two Prussian and Saxon territories, in such a manner that all which is comprised in the delimitation formed by their line, shall be restored to his majesty the king of Saxony, but his majesty renounces all the districts and territories which shall be situated beyond the line, and which belonged to him before the war.

This line shall run from the confines of Bohemia near Weisse, into the environs of Seibenburg following the course of the river Wattich to its confluence with the Neisse.

From the Neisse it shall pass to the circle of d'Eigen, between Tauchritz, coming to Prussia, and Bertschell remaining in Saxony; then it shall follow the northern frontier of the circle of d'Eigen to the angle between Pautsdorff and Obersohland: thence it shall be continued to the limits which separate the circle of Goerlitz from that of Bautzen, so that Obermittel and Niedersohland, Olisch and Rudewitz remain to Saxony.

The great post road between Goerlitz and Bautzen, shall belong to Prussia, to the limits of the two abovementioned circles. Then the line shall follow the frontier of the circle of Dabruhe, then it shall extend over the heights to the right of Labaner Weisser, so that the river, with its two banks, and the places on the river to Neudorf, remain with the village of Saxony.

This line will then fall back upon the Sprec, and the Swart, Wasser, Litka, Hermsdorf, Kitten, and Solchdorff, are ceded to Prussia.

From Schwazze Elster, near Solchdorff, a straight line shall be drawn to the frontiers of the lordship of Kenigsbruck, near Grossgrabelen. This lordship remains with Saxony, and the line will follow the northern frontier of that lordship to that of the bailiwick of Grossenhagen, in the vicinity of Ortrand. Ortrand, and all from that place by Morsdorff, Sloezenhayn, Graben to Mulberg, with the villages which that route traverses, and in such a way that no part of the said route may lie beyond the Prussian territory, are transferred to the dominions of Prussia.

The frontier from Grabeln shall be traced to the Elbe near Fichtenberg, and shall follow that of the bailiwick of Mulberg. Fichtenberg falls to Prussia.

From the Elbe to the frontier of the country of Mersebourg it shall be drawn as the bailiwicks of Torgau.

Eciembourg and Delitch pass to Prussia, and those of Oschatz, Wawen, and Leipsick, remain incorporated with Saxony. The line will follow the boundaries of these bailiwicks, cutting some enclaves and semi-enclaves. The route from Mulberg to Eciembourg shall be entirely within the Prussian territory.

From Padelwitz belonging to the bailiwick of Leipsick, and composing part of Saxony to Eytra, likewise remaining with that state, the line will cut the country of Mersebourg in such a way that Bretonfield, Hancelen, Gross and Klein, Dolzig, Mark, Ramstadt, and Knaut Nauendorf, may remain with Saxony; Modelwitz, Skenditz, Klein Libenau, Alt Kanstadt, Schkehlen, and Zietschon, may be transferred to Prussia.

From that, the line shall cut the bailiwick of Pegau, between Flossgrahen and Weisse Elster. The first from the point where it separates itself above the city of Crossen, (which composes part of the balliwick of Hayonsbourg) from the Weisse Elster, to the point where below the city of Merscbourg it flows into the Saale, shall belong in the whole of its course and with both its banks between those two cities, to the Prussian territory.

Thence where the frontier terminates in that of the country of Zutz, it shall follow the latter to that of the country of Altenbourg near Luckau.

The boundaries of the circle of Neustradt, the whole of which is incorporated with Prussia, remain untouched. The districts of Voigtland, in the county of Reuss, namely, Getaill, Blilandorf, Sparemburg, and Blakenberg, are all comprised in the Prussian allotment.

Titles to be taken by the king of Prussia.

16. The provinces and districts of the kingdom of Saxony which are transferred to the dominions of the king of Prussia, shall be designated by the name of the duchy of Saxony; and his majesty will add to his titles, those of the duke of Saxony, landgrave of Thuringen, margrave of the two Lusatias, and count of Hannaberg. His majesty the king of Saxony shall continue to bear the title of margrave of High Lusatia; his majesty shall likewise continue to bear those of landgrave of Thuringia, and count of Henneberg, in relation to, and in virtue of his rights of succession to the possession of the Ernestian line.

Guarantee of Russia, England, Austria and France.

17. Austria, Russia, Great Britain and France, guarantee to his majesty the king of Prussia, his descendants and successors, the possession of the countries designated in the 15th article, in will, sovereignty and property.

Renunciation by Austria of the rights of sovereignty over Lusatia.

18. His imperial and royal apostolic majesty, desirous of giving to his majesty the king of Prussia a new proof of his anxiety on every subject of future dispute between the two courts, renounces for himself and his successors, the rights of sovereignty over the margravates of High and Low Lusatia, which belong to him as king of Bohemia, in as far as these rights extend to that part of those provinces which has been transferred to the dominions of the king of Prussia, in virtue of a treaty concluded with his majesty the king of Saxony, at Vienna, on the 18th of May, 1815.

As to what respects the right of reversion inherent in his imperial and royal majesty, to that part of the Losallas united to Prussia, it is transferred to the house of Brandenburg in actual possession of the throne of Prussia, his imperial and royal apostolic majesty reserving only to himself and his successors, the power of resuming that right in the event of the extinction of the said reigning family.

His imperial and royal apostolic majesty renounces equally in favor of his Prussian majesty the districts of Bohemia, included in the part of High Lusatia, ceded by the treaty of the 18th of May, 1815, to his Prussian majesty, the which contains the towns of Gmsterdorf, Tantuen tranke, Neukretchre Neider, Gorlascheim, Winckle and Rinekel, with their territories.

Reciprocal renunciation of the rights of feudality.

19. His majesty the king of Prussia, and his majesty the king of Saxony, anxiously desirous to remove every subject of future dispute or discussion, renounces each for himself, and reciprocally in favor of each other, every right or claim to feudality which they might exercise, or may have exercised, beyond the boundaries fixed by the present treaty.

Liberty of emigration, and of the export of property.

20. His majesty the king of Prussia promises to cause to be regulated, all that may concern the property and interests of the respective subjects on the most liberal principles. The present article shall particularly apply to the concerns of individuals who retain property under the two governments, Prussian and Saxon, to the commerce of Leipsic, and to all other matters of the same nature; and in order that the personal liberty of the inhabitants, both of the ceded provinces, and of others, be not restricted, they shall be free to emigrate from one territory to another, saving the obligation of military service, and upon complying with the forms required by law. They may also export their property without being subject to any duty of transfer.

Property of religious establishments, and of public instruction.

21. The communities, corporations, and religious establishments, and of public instruction, which exist in the provinces and districts ceded by his majesty the king of Saxony to Prussia, or in the provinces and districts which remain to his Saxon majesty, shall preserve, whatever shall be the change which their destination shall undergo, their property, as well as the revenues which belong to them, since the act of the foundation, or which have since been acquired by them by valid title, according to law, under the two denominations, Prussian and Saxon, so that the administration and revenues to come be not molested on one part or the other, in conformity always to the laws, and in support of the charges to which all properties or revenues of the same nature are subject in the territory in which they take place.

General amnesty.

22. No individual domiciled in the provinces under the domination of his Saxon majesty, no more than any individual domiciled in those, which, by the present treaty, pass under the domination of the king of Prussia, shall be touched in his person, his goods, rents, pensions, and revenues of all kinds, his rank and dignities, nor persecuted, nor sought after in any manner for any part which he may have taken politically or militarily in the events which may have taken place since the commencement of the war, terminated by the peace concluded at Paris, on the 30th of May, 1814. This article extends equally to those who, without being domiciled in one or the other part of Saxony, shall have had there funded property, rents, pensions, or revenues of any nature whatsoever.

Designation of the provinces of which Prussia resumes possession.

23. His majesty the king of Prussia having, by the result of the late war, re-entered into possession of several provinces and territories, which had been ceded by the treaty of Tilsit, it is recognized and declared by the present article, that his majesty, his heirs and successors, shall again possess, as before, in full property and sovereignty, the following countries, viz.

The portion of the former Polish provinces, designated in article 2; the city of Dantzic and its territory, such as it was fixed by the treaty of Tilsit; the circle of Cottbus; the old Mark; the portion of the circle of Magdeburg, on the left bank of the Elbe, with the circle of the Saale; the principality of Aalberstadt, with the lordships of Donenburg and Hassenrode; the town and territory of Quellenburg, with reservation of the rights of her royal highness the princess Sophia Albertina of Sweden, abbess of Quellenburg, conformably with the arrangements made in 1803.

The Prussian portion of the county of Mansfeld; the Prussian portion of the county of Hohenstein; the city and territory of Nordhausen; the town and territory of Maulhausen; the Prussian portion of the county of Gleichen; the lower lordship of Kranichfeld; the lordship of Blanckenhagen; the principality of Paderborn with the Prussian part of the bailiwicks of Schwallenberg, Oldenburg, and Stoppleberg, and the jurisdiction of Hagendorf and Odenhausen, situated in the territory of Lippe; the county of Marek, with the part of Lippstadt thereto belonging; the county of Werden; the county of Essen; the portion of the duchy of Cleves on the right bank of the Rhine, with the town and fortress of Wesel, the portion of that duchy situated on the left bank, being comprised in the provinces specified in article 25; the secularized chapter of Eften, the principality of Munster, i. e. the Prussian portion of the old duchy of Munster; the secularised provostship of Caltengburg; the county of Tecklenburg; the county of Liegan, with the exception of the portion ceded to Hanover by art. 7; the principality of Minden; the county of Ravensburg; the secularised chapter of Herford; the principality of Neufchatel with the county of Valingen, as their frontiers have been ascertained by the treaty of Paris, and by art. 76, of the present general treaty.

The same arrangements extend to the rights of sovereignty and superiority over the county of Wernigerode, to that of high protection over the county of Hohen Limburg, and to all other rights and claims whatever, which his Prussian majesty possessed and exercised before the peace of Tilsit, and which he has not renounced by other treaties, acts or conventions.

Prussian possessions on this side of the Rhine.

24. His majesty, the king of Prussia, shall unite to his monarchy in Germany, on this side the Rhine, to be possessed by himself and his successors, in full property and sovereignty, the following countries, viz.

The provinces of Saxony designated in article 15, with the exception of the places and territories ceded by virtue of article 39, to his royal highness the grand duke of Saxe Weimar; the territory ceded to Prussia by his Britannic majesty the king of Hanover, by art. 29; the portion of the district of Fulda and the territories therein comprised, indicated in art. 40; the town and territory of Wetzlan, as in art. 42; the grand duchy of Berg, with the lordships of Hardenburg, Droik, Styrum, Schoeler, and Odenthad, which formerly belonged to the said duchy under the Palatine government; the districts of the old archbishopric of Cologne, which latterly belonged to the grand duchy of Berg; the duchy of Westphalia, such as it was possessed by his royal highness the grand duke of Hesse; the county of Dormord; the principality of Corberg; the mediatised districts specified in art. 43.

The old possessions of the house of Nassau Dietz, having been ceded to Prussia by his majesty the king of the Netherlands, and a part of these possessions having been exchanged for districts belonging to their serene highnesses the duke and prince of Nassau, the king of Prussia shall possess in full sovereignty, and unite to his monarchy: 1. The principality of Siegen, with the bailiwicks of Hohen, of Burbach and Neukirchen, with the exception of a portion containing 12,000 inhabitants, which shall belong to the duke and prince of Nassau: 2d. The bailiwicks of Hohen Solms, Griefenstein, Braunsels, Frensbarg, Friedewalde, Schenstorf, Shoenberg, Altenkirchen, Altwiedt, Diedorf, Nimburch, Lioz, Hamerstein, with Eugers and Hondersdorf, the town and territory of Neuwid, the parish of Hamin belong to the bailwick of Hachenburgh, the parish of Horbanson, forming part of the bailwick of Vallandar and Eberenbreitstein on the right bank of the Rhine, designated in the convention between his majesty the king of Prussia and their serene highnesses the duke and prince of Nassau annexed to the present treaty.

Art. 25. The king of Prussia shall possess the countries on the left of the Rhine, included in the frontier thus designated.

This frontier shall commence on the Rhine at Bengen; it will thence ascend the Nahee to the confluence of this river with the Glan, then the Glan, to the village of Medart below Nauterecken, the towns of Krentznach and Meisenheim with their territories to belong entirely to Prussia; but Lauterecken and its territory to remain beyond the Prussian territory. From Glan the frontier to pass by Medart, Merzweiler, Langweiler, Neider and Ober; Feckenbetch, Ellenback, Creunchenhorn, Answeiler, Neider and Ober; Feckenbetch, Ellenback, Creunchenhorn, Answeiler, Cromweiler, Neiderbrambach, Buabach, Boeschweiler, Handweiler, Hambach and Rectzenberg, to the limits of the canton of Hermerskeil; all these places with their territory to belong to Prussia.

From Rectzenberg to the Sarre, the line of demarcation to follow the cantonal limits, so that the cantons of Hermerskeil and Conz, the last with the exception of the places on the left of the Sarre, shall remain wholly to Prussia, while the Cantons Wadern, Merzig and Sarrebourg are to be beyond the Prussian frontier.

From the point where the limit of the canton of Conz, below Gomlingen traverses the Sarre, the line will descend the Sarre till it flows into the Moselle, thence it will remount the Moselle till its confluence with the Sarre, ascend the latter river, till the embouchure of the Our, and the Our the limits of the late department of the Ourthe. The places traversed by these rivers shall in no wise be divided, but belong with their territories to the power in whose state the greatest part of these places shall be situated. These rivers themselves, in so far as they form the frontier, shall belong in common to the two bordering powers.

In the old department of the Ourthe, the five cantons of Saint Vith, Malmedy, Cronenberg, Schfeiden, Aubel, to the south of Aix la Chapelle, belong to Prussia, and the frontier shall follow that of these cantons in such a manner, that a line drawn from north to south may cut the said point of the canton of Aubel and be prolonged to the point of contact of the three old departments of the Ourthe, the Lower Meuse, and the Roer; leaving that point, the frontier shall follow the line which separates these two last departments till it reach the river Worm, (having its mouth in the Roer) and shall go along this river till the point where it again touches the limits of these two departments; it shall pursue that limit to the south of Hillensberg remount from thence towards the north, and leaving Hillensberg to Prussia, and cutting the canton of Sittard in two parts nearly equal, so that Sittard and Susteren remain on the left, shall reach the old Dutch territory; then following the old frontier of that territory to the point where it touched the old Austrian principality of Gueldres, on the side of Ruremonde, and directing itself towards the most eastern point of the Dutch territory to the north of Swalmen, it shall continue to embrace this territory.

When it proceeds to join, setting out from the most eastern point, that other part of the Dutch territory in which Venloo is situated; it shall include that town and its territory. Thence to the old Dutch frontier near Mook, situated below Genep; it shall follow the course of the Meuse at a distance from the right bank, so that all the places which are not distant from this bank more than 1000 German perches, shall belong, with their territories to the kingdom of the Netherlands, but no point of the bank of the Meuse to make a part of the Prussian territory which shall not approach it by 800 German perches.

From the point where the line just described reaches the old Dutch frontier to the Rhine, that frontier shall remain essentially as it was in 1795, between Cleves and the United Provinces. It shall be examined by the commission, which shall be named without delay by the two governments, to proceed to the exact determination of the limits, both of the kingdom of the Netherlands and the grand duchy of Luxemburg, designated in articles 66 and 68, and this commission shall regulate, with the aid of experienced persons, whatever concerns the hydrotechnic construction and other analogous point in the manner the most equitable and comfortable to the mutual interest of the Prussian states and the Netherlands. The same disposal extends to the determination of the limits in the districts of Kyswaerd, Lobith, and all the territory of Kekerdom.

The places Huissen, Malburgh, the Limers, with the town of Sevenaer and the lordship of Woel, shall make part of the kingdom of the Netherlands; and his Prussian majesty, for himself and his successors, renounces all right to them in perpetuity.

The king of Prussia, in uniting to his states the provinces and districts designated in this and the preceding article, is invested with all the rights, and takes on himself all the charges and engagements stipulated with regard to the countries detached from France in the treaty of Paris, May 30, 1814.

The Prussian provinces on the two banks of the Rhine to above the town of Cologne, which is included in this arrondissement, shall bear the name of Grand Duchy of the Lower Rhine, and his majesty shall assume the corresponding title.

Kingdom of Hanover.

26. His Britannic majesty having substituted for his old title of elector that of king of Hanover, and this title being recognized by the powers of Europe, and by the princes, and free cities of Germany, the countries hitherto composing the electorate of Brunswick Lüneburg, as their limits are in future fixed by the following articles, shall form hereafter the kingdom of Hanover.

Cessions by Prussia to Hanover.

27. The king of Prussia cedes to the king of Hanover,

1. The principality of Hildesheim. 2. The town and territory of Goslar. 3. The principality of East Friesland, including the district called Harlingerland, under the stipulations, article 50, respecting the navigation of the Ems, and the commerce of Embden. The states of the principality shall preserve their rights and privileges. 4. The lower county of Lingen, and the part of the principality of the Prussian Munster, situated between that county and the part of the Rheina Wolbek, possessed by the Hanoverian government. But as Hanover is to obtain by this cession an addition of territory containing a population of 22,000 souls, and as the lower county of Lingen and that part of the principality of Munster, formerly mentioned may not fulfil this condition, the king of Prussia, engages to extend the line of demarcation into the principality of Munster, so far as may be necessary to give that population. A commission which shall be named for fixing the limits, shall be specially charged with the execution of this arrangement.

28. The king of Prussia renounces the claims which he might have as sovereign of Erchsfeid on the chapter of St. Peter in the Burg of Noerton, or upon the dependencies situated in the Hanoverian territory.

Cessions by Hanover to Prussia.

29. The king of Hanover cedes to Prussia,

1. That part of the duchy of Lauenburg situated on the right bank of the Elbe, with the Lauenburg villages on the same bank; that part of the duchy situated on the left bank remains to the kingdom of Hanover. The states shall preserve their rights and privileges. 2. The bailiwick of Kloetse. 3. The bailiwick of Elbingerode. 4. The village of Rudigershayn and Gauseich. 5. The bailiwick of Reckeberg.

Navigation and commerce.

30. The king of Prussia and his Britannic majesty, respecting the commerce of the Ems and the port of Embden, agree,

1st. The Hanoverian government agrees to execute at its expense in the year 1815 and 1816, the works which a commission shall judge necessary, to render the part of the Ems, navigable from the frontier of Prussia to its mouth, and to maintain these works.

2d. Prussian subjects may import and export at Embden, and keep up magazines there, without being subject to any other inspection than that to which Hanoverians may be subjected.

3d. Prussian ships and merchants shall pay no other tolls or duties than what are paid by Hanoverians. These tolls and duties to be regulated in common by Prussia and Hanover.

4th. Prussian subjects shall not be obliged to employ merchants of Embden in carrying on their trade, and may trade either with the inhabitants of the town or foreigners, without paying any other duties than those paid by Hanoverian subjects.

The king of Prussia on his part allows to Hanoverian subjects the free navigation of the canal of Stecknitz.

His Prussian majesty besides engages to guarantee these advantages to the subjects of Hanover, in case the duchy of Lauenburg should be ceded to any other sovereign.

Military routes.

31. The king of Prussia and the king of Hanover agree to the military routes through their respective states.

1. One from Halberstadt by the territory of Hildesheim to Minden. 2. A second from the old march by Gihorn and Nenstadt to Minden. 3. A third from Osnabruck by Ippenburen and Rheina to Bentheim. The two first in favor of Prussia, and the third in favor of Hanover.

Mediatized territories.

32. The bailiwick of Meppin, belonging to the duke of Arenberg, as well as the part of Rheina Wolbeck, belonging to the duke of Loos Corswaren, which are at this moment provisionally occupied by the Hanoverian government, shall be placed in such relations with the kingdom of Hanover, as the federative constitution of Germany shall regulate for the mediatized territories.

The Prussian and Hanoverian governments having reserved to themselves the agreeing hereafter, if necessary, as to the fixing of another frontier, respecting the country belonging to the duke of Coos Corzwaren, the said governments shall charge the commission to be named for fixing the limits of the part of the county of Lingen, ceded to Hanover, to fix definitely the frontiers of the county of Looz Corzwaren.

The relations between the Hanoverian government and the county of Bentheim shall remain as regulated by the treaties hypothec, existing between his Britannic majesty and the count of Bentheim; and after the duties fixed by this treaty shall be extinguished, the county of Bentheim shall be in those relations towards the kingdom of Hanover, which the federative constitution of Germany shall regulate for the mediatised territories.

Cessions ceded to the duke of Oldenburg.

33. The king of Hanover shall procure for the duke of Oldenburg a district containing a population of 5000 inhabitants.

34, 35, 36. Confer the titles of grand dukes on the dukes of Oldenburg, Mecklenburg, Schwerin and Strelitz, and Saxe-Weimar.

Cessions of Prussia to the grand duke of Saxe-Weimar.

37. The king of Prussia shall cede from the mass of his state, to the grand duke of Saxe-Weimar, districts containing 50,000 inhabitants, contiguous or near to the principality of Weimar.

His Prussian majesty engages also to cede, out of the principality of Fulda, districts of a population of 27,000 inhabitants.

Further determination of the countries to be ceded by to the grand duke of Weimar.

38. The districts to be ceded to Saxe-Weimar, in virtue of the present article, shall be determined by a particular convention, and the king of Prussia engages to conclude this convention, and to convey these districts, within two months after the 1st of June, 1815.

Possessions to be made immediately.

39. The king of Prussia cedes at present to his royal highness, the following districts and territories, viz:

The lordship of Blankenhayn, with the reservation of the bailiwick of Wanderlenhen. The lower lordship of Kranichfeld, and the Commanderies of the Teutonic order, Zwaetzen-Lebesten and Liehstandt, with their demesnal revenues, which form part of the bailiwick of Bekartsberga, and out of the territory of Saxe-Weimar, as well as all the other territories interwoven into the principality of Weimar, and belonging to the said bailiwick; the bailiwick of Tensenburg, with the exception of Droitzen, Hosenhen, Wehaburg, Wattersneid, Moiteheig, which shall remain to Prussia. The village of Remsia, and the villages of Klein-Brembach and Berlistedt, cutting into the principality of Weimar, and belonging to the territory of Erfurth. The villages of Bisscheffroda and Prossteizella, running into the territory of Eisenach.

The population of these different districts shall be included in the 50,000 souls secured to the grand duke of Saxe-Weimar by article 60.

Cession of the Ci-Devant department of Fulda to Prussia.

40. The department of Fulda with the territories of the ancient nobles actually comprised under the provincial administration of this department viz: the bailiwicks of Hammelburg, with Thulba and Saleck, Bruckenan with Morsen, Saaumunster with Urzell, and Zoonerz, the part of the bailiwick of Biberstern which contains the villages of Basten

Brand, Diciges, Findlos, Liebharrs, Melperz, Cher Bernhardt, Saiffertz and Thaiden, as well as the domain of Holzkerchen running into the grand duchy of Wurzburg, is ceded to the king of Prussia.

The domain of the principality of Fulda.

41. The domains of the principality of Fulda and of the county of Hanau having been sold, without the purchasers having yet fulfilled all the conditions of payment, there shall be named by the princes under whose dominion those districts pass, a commission to regulate uniformly every thing that relates to this affair. The commission shall particularly have respect to the treaty concluded the 2d of December, 1813, at Frankfort, between the allied powers and his royal highness the elector of Hesse.

Wetzlar.

The town and territory of Wetzlar shall belong to Prussia.

Mediatized Countries in the old Circle of Westphalia.

43. The mediatised districts following, viz. the possessions which the princes of Salm Salm and Salm Kyrburg, the counts denominated the Rineund Wildgrafen, and the duke of Croy, obtained by the principal Reces of the extraordinary deputation of the empire of the 25th Feb. 1803, in the old circle of Westphalia, as well as the lordships Anhalt and Gelmen, the possessions of the duke of Looz Corzwaren, which are in the same situation (in as far as they are not placed under the Hanoverian government) the county of Steinturth belonging to the count of Bentheim, the county of Bucklinghausen, belonging to the duke of Aremburg, the lordships of Rheda, Gutersloh and Gronan, belonging to the count of Bentheim Tickenburg; the county of Reitberg, belonging to the prince Kaunitz; the lordships of Neustadt and Gunborn belonging to count Waldmoden; and the lordship of Homburg, belonging to the count of Sayer-Wittgenstein-Berleburg, shall be placed in such relations with the Prussian monarchy, as the federative constitution of Germany shall regulate for mediatised territories.

The possessions of the ancient immediate nobility within the limits of the Prussian territory, and particularly the lordship of Wildenberg, in the grand duchy of Berg, and the barony of Schauen, in the principality of Halberstadt, shall belong to the Prussian monarchy.

Disposition relative to the grand duchy of Wurtzburg, and the principality of Aschaffenburg in favor of Bavaria.

44. The king of Bavaria shall possess the grand duchy of Wurtzburg, as it was possessed by the archduke Ferdinand of Austria, and the principality of Aschaffenburg, as it made part of the duchy of Frankfurt.

Maintenance of the prince primate.

45. The prince primate to be treated in a manner analogous to the articles of the Reces, which in 1803 fixed the situation of the secularized princes, and shall receive from the 1st of June, 1814, an annuity of 100,000 florins, payable quarterly.

Free city of Frankfurt.

46. The town of Frankfurt, with its territory as in 1803, is declared free, and shall make a part of the Germanic league. All the different religious sects shall be on an equality.

Indemnities to the grand duke of Hesse.

47. The grand duke of Hesse shall obtain, in exchange for the duchy of Westphalia, ceded to the king of Prussia, the sovereignty of a territory on the left bank of the Rhine, in the department of Mount Tonnerre, comprehending a population of Hesse Homburg.

Future arrangement relative to these territories.

Countries on both banks of the Rhine given to Austria.

Rules respecting the plurality of votes.

The plurality of votes shall be the rule in both assemblies, with this difference, that in the ordinary assembly an absolute plurality shall suffice, while in the other, two-thirds shall be necessary.

The diet is permanent, but may adjourn from time to time.

Order of votes.

60. After drawing up organic laws, the diet shall deliberate on the manner of fixing the order of voting, in a permanent manner.

61. The diet shall sit at Frankfort on the Main, and open on the 1st of September, 1815.

Fundamental laws.

62. The first object of the diet shall be the framing fundamental laws for the confederation and organical institutions, relative to its external, military and internal relations.

Maintenance of peace in Germany.

63. The states of the confederation engage to defend each other from all attack.

When war is begun, no member can enter on separate negotiations.

The members of the confederation, reserving to themselves the right of forming alliances, oblige themselves to contract no engagement contrary to the security of the confederation.

The confederated states engage not to make war on each other under any pretext, but to submit their differences to the diet.

64. The articles included under the title of particular dispositions, in the act of the Germanic confederation, to have the same force as if here inserted.

Kingdom of the Netherlands and grand duchy of Luxemburg.

65. The old united provinces and the former Belgic provinces shall form conjointly with the territories designated in the following article, under the sovereignty of the prince of Orange Nassau, the kingdom of the Netherlands.

Limits.

66. The line comprehending the territories which compose the kingdom of the Netherlands is determined in the following manner:—It leaves the sea and extends along the frontiers of France, on the side of the low countries, as fixed by the treaty of Paris, to the Meuse; thence along the same frontiers to the old limits of the duchy of Luxemburg; thence it follows the direction of the limits between that duchy and the old bishoprick of Liege, till it meets (to the south of Deiffel) the western limits of that canton and of that of Malmédy, to the point where the latter reaches the limits between the old departments of the Ourthe and the Roer; it shall then go along these limits till they touch those of the former French canton of Eupen in the duchy of Limburg; and following the western limit of that canton in the direction of the north, leaving to the right a small part of the former French canton of Aube, joins at the point of contact of the three old departments of the Ourthe, the Lower Meuse and the Roer; setting out from this point, the said line follows that which separates these two departments till where it touches the Worm (a river falling into the Roer) and going along this river till the point where it again reaches the limit of these two departments, pursues this limit to the south of Hillesburgh (the old department of the Roer) remounts from thence towards the north, and leaving Hillesburgh to the right, and cutting the canton of Bitard in two parts, nearly equal, so that Sittard and Susteren remain to the left, arrives at the old Dutch territory; then leaving this territory to the left, it follows its eastern frontier to the point where it touches the old Austrian principality of the Gaeldres, on the side of the Baronond, and directing itself towards the most eastern point of the Dutch territory to the north of Schwalmen, continues to embrace this territory.

Then it joins, setting out from the most eastern point, that other part of the Dutch territory in which Venloo is situated; it will include that town and its territory. From thence to the old Dutch frontier, near Mook, situated below Genap, it shall follow the course of the Meuse at such distance from the right bank, that all the places which are not distant from that bank more than a thousand German perches (Rheinländische Ruthen) shall belong, with their territories, to the kingdom of the Netherlands.

From the point where this line reaches the old Dutch frontier to the Rhine, that frontier shall remain essentially as it was in 1795, between Cleves, and the United Provinces.

The enclaves of Huizen, Malburg, Lymers, with the town of Savenaar, and the lordship of Weel, shall make part of the kingdom of the Netherlands, and his Prussian majesty renounces them forever.

Grand duchy of Luxemburg

67. The part of the old duchy of Luxemburg, comprised in the following article, is equally ceded to the sovereign of the Netherlands, who shall add to his titles grand duchy of Luxemburg.

The grand duchy of Luxemburg serving as a compensation for the principalities of Nassau, Dillenburg, Siegen, Hadamar and Dietz, shall form one of the states of the Germanic confederation.

The town of Luxemburg shall be considered in a military relation as a fortress of the confederation. The grand duke shall however, have the power of naming the governor and military commandant of the fortress, subject to the approbation of the executive power of the confederation.

Limits of the grand duchy of Luxemburg.

68. The grand duchy of Luxemburg shall consist of all the territories situated between the kingdom of the Netherlands, such as it has been designated in article 66. France, the Moselle, as far as the mouth of the Sure, the course of the Sure as far as the junction of the Our, and the course of this last river as far as the limits of the former French canton of St. Vith, which shall not belong to the grand duchy.

Arrangements relative to the grand duchy of Bouillon.

69. His majesty the king of the Netherlands, grand duke of Luxemburg, shall possess in perpetuity of himself and his successors, the full and entire sovereignty of that part of the duchy of Bouillon, which is not ceded to France by the treaty of Paris, and under this arrangement it shall be united to the grand duchy of Luxemburg.

Some disputes having arisen with respect to the said duchy of Bouillon, he of the competitors whose claims shall be legally established, in the modes hereafter specified, shall possess in full property the said part of the duchy, such as it was enjoyed by the last duke, under the sovereignty of his majesty the king of the Netherlands, grand duke of Luxemburg.

Cessions of possessions of the house of Nassau Orange in Germany.

70. His majesty the king of the Netherlands shall renounce in perpetuity, for himself, his successors and descendants, in favor of his majesty the king of Prussia, the sovereign possessions which the house of Nassau Orange held in Germany, and particularly the principalities of Dillenburg, Deitz, Siegen and Hadamar, comprising the lordship of Bielsom, as those possessions were definitively arranged between the two branches of the house of Nassau, by the treaty concluded at the Hague on the 14th July, 1814. His majesty equally renounces his right to the principality of Valda, and to the other districts and territories which were secured to him by the 12th article of the principal Reces of the extraordinary deputations of the empire of the 25th February, 1803.

Family compact between the princes of Nassau.

71. The right and order of succession established between the two branches of the house of Nassau by the act of 1783, called Nassau-sicher Erbverein, is confirmed and transferred from the four principalities of Orange Nassau to the grand duchy of Luxemburg.

Charges and engagements adhering to the provinces detached from France.

72. His majesty the king of the Netherlands, in uniting under his sovereignty the countries designated in the 66th and 68th articles, enters upon all the rights, and takes upon himself all the expense and all the stipulated engagements relative to the provinces and districts detached from France by the treaty of peace concluded at Paris the 30th of March, 1814.

Act of union of the Belgic provinces.

73. His majesty the king of the Netherlands, having recognized and sanctioned, under the date of the 21st July, 1814, as the bases of the union of the Belgic provinces with the united provinces, the eight articles contained in the document annexed to the present treaty, the said articles shall have the same force and validity as if they were inserted word for word.

Affairs of Switzerland.

74. The integrity of the 19 cantons as determined by the convention of the 29th December, 1813, is recognized as the bases of the Helvetic system.

Union of the three new Cantons.

75. The Vallais, the territory of Geneva, and the principality of Neuchâtel, are united to Switzerland. The valley of Dappes having formed part of the canton of Vaud, is restored to it.

76. The bishopric of Basle, and the city and territory of Bienne, shall be united to the Helvetic confederation and form part of the canton of Berne.

The following are exceptions from this arrangement.

1st. A district of about three square leagues, including the communes of Allachweller, Schenbach, Oberweiler, Terweiler, Ettingen, Fursteutem, Plotten, Pfessingen, Aesch, Bruck, Reinach, and Arlesheim, shall be united to the canton of Basle.

2. A small enclave, situated near the village of Neuchâtellois de Lignier, which, at present, with respect to civil jurisdiction, is under the sovereignty of the canton of Neuchâtel, and with respect to criminal jurisdiction under that of the bishopric of Basle, shall belong in complete sovereignty to the principality of Neuchâtel.

Rights of the inhabitants of the countries united to Berne.

77. The inhabitants of the bishopric of Basle, and those of Bienne, united to the cantons of Berne and Basle, shall enjoy in every respect, without any distinction of religion, (which shall be maintained as at present) the same political and civil rights which are enjoyed or may be enjoyed by the inhabitants of the ancient parts of the said cantons. Consequently they shall have an equal right with them to fill these functions which are specified in the constitutions of the cantons.

The sale of national dominions is guaranteed: and the feudal rents and tithes cannot be re-established.

Lordship of Razuno.

78. The cession made by the 5th article of the treaty of Vienna, of the 14th October, 1809, of the lordship of Razuno enclave, in the county of Grisons, having ceased, and his Austrian majesty, being restored to all his rights with respect to the said possessions, confirms the disposition of it which he made by the declaration of the 20th March, 1815, in favor of the canton of the Grisons.

Arrangements between France and Geneva.

79. In order to secure the commercial and military communications of Geneva with the canton of Vaud and the rest of Switzerland, and to complete in that respect the 4th article of the treaty of Paris, his most christian majesty consents to place the line of custom-houses in such a manner that the road which leads from Geneva to Vevey into Switzerland, shall at all times be free, and that neither posts nor travellers, nor the transit of merchandize, shall be interrupted by any inspection of officers, nor subjected to any duty. It is equally understood, that no obstacle shall be interposed on the part of Switzerland.

The rest of this article relates to similar arrangements with respect to other parts of Switzerland.

Cession of the king of Sardinia to the canton of Geneva.

80. His majesty the king of Sardinia cedes that part of Savoy which is situated between the river Arve, the Rhone, the limits of the part of Savoy ceded to France, and the mountains of Saleve as far as Vevey inclusive, together with that which is comprised between that great road called Simplon, the lake of Geneva, and the actual territory of the canton of Geneva, from Venezas to the point where the river of Hermance crosses the said road, and from thence, following the course of that river, to its mouth in the lake of Geneva, to the east of the village of Hermance (the whole of the road called Simplon continuing in the possession of his Sardinian majesty.) The country to be united to the canton of Geneva, in full and entire sovereignty.

His Sardinian majesty also agrees that the communication between the canton of Geneva and the Vallais by the road of Simplon, shall be established in the same way agreed upon by France with respect to the canton of Valais by the road of Vercoy. A front passage for Genevese troops is likewise stipulated; and an exemption from all duties payable by merchandize and provisions in passing from the Sardinian territory and the free port of Genoa. This exemption applies only to transit duties, and does not apply to tolls payable for the maintenance of the roads, nor to merchandize, or provisions intended to be sold or consumed in the interior.

Compensations to be established between the ancient and the new cantons.

81. To provide mutual compensations, the cantons of Argovia, of Vaud, of Tessin, of St. Gall, shall furnish to the ancient cantons of Schweiz, Unterwald, Uri, Glaris, Zug and Appenzelle, a certain sum which shall be applied to public instruction, and to the expenses of general administration, but principally to the former object.

The canton of Argovia, Vaud and St. Gall, shall furnish to the cantons of Schweiz, Unterwald, Uri, Zug, Glaris, Appenzelle, a fund of 500,000 Swiss livres. The canton of Tessin shall pay annually to the canton of Uri half the product of the tolls in the Levantine valley.

82. This article relates to the funds placed in England, by the cantons of Zurich and Berne, by which it is decreed that those cantons shall retain the property of the capital funds, such as they existed in 1803, at the period of the dissolution of the Helvetic government, and shall enjoy the interest as it accrues, dating from the 1st of Jan. 1815. The interest which has accumulated since 1793 to 1814 inclusive, shall be applied to the discharge of the remaining capital of the national debt, designated under the denomination of the Helvetic debt. The surplus of that debt shall remain chargeable upon the other cantons, those of Berne and Zurich being exonerated.

The districts incorporated with Switzerland since 1813, shall not be taxed on account of the old Helvetic debts.

83. Provides indemnities for the proprietors of lands.

84. Confirms the declaration addressed on the 20th of March, by the allied powers, who signed the treaty of Paris, to the diet of the Swiss confederation.

Limits of the estates of the king of Sardinia.

85. The limits of the estates of his majesty the king of Sardinia, shall be

On the side of France such as they were on the 1st of January, 1792, with the exception of those changes caused by the treaty of Paris, 1814:

On the side of the Helvetic confederation, such as they existed on the 1st January, 1792, with the exception of the change produced by the cession in favor of the canton of Geneva: such as the cession is specified by the 80th article of the present act:

On the side of the emperor of Austria's states, such as they existed on the 1st of January, 1792; and the convention concluded between the empress Maria Theresa and the king of Sardinia, on the 4th of October, 1751, shall be mutually maintained:

On the side of the states of Parma and Placentia, the limits so far as concerns the ancient states of the king of Sardinia, shall continue the same as they were on the 1st of January, 1792.

The limits of the former states of Genoa, and of the countries called imperial fiefs, united to the states of the kingdom of Sardinia, according to the following articles, shall be the same as those which on the 1st of January 1792, separated those colonies from the states of Parma and Placentia, and from those of Tuscany and Massa.

The island of Capraia, which formerly belonged to the republic of Genoa, is included in the cession of the Genoese territory to the king of Sardinia.

Union of Genoa.

86. The states, which formerly constituted the republic of Genoa, are united in perpetuity to those of the king of Sardinia, to be possessed by him in full sovereignty, and to descend in the male line in the order of primogeniture, through the two branches of his house, viz. the royal branch and the branch of Savoy Carignano.

87. The king of Sardinia to assume the title of the duke of Genoa.

88. The Genoese to enjoy all the rights and privileges specified in the act entitled, "conditions which are to serve as the bases of the union of the Genoese states to those of Sardinia."

Union of the imperial fiefs.

89. The countries called imperial fiefs, which were united to the former Ligurian republic, are definitely united to the states of his Sardinian majesty in the same manner as the rest of the Genoese territory.

Right of fortification.

90. His Sardinian majesty to enjoy the same right of fortifying such points of his states as he may judge proper, in the same way as is provided by the 3d article of the treaty of Paris, with respect to the sovereigns who signed the treaty.

Cessions to the canton of Geneva.

91. The king of Sardinia cedes to the canton of Geneva the districts of Savoy, designated in the article above, according to the conditions specified in the act, entitled "cessions made by the king of Sardinia to the canton of Geneva."

92. The provinces of the Chablais, and of Faucigny, and all the territory of Savoy, to the north of Ugina, belonging to the king of Sardinia, shall be part of the neutrality of Switzerland, according as it was recognized and guaranteed by the high allied powers.

Ancient possessions of Austria.

93. The powers who sign the present treaty, recognize the emperor of Austria, his heirs and successors, as legitimate sovereign of the provinces and territories which were ceded, whether wholly or in part, by the treaties of Campo Formio, 1799, of Luneville, in 1801, of Presburg in 1805, the additional convention of Fontainebleau in 1807, and of Vienna in 1809, and in the possession of those provinces and territories which his imperial and apostolic majesty re-entered into in consequence of the last war, viz. Istria, both Austrian and Venitian. Dalmatia, the Venetian isles of the Adriatic, the mouths of the Cattaro, the city of Venice, the Lagunes, the same as the other provinces and districts of Terra Firma, of the states hitherto Venitian on the left bank of the Adige, the duchies of Milan and Mantua, the principalities of Brixan and Trent, the country of the Tyrol, the Voralberg, Austrian and Venitian Friuli, the territory of Montefalcone, the government and city of Trieste, Carniola, the Upper Carinthia, Croatia, on the right of Saave, Fiume, the Hungarian Littorale, and the district of Castua.

Countries united to the Austrian monarchy.

94. By this article his imperial majesty obtains in full sovereignty for himself and successors

1. Besides the portions of terra firma of the Venitian states already mentioned, the other parts of of the said states, as well as all other territories situated between the Tessin, the Po, and the Adriatic sea,

2. The vallies of the Valteline, of Bormio, and of Chiavenna.

3. The territories which formed the ci-devant republic of Ragusa.

Austrian frontiers in Italy.

95. On the side of the king of Sardinia, such as they were on the 1st January 1792.

On the side of Parma, Placentia and Guastalla, the course of the Po, the line of demarcation following the Thalweg or way of the river.

On the sides of the states of Modena, the same as they were on the 1st January 1792.

On the side of the papal states, the course of the Po as far as the mouth of the Goro.

On the side of Switzerland, the ancient frontier of Lombardy; and that which separates the vallies of the Valteline, of Bormio and Chiavenna from the cantons of the Grisons and the Tessin. Where the course of the Po constitutes the limit, it is agreed that the changes which the bed of that river may undergo, shall not, in future, have any effect upon the property of the islands found in it.

Navigation of the Po.

96. The general principles adopted by the congress at Vienna for the navigation of the rivers, shall be applicable to that of the Po.

97. This article provides arrangements by which the establishment known under the name of Mount Napoleon at Milan, shall be enabled to fulfil its engagements towards its creditors.

States of Modena, Massa, and Carrara.

98. His royal highness the archduke Francis D'Este, his heirs and successors, shall possess in full sovereignty the duchies of Modena, Reggio, and Mirandola, in the same extent as they were at the signing of the treaty of Campo Formio.

The archduchess Maria Beatrix D'Este, her heirs and successors, shall possess the duchy of Massa, and the principality of Carrara, as well as the imperial fiefs in La Lunigina.

Parma and Placentia.

99. Her majesty the empress Maria Louisa, shall possess in full sovereignty the duchies of Parma, Placentia and Guastalla, with the exception of the districts included in the state of his imperial majesty on the left bank of the Po.

The reversibility of these countries shall be determined by the common consent of the courts of Austria, Russia, France, Spain, England and Prussia, always taking care to respect the rights of reversion of the house of Austria and the king of Sardinia, on the said countries.

Possessions of the grand duke of Tuscany.

100. The archduke Ferdinand, of Austria, is restored to all his rights of sovereignty over the grand duchy of Tuscany and its dependencies, as he possessed them before the treaty of Luneville.

The stipulations of the second article of the treaty of Vienna, of the 3d of October, 1735, between the emperor Charles VI. and the king of France, to which the other powers acceded, are fully re-established in favor of his imperial highness and his descendants; as well as the guarantees resulting from those stipulations.

The following territories in addition are to be united to the grand duchy, and possessed by the grand duke Ferdinand and his heirs.

1. The states of Presides.
2. That part of the island of Elba and its appurtenances, which were under the superiority of the king of the two Sicilies before the year 1801.
3. The sovereignty of the principality of Piombino, and its dependencies.

Principality of Piombino.

Prince Ludouist Buonconipagni retains for himself and his legitimate successors all the property which his family possessed in the principality of Piombino, in the island of Elba, and its dependencies, before the occupation of that country by the French troops in 1799.

4. The former imperial fiefs of Vernio, Mentauro and Monte Santa Maria, inclosed in the Tuscan States.

Duchy of Lucca.

The principality of Lucca shall be possessed in full sovereignty by her majesty the infanta Maria Louisa and descendants, in the direct male line.—The principality is erected into a duchy, and shall have a form of government founded upon the principles of that which it received in 1305.

A rent of 500,000 francs is added to the revenue of this principality, to be paid regularly by the emperor of Austria and the grand duke of Tuscany, as long as circumstances shall prevent them from procuring for her majesty the infanta Maria Louisa, and to her son and her descendants, some other establishment.

102. The duchy of Lucca shall be reversible to the grand duke of Tuscany, in case of the death of her majesty the infanta Maria Louisa, or her son Don Carlos, and of their descendants; or in case the infanta Maria Louisa, or her direct heirs, shall obtain any other establishment, or succeed to any other branch of their dynasty.

The grand duke of Tuscany, in case the said reversion shall fall to him, engages to cede, as soon as he enters into the possession of Lucca, to the duke of Modena, the following territories:

1. The Tuscan districts of Fivizzano, Pietra, Sante and Barga.
2. The Lucca districts of Castiglione and Calliano inclosed in the states of Modena, as well as those of Minucciano and Monto Ignoso, contiguous to the country of Massa.

Disposition relative to the Holy See.

103. The Marches, with Camerino and their dependencies as well as the duchy of Benevento, and the principality of Ponto Corvo, are restored to the holy see.

The holy see to resume its possessions of the longations of Ravenna, Bologna, and Ferrara, with the exception of that part of Ferrara, situate on the left bank of the Po.

His imperial majesty, and his successors, have the right of garrison in the fortresses of Ferrara and Commachio.

104. Declares the re-establishment of Ferdinand IV. on the throne of Naples.

Affairs of Portugal.

105. The powers recognize the justice of the claims made by his royal highness the prince regent of Portugal, on the city of Olivenza and the other territories ceded to Spain by the treaty of Badajoz in 1801, and considering their restitution as one of the measures proper to confirm between the two kingdoms of the peninsula, that complete and stable harmony, the preservation of which throughout Europe has been the constant object of their arrangements, formally engage themselves to employ, for the purpose of conciliation, the most efficacious efforts, in order that the retrocession of the said territories in favor of Portugal may be effected. And the powers recognized as far as depends on each of them, that this arrangement should take place forthwith.

Relations between France and Portugal.

106. In order to remove the difficulties which interposed to prevent the prince regent of Portugal from ratifying the treaty signed on the 30th May, 1814, between Portugal and France, it is decreed that the stipulation contained in the 10th article of that treaty, and all those which relate to it, are null and void, and shall be replaced by the provisions contained in the following article—(All the other clauses of the said treaty of Paris, are to be maintained and fulfilled.)

107. His royal highness, the prince regent of Portugal, to manifest his high consideration for his most christian majesty, agrees to restore to his said majesty French Guiana as far as the river Oyapock, the mouth of which is situated between the fourth and fifth degrees of north latitude, a limit which Portugal has always considered as that which was fixed by the treaty of Utrecht.

The time for giving up this colony to be determined as soon as circumstances will permit, by a particular agreement between the two courts.—And they shall proceed in a friendly manner, as soon as possible, to the definite fixing of the limits of Portuguese and French Guiana, conformably to the precise meaning of the 8th article of the treaty of Utrecht.

GENERAL DISPOSITIONS.

Navigation of rivers.

108. The powers whose states are separated, or crossed by the same navigable river engage to arrange, by common consent, all that regards the navigation of such river. For this purpose they shall name commissioners, who shall assemble at latest within six months after the congress, and who shall take as the basis of their work, the principles established in the following articles.

109. The navigation from the source to the mouth of the rivers shall be perfectly free, and shall not with respect to commerce, be forbidden, to any body, the regulations for the police being complied with, which shall be made uniform, as favorable to trade as possible.

110. The system for the receipt of taxes, as well as for the police, shall be the same along the whole course of the river, and shall apply to its navigable branches, as far as circumstances permit.

Tariff.

111. The duties on navigation shall be fixed in a uniform and invariable manner, and so independent of the nature of the merchandize as to render all examination of the cargo unnecessary. The amount of the duties shall not exceed the sum now paid, and shall be determined by local and existing circumstances.

In fixing the tariff, the object shall be to encourage commerce, by facilitating navigation, and the impost established on the Rhine, shall serve as the approximative rule. When once the tariff is settled it shall not be altered but by common consent of the states interested.

112. The officers of receipt shall be as few as possible, to be fixed by common consent.

113. Every river state shall be charged with the maintenance of the towing paths through its territory, and other works necessary for the uninterrupted navigation.

114. The customs due to the states shall have no connection with the payment for navigation. Care shall be taken that the officers oppose no unnecessary obstacles to navigation.

Regulation.

116. All that is contained in the preceding articles shall be determined by a mutual regulation, which shall include all that is necessary to fix ultimately. The regulation cannot be changed without the consent of all states bordering on the rivers.

Navigation of the Rhine, Necker, &c.

117. The particular regulations for the navigation of the Rhine, the Necker, the Maine, the Moselle, the Meuse, the Scheldt, which are affixed to the present act, shall have the same force as if they were inserted in the text.

Confirmations of treaties and particular acts.

The treaties, conventions, declarations, regulations and other special acts which are annexed to the present act, viz.

1. The treaty between Russia and Austria, of the 22d April (4th May) 1815.

2. The treaty between Russia and Prussia, of the 21st April (3d May) 1815.

3. The additional treaty relative to Cracow between Austria, Prussia and Russia, of the 21st April (3d May) 1815.

4. The treaty between Prussia and Saxony, of the 18th May, 1815.

5. The declaration of the king of Saxony on the rights of the house of Schoenburgh, of the 18th of May, 1815.

6. The treaty between Prussia and Hanover of the 29th May, 1815.

7. The convention between Prussia and the grand duke of Saxe Weimar.

8. The convention between Prussia and the duke and prince of Nassau.

9. The act on the federative constitution of Germany.

10. The treaty between the king of the Low Countries and Prussia, England Austria, and Russia, of 1815.

11. Declaration of the powers on the affairs of the Helvetic confederation, of the 20th March, 1815, and the act of accession of the diet, of the 28th of March.

12. The protocol of the 26th of March, 1815, on the cessions made by the king of Sardinia, to the canton of Geneva.

13. The treaty between the king of Sardinia, Austria, England, Russia, Prussia and France, of the

14. The act entitled "Conditions which serve as the basis of the union of the states of Genoa with those of his Sardinian majesty."

15. The declaration of the powers on the abolition of the slave trade.

16. The regulations of the committee of navigation.

17. The regulations respecting the rank of the diplomatic agents—

Are considered as integral parts of the arrangements of the congress, and shall have throughout the same force and validity as if they were inserted word for word in the general treaty.

119. All the powers assembled at congress, as well as the princes and free towns who have concurred in the arrangements, and in the acts confirmed in this general treaty, are invited to accede to it.

120. The French language having been employed exclusively in all the copies at the present treaty, it is declared by the powers that have concurred in the act, that the employment of that language shall not be drawn into a precedent for the future; so that every power reserves to adopt for itself in future negotiations and conventions, the language it has heretofore employed in its diplomatic relations, without the citation of this treaty as an established example to the contrary.

121. The present treaty shall be ratified, and the ratifications exchanged within six months, and by the court of Portugal in a year, or sooner, if possible.

A copy shall be deposited at Vienna, in the archives of the court and state of his imperial, royal and apostolic majesty, in case any of the courts of Europe shall find it expedient to consult the original text.

In faith of which, the respective plenipotentiaries have signed it, and affixed to it the seals of their arms.

Done at Vienna, on the ninth of June, in the year of grace, one thousand eight hundred and fifteen.

Here follows the signatures in the alphabetical order of the courts:

HARMONY OF WIVES.—Died, a short time since, in Cambridge, New-York, Mr. Solomon Cronge, of a wound in the hand, by the cut of a scythe, which occasioned mortification. What was most singular in the life of the deceased, was the fact, that he married two sisters, with each of whom he lived alternately a week at a time, during the whole period of his connubial connection, and by each of whom he had thirteen children. The two families, whose houses were not very distant from each other, maintained the utmost harmony and affection between them, and were all present (two wives and 26 children) at the funeral of their common husband and parent, whom they followed in mournful silence to the grave.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

NO. 14 OF VOL. IX.]

BALTIMORE, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 2, 1815.

[WHOLE NO. 222.]

Hæc olim meminisse juvabit.—VIRGIL.

PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, NO. 29, SOUTH CALVERT-STREET, AT $5 PER ANNUM.

We have received an interesting original review of the review of the life of the duke of Wellington, inserted in the 13th vol. of the (London) Quarterly Review—and been furnished with a copy of an article in replication to the attack upon gen. Armstrong by general Wilkinson, in what are said to be extracts from his address to the court martial held last winter, inserted in the REGISTER of the 15th of April last. Every man "has a right to be heard by himself or by counsel," and having, rather inadvertently, admitted the attack, we feel bound to record the defence, and here the business shall stop.

PREFATORY REMARKS.

Long as I have been accustomed "to appear before the public in print," I frankly confess, that I feel no little anxiety for the fate of the article that occupies so large a portion of this sheet—a portion that I should hardly have felt myself justified in appropriating to it, (to the exclusion of other matter) if its room had not been nearly supplied by the gratuitous supplement I have the honor to present to my readers. This anxiety arises from the nature of the thing itself. I have ventured upon untrodden ground, and attempted things of fearful amounts without precedent or guide, in many cases of no little importance, relying on my own fallible judgment, diverted too often from its pursuits by the numerous and perplexing concerns of an establishment like this, in which all that belongs to its various departments exists and depends on myself. I ask for its candid perusal—I believe is calculated to interest the most of my readers, and to provoke a spirit of enquiry that may be useful; and, certainly, there is not a line or word in it that can offend any of my countrymen: to whom it will appear, that the letter, though addressed to Mr. Cobbett, is as well adapted to their own uses. Its length is formidable, but there is a variety in its content that may assist to relieve its tediousness. Whatever of merit or of folly, of truth or of error, there may be in the calculations, it belongs entirely to myself; and, if I have succeeded in presenting such general views as shall instruct or amuse the patrons of the REGISTER, or afford new excitements to cleave to the republic—or raise up a spirit of investigation that may develop the facts I have essayed to establish, all my objects will be accomplished.

To Mr. Cobbett,

Proprietor of the Weekly Political Register.

PART THE SECOND.

SIR,—Having touched upon a few subjects as freely as I thought the 'freedom of the British press' would allow, I shall now proceed to exhibit some of the many reasons on which I build my preference for a republican representative government over any other that has yet been contrived to secure the happiness of society; though, even in this sort of government, if the "legitimates" are to be believed, "the people are their own worst enemies," and require protection—"DELIVERANCE," by the well-to-do noblesse forming a balance against them. However, I do not believe this doctrine, nor would I believe it, though all the government-friars in the world were to preach it until they were as thin as whipping-posts. But there is no danger of this—those gentlemen will never carry their zeal so far as to part with their substance.

We read in the good book—a book that they who pension and pay the priests and prostitutes of Jugernaut affect to have a deep interest in circulating—that "a corrupt tree cannot bring forth good fruit." This idea was beautifully commented upon in the grand procession we had in Baltimore during the embargo, intended to shew that our own proper resources, assisted by your orders in council, would soon make us independent of you. This procession contained about six thousand men. Very many of the trades and arts were exhibited on highly ornamented stages, drawn by 4, 6 and 8 horses each; and there was a ship—a little "fir-built frigate," among the rest. I had charge of a printing press—one of the first, I was told, that Franklin ever owned; a venerable machine, at which workmen were employed in printing an ode to independence as we moved through the streets, and we had type-founders and book-binders at work on the same stage. The farmers, about 600 strong, took the lead—they had a large stage finely decorated with the implements and productions of the husbandman. In the front was a beautiful tree, which a luxuriant vine had selected for its rising, transplanted entire and fixed firmly, from the top of this tree was displayed a rich silk flag, with the motto—"THE TREE IS KNOWN BY ITS FRUIT—LOOK AT THE PEOPLE AND JUDGE OF THE GOVERNMENT." So let us judge a republic and a monarchy.

As we are much better acquainted with the nature and effect of your government, and, indeed, are more deeply interested by its good or evil tendency than by that of any other except our own, I selected it to furnish my contrasts, for we see, understand, and appreciate almost every thing by comparison. And, certainly, the friends of royalty will feel happy at this selection; for your government is the "bulwark" of the religion and the liberties of the world!"—as might easily be proved by taking a look round the Cape of Good Hope, if evidence were wanting in Europe! It is possible, that some parts of the picture I may make, will surprise some of your countrymen, as well as of my own; and it may hurt the pride and appear "shocking—quite shocking" to others whose nerves are too delicate to meet the truth. This gives me no uneasiness. If royalty must needs be offended with the truth, I care not.

In the extra-supplement to the 8th vol. of my WEEKLY REGISTER, I republished your excellent letter to lord Grenville, dated the 27th of June, 1815. There are very few, perhaps, none, of the points you have touched, that I shall affect to amend; but there are others of great moment that have not been attended to at all, and I request your patience (and that of all who may honor me by reading this article) while I proceed to an investigation of them. I shall be as brief as I can; but some of the subjects appear so very copious that I am not without apprehensions of being thought tedious—the thing that a writer, for the people, ought always to avoid.

UNITED STATES.

POPULATION. See the note at the end.

The population of the colonies that now form the United States, in 1758, was	1,158,000
By the regular census of 1790	3,929,326
By the same of 1800	3,303,666
By the same of 1810	7,239,903
At present, 1815, estimated at	8,750,000

The increase in 32 years from 1758 to 1790 was	2,871,326
" 10 " 1790 to 1800	1,374,340
" 10 " 1800 to 1810	1,936,237
" 5 " 1810 to 1815	1,260,097

In all 57 ears. persons 7,352,000

This shows you that we double our population in about 22 years—so that, in the year 1837, we may safely calculate upon a population of 17,500,000, without esteeming, as highly as we might, the present state of Europe, which will, probably, drive many tens of thousands to our shores during the period anticipated.

MEANS AND MANNER OF LIVING. Laying aside the general considerations urged in the note on population, which are, in my opinion, entitled to great weight, particularly as shewing that the road to wealth is open to all classes in one country and shut against the poor in the other, (who, in all nations, and especially with you, are by far the most numerous) I shall contrast the means that the people of the two countries have to get a livelihood, and shew the difference of manner in which they may, must or do live.

Wheat, meat, and the price of labor, afford us pretty certain criterions for these purposes, being most fairly to be presumed as standards for every thing else.

Wheat may be averaged in the United States at $1 50 cts. (6s. 9d. sterling money) for the bushel of 60 lbs.—and at this price our farmers become rich. [Pray mark this.]—Meat, say beef, veal and mutton, may be averaged at 6 cents per lb. and labor at 80 cents per day, the laborer finding himself in food. During the last summer, laborers in our cities and towns pretty generally received from 125 to 150 cents per day. But I rate the price at 80 cents.

One day's labor will, therefore, purchase—
32 lbs. of wheat, or
14 lbs. of beef.

To assist in coming to some valuable conclusions, let us suppose a laborer's family to consist of himself, his wife, and four children, and allow each person to consume bread equal to $\frac{3}{4}$ lb. of wheat, and $\frac{1}{2}$ lb. of beef per day. One day's labor will therefore purchase bread enough for seven day's subsistence, or meat enough for 44 days; or, of both a sufficiency to support the family three days, nearly.

These proportions are merely laid down as

ENGLAND.*

POPULATION in 1751	6,467,009
" 1785	8,009,000
" 1800	9,354,778
" 1810 including the army and navy, at home and abroad,	10,747,280

Giving an increase in 59 years of 4,280,280
Your increase, to have been proportionate to ours, should have been thirty-eight millions and a half instead of four millions, because your stock of people at the period stated was six times greater than ours.

The population of England has about doubled itself within the last 100 years—but it cannot progress at that rate hereafter. The checks to population have become too numerous and distressing to permit a much further increase; at least until means are contrived to raise the value of labor, or depress the price of food, which is nearly the same thing.

It may be urged that your colonies and wars have greatly impeded the march of population at home. At a slight view of this, many would accept it as an important fact; but, really, it is no such thing—for those colonies and wars have afforded the means of living to a much greater number of persons in England than have been lost to her by them. An increase of the population of a country as naturally follows an increase of the means of livelihood, as the springing up of the herbage in summer after rain. And besides, the insular situation of England has probably invited as many foreigners to settle among you within the last 20 years of commotion, as you lost by your wars and colonies. If peace on the continent be continued, they will soon leave you, for they can live much easier in any part of it than in England.

MEANS AND MANNER OF LIVELIHOOD. Wheat in England, is 9s. sterling, or, 200 cents per bushel, of 60lbs. the dollar rated at 4s. 6d. and the farmers of your country appear in a desperate condition, notwithstanding your corn laws and all your other contrivances to bolster them up, which we have nothing of: meat may be fairly averaged at 9d. or 17 cents, and perhaps higher—laborers' wages, as on the other side, may not exceed 24d. per day; but to avoid all sort of dispute, I put it down at 2s. 6d., or 55 cents, for the average of England.

One day's labor will, therefore, produce
17lbs. of wheat, or
3 1-3lbs. of beef.

And supposing a family to be maintained as on the other side, the English laborer may purchase with his day's labor, bread enough to serve them three and one third, or meat enough for one day and a sixth; or of both, a sufficiency for about three fourths of one day. I am very sure that one day's labor will not do this in England; but I have at least designed to put the case in the most favorable light that it was possible to allow.

The result is—that a day's labor in the United States will support seventeen persons, one day, with a sufficiency of bread and meat, and that in England, the same labor will, in like manner, subsist only five persons for the same time. But even this advantage is not the greatest that the American laborer possesses—he is always cherished and sustained with the hope of bettering his condition, which gives an elasticity to his mind and a vigor to his exertions, that those destitute of it cannot possibly have.

*When I speak of England, Wales is always included. This is noted, because a distinction is frequently made in England.

UNITED STATES.

data. We know very well that men "do not live by bread alone," or meat alone, or on both of them. They must be clothed and housed, and have hundreds of other little expenses to meet, besides those incurred by what is merely necessary for food.

Having thus shewn the means, I shall proceed to say something of the MANNER in which laborers live. Those in the country generally eat bread and milk, with some cold or hot meat, or butter or cheese, or something else by way of a relish, for breakfast; at dinner, they have as much meat as they please, with bread and vegetables in abundance; their supper is nearly like the breakfast. In some parts, they use a great deal of indian corn, as hominy (a delightful standing dish on the tables of the most opulent in the middle and southern states) or in meal—not so much because it is cheaper than wheat (for the difference is, really, very little) but because they love it better; which, I think, is the best reason in the world for it. This corn may be cooked in a great many ways, and in every way is a very nourishing, wholesome and pleasant food—the best families using it as well as the poorest, to relieve and give the better relish to wheaten flour. Many of the laborers in the country have coffee and tea several times in the week, and it may certainly be said they indulge in them every Sunday, on an average, morning or evening, or both. In the towns and cities the laborers live more luxuriously, as you would call it; for they use a great deal more of coffee and tea, and seldom miss a drink of grog at their dinners, and probably another during the evening. It may be safely asserted, that the laboring classes in the United States may eat as much meat three times a day (if they like it) as they please—and, probably, they do eat it twice a day; and they have their feasting on turkeys, geese and other fowls, like the richest people in the land, for the wife's labor contributes a liberal proportion to support the household. It is by no means uncommon to see men whose only apparent means of livelihood is in their daily labor, carrying home a turkey that will weigh from 10 to 15 lbs. And this may easily happen, because at the season they are generally killed off, they are not much dearer than other meat, lb. for lb. I have seen the laboring negro in the market take a turkey or a pair of ducks that a merchant had refused, as being too high. The fact is, that the sober laboring man, with a prudent and industrious family, barring accidents, can absolutely live as full as the man of ten thousand a year, nor any more feel the want of a meal's victuals. You will observe I speak only of those who live temperately and are industrious and able to work—we are not without a portion who live wretched enough; but, generally, the fault is their own.—There are some, in all countries, that if they lived in a cook's shop would be at times half-starved, if the cooking of the victuals rested upon their own prudence and foresight—who would be too lazy to make the fire, or postpone doing it until they had finished their liquor, when they would be incapable of it. Our laborers do not average more than 11 hours work per day.

PAUPERS, BEGGARS AND VAGRANTS. The facts that belong to those persons are of the most interesting and important character, and I propose to investigate them with the greatest care. It will necessarily appear from what has been stated, that those classes are not numerous in the United States; but my information is not so extensive as is desirable, though ENGLAND.

Manner of living. When I hear of a person in England giving two or three guineas for a pint of strawberries, or 20 or 30*l.* for a dozen of wine, I never fail to recollect a saying of a traveller that visited Genoa, whose book I read in my childhood, who had a remark somewhat as follows—"Magnificent are thy PALACES, O Genoa, but thou hast also thy GALLIES!"—and I begin to calculate how many persons went superfluous to bed, that this prodigality might be indulged. The rich may live well any where; and probably this class are far more luxurious in Great Britain than in the U. States; and the very rich men are much more numerous with you than with us, nor do I want many such;—but where you have one man who makes or receives from 1 to 3500*l.* a year, we have fifty. This is the class that is the bone and sinew of a country—the people that are "comfortable"—the soul of independence—the last of all that will pay homage to a master. A person whose labor, business or property produces him 2 or 3000 dollars a year, lives far better upon it in the United States, than a man can do on as many pounds in England, or lays up more money; which will readily appear, when, in addition to the facts that belong to the price of provisions, we superadd those relating to taxes and tythes, of which I shall speak by and bye. But my ingenuity is put to the rack to find out how your laboring classes live at all. My idea of the manner of it must fall short of the reality—peculiar demonstration only can bring the image fairly before the mind. About eight years ago, when the state of your poor was highly to be preferred to what it is now, a respectable Englishman, now a resident here, related the following anecdote, which left a strong impression upon me. He said, that he arrived at New-York on a market day, and that the market particularly attracted his attention.—While he looked on, a butcher, cutting off a sheep's head, threw it into the street. He supposed this was done to "make a scramble," and prepared himself to see 50 or 100 people rushing to get it—but it excited the attention of nobody. After a while, a large dog, passing along, put his nose down and smelled it; it did not suit his appetite and he turned up ———, &c. "If then thought," said he, "that I was, indeed, in a strange country, seeing that a dog would not eat a sheep's head." Ninety-nine hundredths of the sheep's heads are thrown away in the United States; though sometimes our butchers sell them at one or two cents (a half-penny or a penny sterling a-piece) though they always give them to any that will ask for them, as a donation. I enquired of a butcher this morning as I was buying my beef, "how he sold bullcock's heads?" "You may have one and welcome, if you want it," said he. I told him I had a reason for asking the price. He informed me, that when he sold a single head he generally got 25 cents (1*s.* 2*d.*) for it; but that a "person took them all the year round, at 15 cents, (3*d.*) to boil up for something"—I presume to make a size off. A shank of beef, that will make as much rich soup as 8 or 10 hard working men will eat, and afford meat enough for them all, may be bought for from 18½ to 37½ cents, (10*l.* to 20*l.*). These are city prices. Your laborers average about 14 hours labor per day.

PAUPERS, BEGGARS AND VAGRANTS. I have before me a table, published by Bristol—in his book written on the "resources of the British empire," shewing the number of paupers in every county of England, in 1805—ten years ago. I am very sure that number was not exaggerated; for I would suspect Mr. Bristol of any thing else than a design to mislead it may serve all my present purposes with sufficient accuracy and effect.

By certain regular returns I have from three [maritime] counties, in three of the middle states, it appears, that the paupers are about as 1 to 230 inhabitants—but the counties in the interior have not 1 to every 350 persons of the whole population. The sea-board is overcharged with these unfortunate beings, for many reasons that must strike the political economist on the first glance; and the middle states have a greater proportion than the eastern, southern or western—being those states to which emigrations from foreign parts have been the most frequent, and a large proportion of the paupers they maintain are foreigners, or worn out negroes. But even in these, none are maintained but the halt, the lame, and the blind, the aged and the infirm, mad people and idiots, except, that, in the winter season, some, who have been imprudent in the summer, seek a temporary asylum with them. From the facts that have come to my knowledge, I think it may be said that one tenth of the tenants of our poor houses are over seventy, and another tenth under 6 years of age. A majority of those within the periods of years that a man or woman is generally able to earn a livelihood, have ruined their constitutions by intemperance, and the balance is nearly made up of the maimed and defective—there are none that are sober and industrious and hale and hearty: for all such can make a living for themselves, and will not work for the public for victuals and clothes, only.

I have paid considerable attention to this subject, and feel pretty certain that I over-rate the paupers of the United States generally, at 1 for every 300 persons. But at this rate the whole amount of our paupers in 1815, on a supposed population of 3,750,000, will be 12,500.

Our "beggars and vagrants taxing the public charity," are very few. In some states there are none such—You may travel 1000 miles through the country without being once asked for alms; and such as live in this way are too few to be worthy of notice in a general account. The reasons for this are simple; those unable to work are comfortably provided for in the poor's houses, and if any who are able to labor attempt mendicancy, they are hoisted off to the work houses, the discipline of which is excellent to remove the "disease of laziness." Of the few common beggars we have, a majority of them are foreigners or negroes. Baltimore, from the great laxity of its police, in this respect, has probably more of this class than all the cities of the union; yet, calling to recollection all I have seen in my walks, and assisting it by the observations of others, I hardly think we have fifteen such, certainly not twenty, and our population is between 50 and 60000. In the winter season, there are many in our cities that require casual assistance, which is granted freely, but privately, by others of the same neighborhood, or by funds voluntarily raised to furnish suitable wood, &c. to those whose necessities demand it; and those who do require it are such as, nine times out of ten, have "danced away the summer," or have been or are afflicted with disease in themselves, or in their families.

By referring to the documents in my possession, it appears that the average expence of maintaining our paupers, may be estimated at 45¢ per annum, for each individual. So that the poor rates paid in the United States will amount to $1,212,470.

By this they are plentifully fed. Their general diet is composed after this manner: bread and milk, or things appear worse than they were. The table, at length, may be seen in the 4th vol. of the WEEKLY REGISTER, page 114. Assisted by this and several other like tables, we have pretty sure grounds to go upon in our estimates of the paupers of England. The following abstract is interesting:

	Whole no. paupers.	Amount of poor rates.
In 1689	persons 563,964	1,665,362
1776	695,177	1,535,163
1805	818,851	1,943,649
1792	953,326	2,645,520
1803	1,039,716	4,113,164
1805	1,212,936
1811	1,847,659	5,922,954
1812*	2,079,432	6,452,566
1815 (estimated)	2,500,000	7,800,000

The last items are calculations of my own, but I suspect are near the truth, as will appear by examining the preceding data, given from high British authorities. The greater part of those returned as paupers must be persons able to earn a livelihood; but, no doubt, many of them, though yet in their prime, as to the years of their life, are such as have worn out their constitutions in attempting to support themselves and their families.

Therefore, one fifth of the whole population of England are paupers. In the United States there is one pauper to every 300 persons; in England there are 60 to the same number. But further—

Your "beggars and vagrants taxing the public charity," are truly a formidable body! It is stated in the public papers, that Mr. Rose, [a man famous in this way himself, but on a larger scale!] said in Parliament, "that the number of mendicants in the metropolis was estimated at 30,000, but probably it was much more." This pretty nearly agrees with some other calculations I have seen, and may be taken as tolerably correct, and gives us an idea of what there are in all England; which "with vagrants and gypsies and other persons taxing the public charity," have been estimated at 350,000.

To which add the army and navy paupers pensioners, 100,000, and the maimed and diseased maintained in your many private hospitals, 100,000, 200,000. The regular paupers are, 2,500,000.

And the fearful aggregate is 3,050,000. Three millions and fifty thousand paupers for a population of less than eleven millions; or considerably more than one to four of the whole population.

The poor rates of England the present year, I have supposed may amount to 17,800,000, equal to $34,632,000.

But how the 2,500,000 paupers are fed by this sum, great as it appears, I cannot contrive. It allows, for each pauper, less than fourteen dollars per annum; which, from the comparative price of provisions already noted, is equal to much less than $7 in the United States, as to the quantity of good food it will purchase. Every pauper costs us $45, and there must be an economy far beyond my comprehension to reduce the charge down to seven dolls. including all the feasts to the overseers and church wardens,

*Mr. Colquhoun estimates the paupers for this year at 1,548,400, which I must believe is far under the real amount. In 1805 England was in a state of prosperity compared with 1812, and then, by the returns of counties given by Bristed, the amount was 1,212,936. The increase of poor rates also furnishes us with a good idea of the real state of the case.

UNITED STATES.

mush* and milk, for breakfast and supper, with cold meat, occasionally; at dinner—meat, soup and vegetables,—of all as much as they please to eat. In sickness, they have whatever the physician prescribes,—wine, tea, and coffee and the like. They are also clothed at the public expence.

The cost of maintaining the poor of the United States, deducting from the number of inhabitants the army and navy, and the poor themselves, is for each other person, per annum, about 14 cents.

EXPENDITURES—REVENUES—DEBT. These things are so intimately connected that I shall treat of them all under one head, as briefly as I can, so as to be explicit:

War establishment. The expenditure of the United States for the year ending Sept. 1814, was about as follows:

Civil, diplomatic and miscellaneous	2,245,355
Military	24,502,906
Naval	8,169,910
Interest on debt existing before the war	1,980,000
Contracted since the war	2,950,000
On account of the principal of the public debt, say	3,000,000

$42,848,165

In the military and naval appropriations were included permanent allowances of $200,000 for the purchase of arms for supplying the whole militia of the United States, and 200,000 for the purchase of timber—and also very considerable sums for the building of forts and ships and other vessels; and things of a permanent nature.

42,848,165 dollars are equal to 19,650,489 sterling; or for the population of the United States, deducting the army and navy and paupers (not contributing to the public taxes) four dollars and 20 cents for each other person—equal to 18s. 11d. sterling†.

The peace establishment. Supposing the “treasury year” to end with one year after the proclamation of peace, might be estimated as follows:

In the year 1811. For the year 1815.

Civil, diplomatic and miscellaneous	1,360,859	1,500,000
Military	2,129,000	3,000,000
Naval	2,126,000	5,000,000
Indi an Department	142,725	300,000
Interest on old debt	2,225,800	1,800,000
New loans		4,200,000

7,984,384

15,800,000

It is proper to be observed that the present military establishment of the United States is considerably less than it was in 1811, yet I have estimated the expence at nearly one million more, to cover an increased attention to works of defence and incident.

* Mush—Indian corn meal mixed in boiling water until it becomes so thick that it can hardly be stirred. A very wholesome, pleasant and nourishing food.

and the clipping and pairings of money expended for the public. If your paupers lived as quacks, they would cost you the enormous sum of $235,000,000 a year—that is, 2,500,000 at $90 each; and if we could maintain ours as cheaply as you do yours (taking into view the difference in the price of provisions) they would cost us only 189,579 dollars, or a little more than two cents (1d sterling) for every other tax-contributing person!

If from your population, 11,000,000, we deduct these 2,950,000† paupers, beggars and vagrants, and from that again deduct the army and navy, and other persons exempt from the poor rates, supposed to be at least, 600,000 more, we have 7,450,000 men, women and children to pay 17,800,000, which is about 1.1 ls. for each, per annum, or 4 dolls. 60 cents.

EXPENDITURES—REVENUE—DEBT. The whole expenditure for the United Kingdoms, for the year ending January 5, 1814, war establishment, was as follows:

Charges on account of the national debt, $	41,397,335
Civil list,	1,028,000
Courts of justice, mint, salaries, &c.	234,937
Royal family, pensions, &c.	332,412

113,968,610 sterling are equal to $506,020,648—about five times the amount of all our debt; or, for the whole tax-contributing population of Great-Britain* 50 dollars 90 cents, for every person, man, woman or child, in the island.

490 dollars in England being equal only to 45 in America, for the purchase of food.

† I do not take the 3,050,000 because the soldiers and sailors partially contribute to the support of their unfortunate messmates, by a pittance retained from their wages,

$ This includes a sum allowed for reducing the principal.

* England and Wales,	10,150,618
Scotland,	1,805,688
Army and navy,	641,500

	12,699,500

Tax-contributing population, 8,255,803
Mr. Colquhoun estimated the paupers in 1812, at only 1,548,400—see the preceding note. But another writer in a London paper, stated them at 2,079,432 in the same year, and gave the poor rates as precisely amounting to 1.6,452,566. You can best judge between them; but when it appears in the above that I have made no allowance whatever for als—and the naval is more than the double of what it was in that year—but our negotiation with the Barbary powers, with the building of ships, &c. may amount to the sum supposed. I have no pretensions to the office of secretary of the treasury (or chancellor of the exchequer, as the person who fills nearly the same office is called in England) but I venture to say that, in the whole, it may turn out tolerably correct.

UNITED STATES.

The supposed expence of the year 1815, for current expences, belonging to the peace establishment, is 15,800,000

From which we may safely deduct for the year 1816—the peace continuing—

1. In the naval department, still keeping up a respectable force and building new vessels, 1,000,000
2. In the interest of new debt 1,200,000 2,200,000

Probable expenditures 1816, $13,600,000

Appropriations for the payment of the public debt not noted.

In 1811 it was calculated that 9 millions a year, for the future, would be amply sufficient for all the wants of the United States, on a peace establishment—and the actual disbursement for current expences, will probably not exceed 11 millions, four or five years hence. But we have grown a great deal larger since 1811, as well in population (as in our own conceit) and our stand among nations is materially changed—I am, therefore, willing to admit that 12 millions will, hereafter, be necessary to meet these expences.* The allowance will be considered very large—but let it stand as the maximum of the cost of a peace establishment.

Revenue. The receipts and dues to the treasury for year ending in 12 months after the proclamation of peace, will exceed the most sanguine calculations. Several months ago I said it would probably amount to 40 millions, and many laughed at the “notion”—what it will be, may be estimated as follows:

Customs. A full and regular peace importation used to give us from 13 to 16 millions—the duties, en masse, were doubled, and a common peace supply would, therefore, give us $30,000,000

But it seems the universal opinion that at least twice the quantity of goods, subject to duty, will arrive in the United States in this year, that ever did in one year before; many intelligent persons say thrice as much—but, to keep within the most reasonable bounds, I will suppose an advance of only 75 per cent. 22,500,000

Direct tax, and internal revenues 15,000,000

Public lands 1,000,000

$68,500,000

There are besides some small branches of revenue not noticed.

the poor of Scotland, the fact may be admitted, even on Mr. Colquhoun's data, (furnished three years ago) that the tax-contributing population of Great Britain is not equal to that of the United States, say 3,700,000. But I allow it to be the same.

*That is, of government, without any thing appropriated to pay the principal or interest of the public debt.

ENGLAND.

The peace establishment of Great Britain, in perpetuity, may be estimated to cost as follows:

For interest on the national debt, charges of management, &c.	£ 32,000,000
Civil list—courts of justice—mint, &c.—royal family, pensions, &c.
and civil list of Scotland	2,000,000
Other bounties and pensions	600,000
Navy	9,000,000
Ordnance	1,000,000
Army	14,000,000
Miscellanies	5,000,000
	63,600,000
Deduct for Ireland,	3,600,000

And we have the ‘round sum’ for Great-Britain, of £ 60,000,000

It appears to me, very plain, that you must raise about sixty millions a year for a peace establishment. I cannot believe the “wheels of your government” will go on for less. But, to avoid every thing like a desire to exaggerate, let us say it will require only fifty millions a year for Great Britain, supposing, that in a further reduction of the navy and army than I have allowed, or by other means, you may save, or have something equivalent to the ten millions thrown away. Well, fifty millions a year must be raised, and raise it in what way you will, the people must, directly or indirectly, pay it. To this principle some part of your revenue, incidental to exports and imports, may be plead in exception, and it may be said that foreigners, who purchase your goods, pay something to the support of your government. But this exception has more appearance than reality in it, and for the greater part of those duties are paid by your own laboring poor, in the reduced price of their labor. And those duties will wholly operate as a tax on yourselves, if Europe settles into peace; and the manufactures of America will contribute not a little to give that effect to it, as you will all plainly see in a very short time. But the duties that may fairly be said to be levied on foreign countries (if any really are) are of too small an amount to affect a general calculation. On the whole, we may conclude that you must levy on the people of Great Britain fifty millions of pounds sterling, (222 millions of dollars) a year, to pay the current expences; which is 5*l.* 15*s.* or 25 dollars 40 cents for each tax-contributing individual; man, woman or child—paupers, soldiers, sailors, &c. being excluded. How can you pay this? Is it possible to pay it without war excitements? Your war revenue would do no great deal more than meet it. Can the war taxes be borne in peace, when the labor of all Europe will come in competition with you in your manufactures, and can undersell you, from the greater cheapness of living?

Revenue, &c.—The proceeds of all the war and peace [or permanent] taxes are thus given by Colquhoun, for the year, ending January 5, 1813. (C) The balance between the proceeds and the expenditures for that year [108 millions] was made up by loans:

	Gross.	Net proceeds.
England	39,014,416	55,995,123
Scotland	4,519,892	4,155,399
Ireland	5,705,815	4,822,264
Isle of man		6,973
	69,140,123	64,979,959
Deduct for Ireland		4,155,599

Total, for G. Britain, of all the taxes, 60,824,360
The difference between the two columns shew

UNITED STATES.

This amount may be truly called enormous, and many here will smile at the calculation; but the influx of British and other goods has been so excessive [as thousands will find to their sorrow] that I feel no hesitation in making up an opinion, that 68 millions will be short of, rather than exceed, the real amount paid, or secured to be paid, or which has accrued, in the year specified.

This revenue will not, nor could it last. The whole country is immensely stocked with goods, and I should hardly suppose that the customs, at the old duties, will, for the next year, produce the old peace revenue of 15 millions—for though our population has greatly increased, and luxury makes astonishing progress, domestic manufactures—fami-ly manufactures, have advanced with much greater rapidity to the supply of our wants. Of this I shall say more hereafter. However, this excess for this year, which may be called a war excess though collected in peace, comes in very good season to put all things straight. Hereafter, 20 millions (or $2 30 cents, 10s. 4d. sterl. for each tax-contributing individual) will be quite a sufficiency—will be as much as can be used to advantage, and the need or utility of so much will decrease as the public debt is extinguished; the period for which is not far distant, if you permit us to have peace. We have no apprehension of a quarrel with any one else.

Taking the revenue at	$68,500,000
And the current expenses as estimated above, at	15,800,000

The balance is	52,700,000
----------------	------------

Of this, let us say that 15 millions are required to wipe off "old scores" over and above the amount of the public debt, as estimated at 108 millions (some such there may be, though I know nothing of them) and we have 38 millions to reduce the principal of the public debt, and make it, for 1816, only 70 millions, equal to about one-third of what your yearly expenses will be at that time.

Debt. The whole present debt of the United States may be assumed at 108 millions. I have not the papers at hand to give an absolute sum, but this is within 4 or 5 millions of the amount, more or less. We shall have all the particulars when congress meets. This debt will receive, immediately, a very powerful reduction, from the revenue of the present year. Our debt is less than twelve dollars for each tax-contributing individual.

The following results are fairly deducible from the facts stated:

1. That the settled peace expenditure of the United States will be 12 millions per ann. (12,702,702 sterl.) exclusive of payments on account of the public debt—which is 140 cents, or 6s. 2d. sterling for each tax-contributing individual.

GREAT BRITAIN.

the "charges of management"—the people really paid 69 millions and upwards, while the government received less than 65 millions—there expenses deducted from the 50 that I have supposed the people of England must pay, will leave you a little more than 46 millions for receipts, allowing a proportionate reduction of expense for the sums raised. Certainly, it cannot be pretended that you will require less than 46 millions. THE COST OF COLLECTING AND MANAGING YOUR TAXES AND DUTIES WILL AMOUNT TO SIX OR SEVEN MILLIONS OF DOLLARS MORE, PER ANNUM, THAN WE SHALL REQUIRE FOR OUR WHOLE SETTLED PEACE REVENUE.

Debt. Mr. Colquhoun states the public debt of Great Britain and Ireland to have stood thus, on the 5th of January 1813—

Funded debt of the United Kingdoms,	£ 1,021,269,497
Deduct — redeemed and in the hands of the commissioners of the sinking fund	100,693,913
Stock cancelled &c	180,572,048
	231,265,961
	740,023,536
Add —unfunded debt*—
Great Britain	45,855,607
Ireland—	1,258,904
	47,144,511
Net amount of debt Jan. 1813—	£ 787,168,047

The gentleman proceeds to shew the real value of this debt in money, and says at the selling prices of the stock, the 740,023,537 l. would produce in money

Add the unfunded debt	£ 47,144,511
	£ 549,011,995

Which he considers as the cash value of the whole debt, funded and unfunded, at the period stated.

The nominal amount of the debt on the 5th of January 1816 will be about

Deduct —as for the items above, allowing the increase to have been 59 millions	1200,000,000
	331,000,000

Now, if you will make a calculation on this, at the various rates per centum that your stocks bear, and for their various quantities, you will find that the 32 millions I allowed as the sum needful to pay the annual interest of your debt, though a mere calculation, will come near to the real amount. I compliment myself upon this, because neither of the estimates were made as the result of the other but separately and independently—and the calculations were prepared in a different way.

Every calculation for paying off this debt must be absurd, seeing that you will hardly be able to pay the interest, as is clearly shewn above.

The calculations respecting Great Britain depend on the duration of peace as well as those I have made in my own country.

The results are—

1. That the settled peace expenditure of Great Britain will stand at 50 millions (222 millions of dollars) or at 5*l.* 15*s.* or 25 dol. 40 cents, per annum for each tax-contributing individual, men, women, and children.

*Exchequer bills or treasury notes, chiefly.

UNITED STATES.

2. That a settled peace revenue of 20 millions a year (14,504,504 stlg.) or 230 cents (10s. 4d stlg.) for each tax-contributing individual, allowing us $6,400,000 to pay off the principal of the public debt, (the interest being provided for in our estimate) will meet all the current expences and entirely pay off the debt in from 9 to 11 years; and then we may settle down on 12 millions, as stated above.
3. That the public debt, when the effects of the war have ceased, say in 1816, will not exceed 70 millions of dollars (115,765,765 sterling) or eight dollars (36s. sterl.) for each tax-contributing individual.
4. That with a settled peace revenue of 12 millions, the debt being paid off, we may allow $5,500,000 a year to military and naval purposes, over and beyond what they required in 1811, to meet the altered condition of things.

It is proper to note, however, that we have, also, our state governments to support; these may cost us, including the road and poor and all other taxes, from 50 to 40 cents more for each tax-contributing individual. It is not worth while to go further into the calculation of these, as county rates exist also in England, much heavier than our state and county rates together, besides your poor rates, tythes, &c. &c. &c.

TYTHES, (blessed be God!)

none.

The people of the United States, and especially our eastern brethren, think themselves about as really religious as any other people, and perhaps we are, generally, about as good as any. If humanity be a test of advancement in religion, we might adduce a thousand cases like this—

That captain Lawrence, best known to Englishmen as the captain of the unfortunate Chesapeake frigate, risked the lives of his men, and actually lost three gallant fellows, in his efforts to save the crew of the sinking sloop of war Peacock, from a watery grave—and that his brave companions absolutely divested themselves of their clothing to cover the poor naked Englishmen, late their enemies, but now their prisoners, escaped from death, with only what they happened to have on in the battle.

The clergy here are supported by the voluntary gifts of the people, who give or let it alone, just as they please. Hence that class of the community, being responsible to the people, and in every respect living on their bounty, or sense of religion, are, at least, compelled to assume the appearance of moral, sober and good men, and I believe generally are so. You might attend a thousand fox hunts, or visit a thousand gambling houses without seeing one of them. The whole amount of what they all receive, is not equal to the sum paid by the dissenters in England, to their own priests, of choice, as we pay; though they also pay those of the church of England, of necessity. For, though the clergy are sufficiently numerous in the United States, they do not live in that stile that it seems necessary to confer on dissenting ministers in England, to give them a standing with the dignitaries of the regular church.

Resources.—In the annual or daily product of the labor of individuals, over what is required for subsistence, and in the existing property, no doubt, lay the resources of a government. But adventurous circumstances may sometimes make it more easy for one country, placed in general results like another, to contribute a greater sum than another. It is to these circumstances that Great Britain is indebted.

GREAT BRITAIN.

2. That no settled peace revenue can pay off your debt and that you must be saddled with its interest forever, unless, indeed, a revolution should apply the sponge to obliterate it.—There is no hope that will be settled otherwise.
3. That the public debt, taking it as a cash value (according to Mr. Colquhoun's manner) is about 80l. sterling, or 355 dollars, for every tax-contributing person in Great Britain, as above.
4. That with this settled revenue of 50 millions, as stated before, the debt will remain in perpetuity, the sinking fund doing nothing to its reduction, as the interest arising on the stocks that belong to it is not calculated in the interest to be paid. At any rate, if the debt does not increase you will do exceedingly well, and ought to very thankful.

TYTHES. The amount of the tythes "the greater and lesser," exacted from the people of England, for the "support of the church," amount to the inconceivable and enormous sum of about £7,000,000; equal to $31,080,000, or 3 dolls. 50 cents, (15s. 9d.) for each tax-contributing individual.

You also think yourselves a very religious people,—You persecute the Catholics at home and protect them abroad—Your priests pray for the downfall of the pope, and your prince regent, the head of your church ("God bless him!") sends soldiers to Rome to hold him up! And so you go on, with Bible societies and pensions to the priests of Juggernaut.—If, as on the other side, inhumanity be the fruit of a disregard for religion, we might fill a volume with cases like this—

Captain Lawrence, faint and dying, was denied a drop of his own wine, to cheer expiring nature—his crew were fired upon and killed long after resistance had ceased, and the officers and men of the Chesapeake were robbed of their clothes and other property, and many of them reduced almost to the nudity of nature, by their conquerors.

The "regular clergy" of England, being independent of the people; and many, perhaps, one half of them, exacting tythes of a community, or parish, they do not reside in and seldom visit, doing the "Lord's business" by journeymen, are not bound to pay more respect to morality, sobriety and goodness, than other men; and we are told (but people will tell lies sometimes) that it is by no means uncommon to find them at fox chases, gambling houses and the like,—any where, but in their closets, studying new sermons for the benefit of the souls of those who are compelled to pay them. The dissenting clergy in England, being responsible men like our own, have the same character for zeal in their vocation and charity in their manner of applying it.

ed for the ability to support her numerous burthens of taxes and tythes and poor rates, &c. Thus—one man, whose income or business is worth £10,000, can contribute more to the support of a government, in money, than 500 men, each receiving £100 a year, though the aggregate of the latter is larger five fold. The latter must live as well as the former—and they can spare nothing; but the rich man may contribute £9,900, and still live as the 500 men do. Here, in my opinion, is the great secret of what has astonished the world. It is by the overgrown fortunes of the few that England raises by taxes such immense sums—that in this is the extreme misery of the many, is no odds; the ends of royalty and its ministers are served, and they care not what it costs.

But, to be brief—

I estimate the value of the property of the United States, public or private, at $4850,000,000 Equal to nearly £1,100,000,000 sterling. ¶ See the note at the end.

The value of the real and personal property of the United States may be estimated to double itself in ten years. This remark is the result of frequent reflection and a good deal of observation on the progress of things; and may, also, more substantially appear from what follows.

Product of labor.—It appears very evident that as we have as many tax-contributing individuals in the United States as are in Great Britain, that we must have more productive laborers, because we have a much smaller number of those who live without some occupation. But I shall consider them as the same, and, for the purpose of a comparison, suppose there are two millions of men in each performing some daily business, productive of capital.

Two millions of men, at 80 cents per day,

$16,000,000

As has been stated, the American laborer earns three days food for his family in one day—say, bread and meat sufficient to subsist them. It will then follow, that the profit of three days labor of all the people of the United States, over the cost of their living, will be

$32,000,000

I have thus got through the most of the things I designed to notice when I commenced this letter; but there is one, quite a "hobby" with me, that is only remotely alluded to, though of great and growing importance—and that is our manufactures. Sir, the progress of these is astonishing, and they will go on to the completion of a sublime independence for high-minded America, the chucklings of your ministerial prints, on account of the late vast export of goods to this country, notwithstanding, which accidental or artificial causes created so great a demand for, as I shall clearly shew when I take up the subject—as our merchants and shop-keepers now see and will very soon feel, to the ruin of thousands. The capital vested in manufactures within the last six years, has raised up a new interest among the

Two million of men at 2s. 6d. or 55 cents per day $11,000,000

As it has been stated, and I think proved, that the labor of a man in England will not find his family in bread and meat sufficient for their subsistence, it follows, that if all the people of that country, were to eat bread and meat every day, that three days labor would produce a profit of.....nothing. Indeed, that they would be in debt, at the end of the three days for three-quarters of a day's living. But there is a daily profit made—it is made by not eating bread and meat, but living on something a great deal cheaper; the coarsest and homeliest fare that can be imagined to support nature.

My idea of their being as many productive laborers in the United States as in Great Britain, is generally supported by the following items from Mr. Colquhoun:

Unproductive laborers, whose exertions do not create any new property:

Persons.

Royalty, nobility and gentry 416,000

Clergy, law, physic, 281,000

Universities, schools, &c. 567,937

Paupers,* 1,548,400

Total

3,870,672

Mr. C. calculates however, that the productive laborers of Great Britain create a new property every year of the value of 13 millions and upwards. If this be correct, it may safely be said that those of America create a value of 130 millions annually.

people as wealthy and as powerful as the commercial, which will have its weight in all the measures of government, as well as the rest, as it should.—I might, perhaps, afford you, at present, much information as to these, but to do the matter the justice that its importance deserves, I shall defer it for a few weeks, during which many new lights will be afforded through the pretty general meetings of the manufacturers of the United States, now holding to petition congress to protect and defend them, in some degree, as your manufactures have been and are protected and defended. The peace has not stopped the progress of those establishments, as was expected; and the fact is proved

*See preceding notes as to paupers.

(however queer some people may think it!) that a spindle will do as much work in the United States as in England. This will be news to thousands of your lord Sheffields; but, depend upon it, it is true. New factories grow up as by magic, and those of old standing (5 or 6 years!) are daily going on to the fullness or strength originally designed. The fact is, that they grow up and improve so rapidly, that every day's intelligence would make a man alter his ideas of their amount and importance. There is, perhaps, no one in America that is more inquisitive as to what is going on in this way than myself; but, truly, while I was writing the preceding paragraph, a gentleman called at my office, and accidentally gave me the first notice I had ever received of a woollen cloth manufactory that he and others had erected, within five or six miles of this city, which he said was calculated for, and should make, more than 100 yards of broad cloth per day, in less than twelve months. Six years ago, all the cotton spindles in Baltimore or its vicinity, were driven by one horse mill—about 33,000 are now driven by water or steam power, and the number will amount to about 36,000 in 3 or 4 months, besides one other great mill for 6 or 8,000 more just erected;—near Providence, R. I. they drive 130,000 spindles, and the whole country is filling with mills. But of this, more hereafter.

I observe you have taken hold of my old friend lord Sheffield. Really, sir, you have handled the old man severely! I have a great regard for him—for, being what the world calls a 'good-humored fellow,' I say, blessings on the makers of fun—and his book, which I have several times noticed in my paper, entitled "Observations," &c. on the commerce, &c. of the United States, has made me laugh as much as any other book of its size that I ever saw. The famous work of Cervantes is not more redundant in the ridiculous than that of his lordship.

Your's respectfully,

M. NILES.

Baltimore, Nov. 30, 1815.

Since the preceding calculations and remarks were in type, I have read, for the first time, your 5th letter to lord Sheffield. I see that you have noticed two or three things that had considerably occupied my attention and in which we appear to differ. I allude, particularly, to the public debt and the interest payable upon it. You fix the debt at about 1000 millions, and its interest at 43 millions, and calculate your whole population at 10 millions, which makes the debt equal to £100 (444 dollars) for every soul "taking in babies, paupers, gipseys, beggars, soldiers, sailors, seapoys, prisoners in jails, and convicts on board the hulks," as you say. On the other hand, I have estimated the cash value of the debt unredeemed, &c. as being less than 700 millions, as £100 stock will only bring 58 to 65 in money—have rated the interest at 32 millions, because I deducted the stock "redeemed" or "cancelled," and allowed that £80, in cash, for each "tax-contributing individual" might pay off the debt.—And further, I have taken the population of Scotland into the account. There is more a difference of appearance than of fact in these things.—We make the gross amount of the debt nearly the same, and if it were to be paid off, about 1000 millions would be required for it, and the interest on the whole is as you have estimated it—but I have deducted from that amount the interest on the stocks redeemed, &c.

NOTES.

Population The people of the United States increase with a rapidity unparalleled. There is nothing like it any other part of the world; but the causes of it are obvious and imposing. The climate is healthy,* land is plenty, the soil is bountiful, industry is rewarded and enterprise walks forth unrestrained—AND THE PEOPLE ARE FREE. We have very little law—an Englishman who had resided in my neighborhood eight or ten years, once observed, he almost doubted if we had any, for he had never felt it. He was at the head of a large manufactory. The war gave us some laws, and we have a few taxes and excises like you. But they are of no consequence—the whole proceeds of them hardly amount to 175 cents for each person, and we shall soon be clear of them, if you will let us alone; the duties on imports being enough to satisfy all that we shall want in time of peace. Our people marry very early, because the coldest calculator sees a way before him to subsist a family, with prudence and industry. The same labor that will maintain one man in England will give food to a man and his wife and 3 or 4 children in America. Large families are rather desired than dreaded, and our farmers jocularly say, they are £100 richer for every child they have—which has its meaning, in the general advancement of their fortunes. The wealth of the United States grows much faster than their population. This partly arises as well from the facilities afforded, as in the almost universal ambition to get forward; and there may be said to be very few, if any, amongst us who are sober and industrious, though ever so poor, who do not calculate on a day of independence and ease; and tens of thousands, once of this class, are now among the most substantial people we have. In England it is "once a journeyman weaver always a journeyman weaver." It is the policy, perhaps the necessity of your government, to keep the poor down; but the very opposite is the interest and spirit of ours. Cases somewhat like the following are to be found in almost every street of our cities and in every township of the United States: There is a man at the head of one of our most respectable mercantile houses, a man beloved, and almost revered for his numerous virtues—one of the kindest and best of men, the peaceful citizen and the honest patriot—a man beyond the reach even of the rancour of party, though decisive in his politics, who once was a journeyman shoemaker and a subject of your king.—If he had remained at home, he might still have been a journeyman shoemaker—but his word would pass for a million in Europe or America. The probability is, (and if any American will examine his own circle he will see it as well as myself) that at least one half of our wealthy men, over 45 years of age, were once common day laborers or journeymen, or otherwise very humble in their circumstances when they began the world. This is made a reproach by your high-toned "legitimizes." Let us be reproached with it, say I, while the world lasts! You have some such with you, but they are of little account, if you except those who have acquired their fortunes by government jobs and the other things you abound with, not quite so honest as they might be.

Europeans, especially Englishmen, settling in the United States, who lived decently at home, have a universal complaint to make about the "imperti-

*"The climate of America is unhealthy," said an Englishman to Franklin—"that is not yet fairly proved," returned the sage, "for all the children of the first settlers are not yet dead."

"Hence of servants," meaning chiefly women and girls hired to do house-work; for I never yet knew a native white man of this free country in service as a common waiter or servant. These girls will not call the lady of the house mistress or drop a curtsey when honored with a command; and, if they do not like the usage they receive, will be off in an instant, and leave you to manage as well as you can. They think that the employer is quite as much indebted to them as they are to the employer, and hence the "impertinence" spoken of. That they are sometimes unreasonable, is true enough—I have myself suffered much inconvenience from it; but God forbid that I should wish to check the cause of it.—It would be like "regulating the freedom of the press," as the phrase is in Europe, which is to destroy its liberty. Those girls who behave as they ought, soon get married and raise up families for themselves. This is what they calculate upon, and it is this calculation that makes them "saucy." I notice these things, which to some may appear trifling though I do not believe you will consider them so, to shew the unanimous spirit and hope of the people of getting forward; and on this hope, which industry realizes in so many cases, we have the foundation for that increase of people which has astonished the world—that the breed we have is a good one, Wellington's "invincibles" and your "unconquerable tars," as well as the Algerines can testify.

The population of England may be considered as nearly full. Indeed, I am inclined to believe that the United States, 22 years hence, may have a number of people equal to that of the three kingdoms, England, Ireland, and Scotland, at that period. The difficulty of obtaining a mere livelihood is constantly on the increase, and the event will shew that a general peace in Europe, from which the poor of those countries have hoped so much, will rather add to their difficulties than diminish them. The trade of Great Britain will, certainly, decline, and the demand for her manufactures be assuredly lessened. And, besides, all those hundreds of thousands of persons who were subsisted by the war, as soldiers or sailors, and in all the mechanic and other arts exerted to furnish its various and vast supplies, will be thrown upon the ordinary labor of the country, and reduce its value in course. Those persons must live as well as the rest; and as the population was already too great for the peaceful labor required, the consequences may be calculated. I think it may safely be said, that the late war, in all its departments, furnished employment for, at least, one million of men, English, Irish and Scotch; and subsisted at least two millions and a half of people, of all classes. What are these to do? It is a serious enquiry. A consideration of it, probably, may induce the ministry to make a new quarrel.

There is one great drawback on what may be considered as the effective population of the United States, in our slaves, amounting to something more than a million in all. But these unfortunate beings contribute immensely to the national wealth by their labor, and increase our resources in various ways, for their "legitimate" masters, directly or indirectly pay heavy taxes on their account. I never reflect on the condition of this people without extreme pain—but negro slavery is more easily reasoned against than removed, however sincerely and honestly desired. There is no man, not even the humane lord Castlereagh himself, that feels more earnest for the emancipation of the blacks than I do—I hold none in slavery; I never will hold any;—but their color is, I apprehend, an eternal barrier to their admission into society; unless, as some philosophers suppose, the climate in time, (the importation being stopped, as it is) may remove this distressing impediment. And here we are placed in a peculiar case, and what it would be advisable to do is full of doubt and difficulty. But I am not about to discuss the subject now. I may add, however, that the condition of our slaves has been greatly ameliorated within the last 20 years; and that I really believe their present state is preferable to that of the laboring poor of Great Britain—except that the latter think they have freedom, and the others know that they have not.

I am fearful of spinning out this subject to a terrific length, but it is most important in all and each of its parts, and I will be the more brief on others; for I cannot refrain from offering a few remarks on the colossal hypocrisy that is going about the world in regard to negro slavery, the slavery of the blacks. This foul thing prevails in both hemispheres—we have thousands of men in the United States who are excessively shocked, almost made sick, with seeing an advertisement in one of our newspapers for the sale of a gang of 40 or 50 black men, who hear of like transfers of millions of white people with perfect insensibility. They will rake up all history to adduce cases of hardship suffered by the blacks, and read with the calmness of stoicks, of the hundreds of thousands of whites given by one certain woman, famous in "legitimacy," to her male prostitutes, to be held in property more absolute, and service more severe, than our slaves are. There is a villainy in this that puts patience at defiance, and almost bears down that christian forbearance we are taught to extend to the guilty. I freely and sincerely give credit to some god-like men in England and America who have exerted themselves to effect a prohibition of the trade in [black] human flesh; but I have, indeed, quite as much sympathy for the people of my own color as for those of any other; and cannot possibly esteem those philanthropists that would give freedom only to one. It appears to me quite as absurd for a person to clamor for the emancipation of the negroes and advocate the "legitimacy of kings," as it is for a planter, with a whip in his hand, to contend for the abject submission of his blacks, while he speaks of "liberty and equality." In both cases there is a master; but the latter is a less extensive evil than the former, and therefore the less to be deprecated. And what is the doctrine of perpetual allegiance but that on which negro slavery is sustained? Certainly, the holders of black slaves have as much reason to contend for a "divine right" over those born on their farms, of their "legal" slaves, as the king of Great Britain has to command the perpetual services of all born within his dominions.—Let the sophist point out the difference, if he can. The Louisiana negro has just as much to say in the choice of a master as the natural born Englishman, if the creed of the "legitimates" be correct. But tell me, in what respect is the Russian peasant, for instance, better off than our slaves? I venture to assert that the general advantage is on the side of the latter—that they are better protected by the laws and less subject to oppressive and distressing acts of cruelty. The Russian is the property of a master, the same as the negro; and he is liable to be made a fighting machine of, which the other is not. Why, then, is it that you have so much sympathy in England only for the blacks? Some say, that your sugar colonies having a full supply, you have exerted yourselves to prevent a trade in negro slaves that you may make a monopoly of that sweet commodity. But I have not room to examine this matter as it deserves, and as I may at some future period, for which purpose I have some interesting facts collected. It is rank hypocrisy. Who can believe that lord Castlereagh was really influenced by feelings of humanity when he contended for the abolition of the black slave trade at Vienna, and yet so powerfully advocated (by gold) the sale and transfer of millions on millions of white people, just like the negroes are disposed of—See Poland, Saxony, Italy, including Genoa, &c. &c. Were not the men counted in those exactly as slave dealers would count their slaves, and were they not transferred as much against their consent? A part of the Saxons opposed the transfer, and were shot for mutiny. What more could be done with revolted negroes?

Your king is the greatest dealer in human flesh in the world—for many years past it has been his custom to buy any body that could and would hold a musket; and, what is worse, he bought them with the express view of putting them in places of danger, where he was sure that many of them must be murdered. I say murdered—for the poor creatures had no part in his quarrels, nor did they exercise their free will in coming into his service. The men of Austria, Russia, Prussia, and all the rest, even the "turban'd Turks," have been as fairly and absolutely bought by the British nation, as ever was a cargo of negro slaves—the money and the men were counted, and their efficiency was inspected, the same as a doctor would be employed to examine the health, &c. of negroes in the market. All the twisting and turning in the world cannot alter the nature of this fact—but this was done, even the Turks were bought to fight and to be murdered, for "re-li-gi-on." O! foul and blasphemous hypocrisy!

And further—the miserable wretches thus purchased were not valued half so highly as if they had been negroes. King George only paid 30*l.* a piece for the Hessians he sent into America, to catch Washington and the rest, and hang them. Who will pretend to assert that they had any more to say at that sale, than a Congo negro in the public market has?—'Shaw!—impudence itself will not deny it.*

*The following extract is happily suited to the preceding remarks:

Extract from L'Observateur,

A PERIODICAL PUBLICATION AT BRUSSELS.

[L'Observateur is printed without date or number, just as the editors have leisure to compose them—the following articles appeared in June and July, and are translated from the French.]—Aurora

"In acceding to the treaty of alliance, concluded at Vienna the 25th of March, 1815, England reserved to herself the liberty of furnishing her contingent either in men or money, at the rate of 30 pounds sterling (about 650 francs) per man per annum. Before the French revolution, the average price of a negro was 3000 francs; the abolition of the trade, and the devastation of the French and Spanish colonies, has augmented the price, inasmuch that it is now from 3300 to 3900 francs.—Common flesh, (chair a canon) does not last long in Europe; by good calculators, its duration has been estimated at two years; suppose it lasts five; according to this basis, a white soldier is rated in London at 3250 francs. We then see that a difference in color makes some in the price of slaves; and that in Europe, the centre of light and civilization, a wholesale traffic is carried on by the potentates."

Do not suppose from these observations that I am most remotely an advocate for negro slavery. Indeed, I am not. But I confess I have a sensibility for white slaves as well as for black slaves; and am so dull-sighted that I cannot see any real difference between the "legitimacy of kings" and the principle of negro slavery. I frankly admit, that the work of reformation should begin at home. We have begun it and made great progress in it, and it would be completed, with great expedition, if we could get over the difficulty that arises from the difference of color, making us separated races of men. How this is to be removed, heaven only knows—we can only wish it were removed. But the fact ought to be recollected—that the introduction of this people was not the act of the republic—it was a royal business, chiefly by the "illustrious house of Brunswick," that saddled us with this misfortune; and, like other acts of your "beloved king," we must get rid of it as well as we can.

Resources. It is with a diffidence bordering nearly on fear, that I venture on an estimate of all the real and personal property of the United States.—The late assessments for the direct tax have afforded us some data whereby to make a calculation for the former; which, however, must still be arbitrary and uncertain—for it appears to me that the assessors in different states have acted upon different principles; and, besides, I have not yet seen many of their returns.

Most of the rest of the items are founded on mere matters of opinion, which is always various and uncertain. However, valuations of the property of nations are founded chiefly upon it, and are not to be relied on, though they may afford a general idea of considerable interest; and this is all that they can do. I will only further observe by way of apology for the daring attempt, that the schedule below has been made up by a reliance on facts, where facts were attainable by me; and that the items that have no facts whatever for their regulation, were adopted after considerable reflection.

I have thought on this subject, at times, for many years past, but not with an idea that I myself should ever venture on so grand an estimate. But there was one thing that I had fixed upon, and I have found my opinion corroborated by that of all others to whom I have mentioned it—which is, that the wealth of the United States has been at least doubled within the last ten years, and in the result given I had the satisfaction to find that this principle, applied to the calculations of Mr. Blodgett (the only gentleman that I have ever heard of who attempted such a valuation) considerably strengthens my opinion of my own—for, it is proper to say, that, resolving to keep my mind unbiassed by any items he has given us, I totally refused to look at his book until I had sketched my own; and that I had no recollection of the aggregate he gave us.

"One man it is said, menaces the security and the repose of Europe, and all the powers of this part of the world coalesce to overthrow him. Wonderful event! A stranger without partisans among the class of landholders, of merchants, of all that hold a rank in society, even in France, supported only by the lowest order of the people, puts in motion the universal league of kings. A haunt of pirates, which, for two centuries, has desolated European commerce, and renders every nation its tributary, has never been menaced with destruction, by a people indignant at its depredators; but it has found useful support among the others."

Affairs at Detroit.

FROM THE PITTSBURG MERCURY.

A friend has handed us for publication in the Pittsburg Mercury, the following documents, from No. 1 to No. 9, inclusive, in relation to some recent occurrences at Detroit. These documents will be read with much interest. They afford evidence of the hostile disposition of the British commanding officer towards the American government and people; they show the length to which he is disposed to go, in maintaining the British ascendancy over the minds of the Indians; and they furnish the most unequivocal testimony of a desire in the British authorities, to cherish and promote among the savages dispositions hostile to the United States, to be employed as future events may render necessary. These circumstances, connected with the preparations making by the British government, throughout the whole extent of the Canadian lines, loudly call for preparations also on the part of the U. States.

*I was much tempted to raise this item a great deal higher—the foreign goods in the hands of the merchants and shop-keepers and dealers, are probably worth more than one-fourth of the amount, and the stock of grain, &c. needful for the mere consumption of our people until the next harvest, cannot be worth less than 100 millions, or there will be a famine, which is not apprehended. If a person will examine the rest of the articles named in the items, he must feel satisfied that it might have been considerably advanced and still have continued within the range of probabilities. On the whole, I apprehend, after the best judgment I have of the matter, founded upon many calculations, arbitrary to be sure, that the value may be put down at five thousand millions of dollars.

The principle set up by the British authorities, of taking cognizance of alleged offences committed within the limits of the United States, is too absurd to admit of a moment's dispute. It is altogether unwarrantable. It strikes directly at our national sovereignty. In this light it must have appeared even to Col. James himself. Why then is the pretension advanced? Was it supposed that the American authorities were too timid to resist the preposterous claim, or too unjust to afford redress where it was due?—No! but the pompous interference of his majesty's agents in behalf of his old allies, in a matter which did not concern them, was designed to give the untutored savages exalted ideas of the friendship, the power, and the dignity of the British government—to make that government appear to them as the avenger of their wrongs. It was not a love of justice, but a design to magnify his own importance, which prevented Col. James from directing the Indians to the proper authority, the American government, for a hearing of their complaints.

Governor Cass has, however, met the application with becoming dignity and spirit. While the American courts are left open for the hearing of alleged offences, he suffers no interference of a foreign power with questions coming within the American jurisdiction. He will not suffer an American citizen to be transported to his majesty's dominions, for alleged crimes committed within the American territory.

In these remarks we have confined ourselves entirely to the unwarrantable interference of the British authorities. That the killing of the Kickapoo Indian was an act of self defence, we believe, from a perusal of the documents, admits of no doubt; as well as that the Indians in the neighborhood of Detroit, perhaps with the connivance of the British, are in the constant habit of committing depredations on the property of the American citizens.

We have one remark more to make. Why have the British authorities, in offering a reward for the offender, substituted the American currency, dollars in the room of pounds or guineas, which is the usual practice in their proclamations and other public documents? Was it intended by this, to operate on the minds of the citizens of the Michigan territory and thereby to excite them to acts unbecoming their own character, and the rights and dignity of their government? The question must be answered in the affirmative. But, we trust the attempt will be found as futile as it is insidious.

Sandwich, 5th October, 1815.

SIR—I beg leave to inform you, that it has been officially reported to me, that an Indian was yesterday murdered under most aggravated circumstances, in a canoe close to Gross Isle, by a shot fired from an American boat, having eight or ten men in her, supposed to be soldiers; and that an officer or non-commissioned officer was in the boat at the time this cruel act was perpetrated. This boat must have left Detroit yesterday.

I need not point out to you the line of conduct necessary on this occasion. I shall direct an inquest on the body to-morrow morning; and I beg leave to remind you, that this murder has been committed on the body of an offending Indian, and my pointing out the custom of savages, would be unnecessary in the present instance.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient, humble servant. H. JAMES, Lieut. col. comd'g.

His Excellency gov. Cass, Detroit.

Detroit, 5th October, 1815.

SIR—I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of this date. I will cause an inquiry to be made into the circumstances of the murder alleged to have been committed upon an Indian by a party of men in an American boat. If a murder has been committed by American citizens, and the perpetrators can be detected, they will suffer the punishment which the laws of all civilized nations provide for such an offence.

In an application of this kind, it was unnecessary to allude to the Indian custom of retaliating upon innocent individuals, injuries which any of their tribes may have received. The laws of this country operate with rigid impartiality upon all offenders; and confident I am, that no dread of the consequences will ever induce the courts of justice to punish the innocent, or to screen the guilty.

I will send a person over in the morning to attend the inquest, in order to procure such evidence as may elucidate the circumstances of the transaction, and lead to the detection and consequent punishment of the offenders.

I am sir, with respect, your obedient servant,
LEWIS CASS.

Col. James.

Detroit, 7th October, 1815.

SIR—Since my letter of the 5th inst. in answer to yours of that date, I have ascertained with precision the circumstances of the transaction which formed the subject of your communication.

The Indian alluded to was killed while in the act of presenting his gun at Mr. McComb, by one of the party who was with him. The event was connected with that predatory system which the Indians have pursued for some time upon the islands in the mouth of the river, and which if not checked, will be attended with still more disastrous consequences to them. I state these facts, not in consequence of the representation which I had the honor to receive from you, but merely in justice to Mr. McComb, that erroneous impressions may not prevail with respect to his conduct in the business. The Indian was killed within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States; and a British officer has, consequently, no right to require, nor ought an American officer to give, any explanation upon the subject.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
LEWIS CASS.

Lieut. col. James.

[ENCLOSURE.]

Amherstburg, 21st Oct. 1815.

SIR—Yesterday, in council, the prophet requested that you should be informed, that the Americans had stolen eight horses and a colt, off Stony Island, belonging to the Kickapoos, to which place they had crossed them before the Indian was killed, preparatory to their going to their own country. He said, that if the Americans were disposed to be peaceable, they would make no difficulty in having those horses restored; and requested you will have the goodness to make the demand from them; that last summer, when some of their young men stole a number of horses from the other side, you requested them to be restored; at that time they listened to your words, and immediately gave them up.—Those horses were stolen a few nights after the Kickapoo was killed.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

W. CALDWELL, A. D. S. G.

Lieut. col. James, &c. &c.

No. VI.

Detroit, 26th October, 1815.

SIR—I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 21st inst. enclosing one from a Mr. Caldwell.

The terms of his letter prevent me from taking any notice of it. Upon the general relation of the Indian tribes to our respective governments, and the right of mutual interference, such misunderstanding has prevailed, and I am so anxious to remove all collision as well of sentiment as of action, that I will take the liberty of stating my opinion upon the subject. The jurisdiction of the United States and of Great Britain within their territorial limits, is exclusive. If the Indians residing under the protection of either, are injured, they must apply for redress to the government of the country within which they live, and can obtain only that redress which its laws prescribe. If an Indian is injured in his person or his property within this territory, our laws have amply provided for the punishment of the offender, and the redress of the party injured. We do not acknowledge in principle nor shall we ever admit in practice, the right of any foreign authorities to interfere in any arrangement or discussion between us and the Indians living within our territory. Any other principle would render the sovereignty of the United States merely nominal; and by giving to the agents of another government the right of interfering, would lay the foundation for continued disputes.

If the Indians were in the habit of stealing horses from your side of the river, and bringing them here, I should consider it my duty to put a stop to the practice and to restore the property. This was the case of the Indians who stole horses from the Miami last summer, and took them to Malden. You directed their restoration, and in a similar case I shall cheerfully follow the example.

But, if the injury is done in Upper Canada, there exists no right in the United States to interfere, and if done here, there is no right of interference in the British authorities there. Were an Indian injured at Malden, you would think the course of procedure undecorous, and the demand inadmissible, should an Indian agent here hold a council upon the subject, and demand of you that the injury should be redressed, and in substance tell you that the alternative of peace or war depended upon your decision. I am inclined to think you would form the same opinion of him that I do of this Mr. Caldwell, and impute his conduct to a profound ignorance of the relative rights of nations, or to a more artful, though less unpardonable motive, that of preserving an influence over the Indians to be used as subsequent events may render expedient.

In the application of these principles, I have only to observe, that Stony Island, whence these horses were stated to have been taken, is in this territory; that the horses were not taken from there to Canada, and that a British officer has consequently no right to make any claim in behalf of the Indians upon the subject. But, sir, to yourself personally, I freely say, that I did not hesitate a moment to enquire into the transaction. I found that these horses were taken from Stony Island to Gross Isle, under the impression that they belonged to people of this territory, and for the purpose of reclaiming them; and that four others and a colt followed these. As soon as the fact was reported to me, I directed that the whole should be brought here with a view to restore those which had not been stolen.

On their arrival here, one was identified, as the property of a citizen of this place, and has been delivered to him. The other shall be delivered to the Indians who own them, as soon as they appear to claim them.

With much respect, sir, I have the honor to be,
your most obedient servant,
Lieut. Col. James. LEWIS CASS.

Five hundred dollars reward.

WHEREAS, by an inquest taken by the coroner of the western district, it appears to the magistrates in special session assembled, that an Indian of the Kickapoo nation was, on the evening of the 4th inst. wilfully murdered, on the navigable waters of the Detroit river, by persons unknown.

A reward of five hundred dollars will be given to any person or persons that will secure the perpetrator or perpetrators of the said murder, in some one of his majesty's jails in this province.

Done in special session at Sandwich, the 18th day of October, in the 55th year of his majesty's reign.

By LEWIS CASS, governor in and over the territory of Michigan.

A PROCLAMATION.

WHEREAS a reward of five hundred dollars has been offered by the magistrates of the western district of Upper Canada, for the apprehension of the person alleged to have murdered an Indian on the 4th inst. on the navigable waters of the Detroit river, and for securing him in any jail in that province; and whereas, the Indian in question was killed while in a canoe, within a few rods of Gross Isle, by a man upon that island, and as it is stated, while in the act of presenting his gun at one of the party which was with him; and whereas, the island of Gross Isle is in this territory, and the right of the United States to its jurisdiction has never been contested, and the Indian at the time he was killed, was a considerable distance on the west side of the middle of the water communication between lakes Erie and Huron, which forms the boundary between the United States and the possessions of his Britannic majesty:

Now, therefore, that pretensions so unfounded may be resisted, and attempts so unjustifiable may be repelled; that the people of this territory may not be transported to a foreign country for acts committed here; and that the Indians residing within the United States, may not be taught to look to the agents of another government for that protection and redress which our laws so fully afford, and a foreign influence thereby acquired and exercised over them as incompatible with the sovereignty of the United States, as it is with the amicable relations existing between them and Great Britain, and the hope that those relations will continue, I have issued this my proclamation, hereby requiring all persons, citizens of this territory, or residing therein, to repel by force, all attempts which may be made to apprehend any person on the west side of the middle of the water communication aforesaid, whether upon the land or the water, by virtue of the advertisement before mentioned, or of any process which may issue from any authority, other than that of the United States, or of this territory.—And to apprehend and secure all persons offending in the premises, that they may be dealt with according to law.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand, and caused the great seal of the territory to be affixed, at Detroit, this twenty-seventh day of October, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fifteen.

Detroit, October 27, 1815.

Sir—Agreeable to request, I transmit to you for your information, a statement of the facts relative to the killing of an Indian on the shore of Gross Isle.

I was on my way in a batteau, accompanied by nine men, to Gross Isle. When arrived within about a mile of my house, on Gross Isle, I heard the report of a rifle, which proceeded from the shore. I immediately ordered the men to put to shore with the boat. The shore where the batteau landed was high on a bluff—I ascended it unaccompanied by any of the men; when arrived at the summit of the bank, I discovered an Indian tent pitched and a bark cabin. I entered the cabin, where I found one Indian, a squaw, and two or three young children. I observed the squaw was working at something which she endeavored to conceal; upon a nearer examination of the matter, I found that the object of her labor was a number of cattle's feet. I asked the Indian where he procured so many of them; he informed me he had got them at the wigwam, pointing to my house. I told him I had not killed any cattle this summer, and consequently he must have taken that liberty himself. I then left him and returned to the batteau, where I desired two or three of the men to come with me and see what these fellows had been committing. The men followed me up to the hill and entered the cabin, where in addition to the cows or cattle's feet, they found two or three tails, which appeared to be taken from animals that had been but lately killed. I then informed the Indian that if I caught him or any of his tribe upon the island after to-morrow, that I would come with the men I had with me then, and massacre every one of them. I was then proceeding to the batteau, with the intention of going off; when I perceived four or five Indians issuing from the woods, with their rifles upon their shoulders. They came up to the place where I was standing, and passed by me to their canoe, which lay about twenty yards from the batteau. When they had arrived at their canoe and were entering it, I (still standing on the top of the hill with the three men) called to them and bade them be off and never more to make their appearance on the island.—Whilst I was speaking to them, the Indian whom I found in the cabin came forward and addressed them in the Indian language, upon which they set up the most hideous yell I ever listened to in my life. The canoe in which they were during the time I was speaking to them, had been shoved or paddled from the shore about ten or twelve feet, when one of the Indians seized his rifle, (which he had placed in the bottom of the canoe) and levelled it at me, with what intention I could not divine at the time. The men in the boat cried out, "Mr. Macomb, he is going to shoot you," upon which one of the men who was near me, immediately fired upon him and killed him. He fell in the bottom of the canoe and was taken over to the English side. It was with the greatest difficulty I could prevent the men in the boat from firing upon them after the first one had fired. I then ordered the men to return with me to the boat, and we proceeded on our way to my house. This, sir, is a true statement of facts; and, permit me to add, that I have often been annoyed by these insolent fellows, who have been heretofore instrumental in killing my cattle on the island.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

DAVID R. MACOMB.

Sworn to before me at Detroit, the day and year as above written.

CHRONICLE.

Treaty of commerce. The London Morning Chronicle of Oct. 6, positively says that no such "treaty is signed," between Great Britain and the United States. If a treaty has not been signed, we believe that some arrangement pretty much like one has been agreed to, and that the British acted upon it in removing their discriminating duties.

Algerines and Dutch. By a vessel from Cadiz we learn that the Dutch squadron in the Mediterranean was at Leghorn, and that it was said an Algerine fleet of 30 sail, including small vessels, had put to sea for the purpose of meeting the Dutch.

Commerce. Since this day week (says a late New York paper) there have arrived at this port, fifty-five sail of vessels from foreign ports, mostly ships, with valuable cargoes; and after the storm of Easterly weather which now prevails, it is highly probable as many more may come in, in the course of another week.

Gen. Jackson, now at Washington city, is receiving every mark of respect that a grateful people can bestow.

Gen. Cushing, late of the United States army, has been appointed collector of the port of New London.

Gen. Mitchell, formerly governor of Georgia, has been re-elected by the legislature in the place of gov. Early. On the first ballot the votes were, for gov. Early 51—Gen. Mitchell 47, and 22 scattering—on the second ballot, Gen. M. 97, Gov. E. 49 and 4 scattering.

Adjutant and Inspector General's Office.

GENERAL ORDER.—The several memorials, recently presented to the War Department, relative to changes of uniform, have been considered.

The uniform of the army established during the war, must be observed by the officers of the Peace Establishment, and fancy dresses, resembling the military, without conforming to the regulations, are not to be worn.

By order of the secretary of war,

D. PARKER, Adj. and Ins. Gen.

Seamen. Since the reduction of their navy, the British seem as anxious to get rid of "foreign seamen" as they were before to steal them. Some of the London papers told us a little while ago that all such were to be discharged, and behold! on the very day that the people of New-York, (the 25th November) were celebrating the anniversary of the evacuation of their city by the British in 1783, a ship arrives from England, as a cartel with 173 impressed seamen recently discharged from British ships of war, and another vessel is expected with the people of color, which the British officers, wanting men, mistook for Englishmen, Irishmen or Scotchmen!

It is stated that in several places the British seamen forcibly board private vessels to ascertain if there be any "foreign seamen," insisting on their discharge, to get home or subsist as well as they can.

The unfortunate Epervier. An officer of one of the U.S. ships just arrived at Newport, has furnished the following list of the officers of the Epervier:—Lt. com. Shubrick; lieutenant. Barnwell; lieutenant. Drury; sailing master Wright; midshipman Coulter, and Hunter, and several others. Passengers, capt. Lewis; lieutenants. Neal and Yarnell. The Americans released at Algiers were also on board.

We have had a report that the Epervier was sunk by a British 74, because lieutenant. Shubrick nobly refused to shew his commission. There is no probability in this story.

Shipping at New-York. On Saturday last there were lying in the harbor of New York, 121 American and 18 foreign ships; 1 American and 2 foreign barques; 84 American and 22 foreign brigs; 1 foreign galliot; 128 American and 6 foreign schooners; 234 American and 3 foreign sloops;—total 602 merchant vessels. This enumeration does not include small vessels, of which there are a great number.

William B. Giles, of Virginia, has resigned his seat in the senate of the United States.

Extract of a letter from an officer on board the U. S. Brig Enterprize.

"We remained at Malaga about two days and then returned to Gibraltar—here we were joined by all commodore Decatur's squadron, excepting his own ship. Our fleet now consisted of the Independence, Macedonian, United States, Constellation, Congress, Ontario, Erie, Enterprize, Chippewa, Saranac, Boxer, Firefly, Flambeau, Torch, Spitfire, Sparks and Lynx. It was a proud sight for an American to see in a British port just at the close of a war with her, which the English thought would have been the destruction of our navy, a squadron of seventeen sail, larger perhaps than our whole navy at the commencement of that war. At Malaga the governor waited on commodore Bainbridge on board his ships an honor which he had never deigned to pay to any admiral before.—On our arrival at Gibraltar the commodore fired a salute of seventeen guns, which was returned with fifteen. Commodore Bainbridge immediately sent an officer on shore to inform the lt. governor that he had fired 17 guns, and expected his salute to be returned gun for gun, and he therefore demanded that two more guns should be immediately fired. The lt. governor apologized and fired the other two guns. Thus you see, my dear—, that an American commodore can now demand respect from those who formerly would scarcely have noticed him.

"You have no idea of the respect which the American character has gained by our late wars. The Spaniards, especially, think we are devils incarnate: as we beat the English, who beat the French who best them whom nobody ever beat before—and the Algerines, whom the devil himself could not beat."

TELEGRAPHS.—New York, Nov. 23.—Mr. Schultze, we understand, has obtained a Patent from the President of the United States for a newly-invented Telegraph, which it is intended to submit to the corporation of this city for the purpose of having it adopted at the Narrows. It exhibits whole sentences in the same regular order as common reading.

Many articles in type omitted—But nothing important. Bonaparte has landed at St. Helena.

The documents and papers to be laid before congress, from the different departments, relative to the particular concerns of each, respectively, will, doubtless, be, as well for the past as the future, of the most interesting character, and no labor or expense shall be spared to insert every thing in detail that may appear useful. We have made excellent arrangements for receiving all such.

We have matter enough on hand, that ought to be inserted, to fill four or five numbers of the REGISTER. Among the articles are three letters on naval affairs, lately published in the Columbian, having reference to those which recently appeared in this paper, revised and communicated by their author. All which shall be disposed of as fast as is possible, compatible with a due regard to variety and passing events. Also, the patriotic communications of the governors of Georgia, North-Carolina, Virginia and South Carolina to their respective legislatures.

The present number is rich in statistics. We are promised a similar exposition of the facts, resulting from the late assessment of Maryland, and will be very thankful to receive them from other states. These tables are among the most interesting and important things we shall have to record.

Biographical Memoir

Of Governor Tompkins, of New York.

The lives of men who have risen to distinction, in any country, become an interesting and laudable object of curiosity to the public. In a free country, such as our own, where the same road to honour and preferment, is open to every man, it affords an useful lesson to trace the early career of genius to that maturity of vigour, that places a citizen above his fellows. During the many severe and arduous struggles which the United States have had, as well in their internal as in their external relations, since their memorable declaration of independence, to maintain it unimpaired, no man has given more important proofs of patriotism than the subject of this memoir; and from the commencement to the termination of our last contest with Great Britain, his services have been unremittingly devoted to his country. To the life of such a man we look with peculiar interest, for the early developement of those vigorous powers whose constant exertion for the public good, has placed him in the first rank of public benefactors.

John Tompkins, the great grand father of our present subject, together with his brother Nathaniel emigrated with their families, from the north of England, during the religious persecutions which distracted that country, to Plymouth in the then province of Massachusetts. There they remained but a short time, having become joint patentees of a tract of land in East Chester in the state of New-York, to which they removed. John supported through life the character of an honest man, and died at an advanced age, leaving two sons and a daughter. His eldest son Joshua from whom the governor is descended, lived also to a very advanced age, and nobly sustained the reputation of the family by the incorruptible probity of his conduct.—He had twelve children; of whom Jonathan Griffin the Governor's father was the sixth. He was born on the 8th of June, 1736, and at the age of four years was adopted by, and entered the family of Jonathan Griffin, a respectable farmer and merchant residing at Fox Meadows on the river Bronx, who was his uncle by marriage, and from whom he received his name. At a proper age Jonathan was put to the study of physic; but not being pleased with the profession, he returned, after a short time, to his uncle and continued to superintend his farming and mercantile concerns. In 1758 he married Sarah, the daughter of Caleb Hyatt, Esqr. of White Plains. She bore him twelve children, and died in April, 1810, at the age of 70, universally respected for the many virtues which distinguished her life. In 1772 Jonathan being cut off from all hopes of inheritance from his uncle, by the marriage of that gentleman with a widow of large family, purchased the farm at Fox Meadows where he still continues to reside. At the commencement of the revolution, he was found ready to take an active part with his country; and at the battle of White Plains was driven from his house and farm by the enemy, to which he did not return until the close of the war. Elijah Crawford, James Varian, and himself were the only inhabitants of the town of Scarsdale (or Fox Meadows) who advocated the cause of their country against oppression. Crawford was killed in the early part of the war. Varian was wounded and retired to Danbury in Connecticut; after the peace he returned to his farm and died a few years ago at an advanced age.—Mr. Tompkins was a member of the state convention which adopted the declaration of independence, and the constitution of the state. Immediately after the convention, he was appointed Judge of the Court of Common Pleas for West Chester county. He was a member of the legislature during the whole period of the revolution, and for several years after its termination; and was named upon almost all the important committees during that time.—On the institution of the University of the state, he was appointed one of the Regents, and continued to hold that situation until his resignation of it in 1805. He was appointed the first judge of the county, which honorable station he held until he arrived at the age of constitutional exclusion. In 1801 he was chosen a member of the state convention, after which he chose to retire from public life, and has since devoted himself exclusively to domestic concerns, and to the superintendence of his farm. Although now on the eve of four-score years, he continues to enjoy the most perfect health, and the possession of all his faculties in unimpaired vigour—the consequence of an industrious, temperate and well spent life.

DANIEL D. TOMPKINS, the subject of this memoir, is the seventh son of the venerable patriot Jonathan G. and was born on the 21st June, 1774, at Scarsdale (Fox meadows) in Westchester county. In early youth his constitution was extremely delicate, to which circumstance he is indebted for the classical education which his father determined to bestow upon him. To this end, he was placed, in September 1787 at the grammar school of Malcom Campbell in New York, from whence, at the end of a year, he was removed to the academy at North Salem, in his native county, then under the superintendence of the Rev'd Amzi Lewis. Here he continued until May 1792, when he was entered of the Sophomore class in Columbia college. At his first examination, he discovered such uncommon proficiency, that he was placed at the head of one of the most respectable classes that ever graduated at that college.*

During the whole period of his collegiate course, his conduct was highly exemplary and honorable to himself, and for the last year he imposed upon himself a double share of labour and study, having entered the office of Peter Jay Munroe, Esq. as student of law. Compelled as he was to perform the arduous duties of clerk in an office of so much business, it required all his industry and all the exertion of his vigorous intellect, to preserve at the same time the pre-eminent stand which his classical attainments had gained for him in the college. This he accomplished, however, with undiminished reputation, and at the commencement in 1795, he received his diploma, and was appointed to deliver the adieu—a mark of distinction which is always conferred upon the best scholar. In this case the honor was in no small degree enhanced by the consideration of the many excellent scholars of which his class was composed.

At the August term in 1797, Mr. Tompkins was admitted an attorney of the Supreme court, and after the usual period, a counsellor. As a practitioner at the bar, few young men ranked higher, or received a more liberal share of business. The talents, ability, and stern integrity which he displayed on all occasions soon made him a favorite with the people, from whom he has since received the highest political honors which they could bestow upon him. Born in the times of persecution and oppression, nursed in the lap of revolutionary war, and imbued from his earliest infancy, a spirit of independence from the example of his patriotic father, young Tompkins could not be otherwise than a republican. In the party struggles of 1799, 1800, and 1801, he bore a prominent and conspicuous part; and to his individual exertions in the latter years, may, in a great measure be attributed the success of the republicans in the election of the illustrious Jefferson to the presidency. In the 7th ward of the city of New York in which he had married the daughter of Alderman Menckhorne, and where he resided, he was personally known to almost every citizen. The confidence which they reposed in his prudence, talents and integrity was unbounded. This ward which had been federal gave an unexpected majority to the republican interest which decided the election of the city, the state, and ultimately of the union.

In 1801 Mr. Tompkins was elected a representative of the city, in the convention then called for the purpose of revising the constitution of the state. In the debate on that construction of the constitution which deprived the governor of the right of exclusive nomination to office; he was the only republican member at first who declared and voted against it.

The federalists were but feebly represented in this convention; and it was in the power of the majority to have reduced the number of the senate by vacating the seats of eight federal senators. The liberality of Mr. Tompkins could not brook the idea of turning out his political opponents, except in fair election combat. He therefore planned and submitted to chief justice Thompson, then also a member of the convention, a project for vacating by ballot the seat of eight senators from such classes as that the inevitable result would be the vacation of the seats of four federal and four republican senators. Chief justice Thompson reduced the proposed plan to resolutions, which were the next day introduced and adopted by the committee. This liberality was highly appreciated at the time by the federal members of the convention.

In 1802 he was elected a member of the state legislature; but would have declined accepting, had it not been for the unanimous solicitation of the nominating committee, who hoped by his means to heal the breach which then first began to manifest itself between the friends of Clinton and Burr. Upon the election of chief justice Lewis to the gubernatorial chair, Mr. Tompkins was unanimously appointed to succeed him as judge of the superior court of New-York. This appointment received the decided approbation of all the gentlemen of the bar, of both political parties, and particularly of the late general Hamilton. In 1804 he was elected to represent the city of New-York in the congress of the United States, as a colleague of the learned Dr. Mitchell. In 1806, upon the death of John S. Hobart, district judge of the United States for the district of New-York, the appointment was conferred upon judge Tompkins, without his solicitation or knowledge; but he declined accepting it, and continued to discharge the duties of chief justice of the state until the spring of 1807, when his fellow citizens turned their eyes upon him, then only 32 years of age, as the rival candidate of Lewis for the chief magistracy of the state. The immense majority by which he was elected, was at once the best evidence of the correctness of his judicial conduct, and the most satisfactory proof of the undiminished confidence of the public. The accuracy of his decisions, and the eloquence of his charges and addresses as chief justice, have received the united approbation of his brethren of the bar, and of the community.

Upon the day of his induction into the office of governor, the intelligence was received of the base and wanton attack of the British upon the frigate Chesapeake, in the waters of the United States; and with it the orders of the president, calling upon the governors to organize their respective quotas of militia. The electric spark of patriotism flashed through the soul of Tompkins, and in an instant the peaceful judge was transformed into the armed soldier. The adjutant general of the state was sick, and unable to attend to his duties; but this did not delay the execution of the president's orders. In a few weeks governor Tompkins' quota was organized, and disciplined in a manner which evinced the most consummate military knowledge.

In the year 1808 the command of all the regular and militia force, on the frontiers of New-York, was given by the president to governor Tompkins, with a view to their being employed in aid of the revenue and civil officers; but no specific instructions

Were given to define the extent of their powers and duties on that service. In this state of the affair, the governor, with that energy and promptitude of character which had marked every action of his useful life, took upon himself the responsibility of issuing the necessary orders, the result of which proved that the president's reliance upon him was not misplaced. His instructions to the military on this occasion received also the marked approbation of general Wilkinson, then-commander in chief of the army.

In 1812 he gave a proof of energy and upright independence of principle which excited the astonishment and admiration of the whole United States. It will be recollected that the legislature of New-York had lent a favorable ear to the petitions of various banking companies for incorporation; and a system had been projected, and fostered by bribery and corruption, which threatened irreparable evils to the community. In his communication to the legislature, in February of this year, the governor dwelt upon this subject with peculiar force, and clearly and ably pointed out the inexpediency and danger of multiplying the banking institutions; but such had been the gigantic strides of corruption that the pernicious law would have been enacted, had not the governor exerted his constitutional privilege of proroguing the legislature. This was the first time that such a measure had been resorted to, under the present form of government; and, as might have been expected, it excited unusual warmth of animadversion.

Every thing conspired to render the succeeding gubernatorial election in New-York an object of universal interest to the people of the United States. War had been declared against Great Britain. A numerous and powerful party of disaffected citizens had shewn itself in the Eastern states. A "northern confederacy" had been formed, with a view to paralyze the energies and cripple the resources of the United States; and it became the avowed object of many persons of high consideration in that section of the union to make a separate peace with the enemy of the republic. But to make this horrible project effectual, it was necessary to gain New-York; and upon that state, first in population and wealth, rested the hopes and the fears of all, as they desired to preserve or to destroy the constitution. The bold and unprecedented stand which gov. Tompkins had taken in the prorogation of the legislature, had raised up a host of enemies among the banking interest; and disaffection had reared its gorgon head even in the ranks of republicans; many of whom united with their political opponents in denouncing him as a tyrant and despot. A majority of federal members had been elected to the state legislature, and to congress; the disastrous issue of our first campaign had spread dismay among the friends of the general government; and the most influential and popular leader of the opposite party was set up as the rival candidate. In this perilous crisis the hopes of the union rested upon Tompkins; for, in his re-election was involved, in a great degree, the capacity of the government to prosecute the war with effect. Those anxious hopes were not disappointed. Firm as the rocky mountains of his native state, the rude storm of opposition howled against him in vain—the shafts of malevolence aimed at his character, but served to mark him as the people's shield—they knew him—they loved him—they trusted him again, and saved the union.

That this last assertion may not be received with incredulity, it will only be necessary to take a view of the geographical situation of New-York; and to recollect, that though governor Tompkins was re-elected by an overwhelming majority, yet one branch of the legislature, the council of appointment, and of course the principal military officers of the state were violent in their opposition to the national administration, and to the prosecution of the war.

The local situation of New-York exposed it in a peculiar manner to hostile attack; the citizens were disaffected in the east—the enemy harassed the northern frontier from Champlain to Presqu'isle, and threatened the capital of the state in the south. Unaided by the constituted authorities appointed to share with him in the government of the state, the governor had alone to sustain the arduous, embarrassing and responsible duty of defence. This was a situation, well calculated to dismay the stoutest heart. But Tompkins rose superior to circumstances—undaunted and undismayed, he leaned upon his own strength; and by the firm, unshaken energy of his conduct, astonished and confounded the rebellious spirits of the east, and silenced, or rendered ineffectual the opposition of his own state.

In the winter of 1813—14, having recommended to the legislature to raise volunteer regiments for the defence of the frontier, and to organize a militia force for the protection of the city of New-York, without effect; he was compelled again to call into action the resources of his own vigorous mind; and, accordingly, upon his own responsibility, while the legislature was still in session, issued orders for organizing a brigade of volunteers, to the command of which he appointed general PETER B. PORTER. In defiance of all opposition, and with officers commissioned only by the brevet assignments of the governor, this noble band of patriots were soon ready for the field. The gallant conduct of Porter's brigade in every action of the Niagara campaign, and their example to the militia at the memorable sortie from Fort Erie, which have crowned them with imperishable laurels, is alone sufficient to prove the wisdom and prudence of the governor in their organization and appointment—a measure which was most probably, under Providence, the means of saving the remnant of the gallant army of Niagara.

In the eventful campaign of 1814 we find the talents and energy of the governor again called into action. Not only was the Niagara frontier in danger, but apprehensions were excited for the fate of Sackett's Harbor, Plattsburg and New-York.—Equal to every emergency, and unappalled by the disapprobation or censure of the legislature, the governor called into the field a large body of militia and organized a corps of sea fencibles without waiting the slow sanction of an unwilling legislature, and by every other means of prudent precaution, placed the exposed and valuable harbor of New-York in a state of defence. In this important measure, he received the cordial support and co-operation of the gallant Decatur, who commanded the naval force of the United States on that station.

About this time intelligence was received of the strange, unexpected, and disgraceful capture of Washington; and of the intended movement of the enemy towards Baltimore. The feelings excited on this occasion, may be easily imagined.—Decatur—in the splendor of whose name all epithets are lost—Decatur resolved at once to push forward with his sailors and marines to the assistance of Baltimore; and invited general Lewis, who then commanded the regulars at New-York, to include in the expedition 500 of his infantry. These officers waited upon governor Tompkins to ask his approbation of the plan: It was obtained instantly.

but the governor thought it not enough to grant a cold assent to the measure; he offered to accompany them himself as far as New Brunswick, that his example might add spirit to the enterprise. General Lewis afterwards withdrew his co-operation at the solicitation of the corporation; but the governor continued firm; and but for the glorious news of the enemy's retreat from Baltimore, which arrived just in time to prevent it, Decatur, with his gallant associates, would have been on the march in a few hours.

In October, 1814, the president appointed governor Tompkins to the command of the 3d military district, which comprehended one of the most valuable portions of the United States, and included the largest and most heterogeneous military force that ever before fell to the command of an American general. The complete organization, the correct discipline, and the efficient services of the troops of this district, afforded the best evidence of his fitness for that high and important station; while the cheerful acquiescence in his orders, the warm expressions of gratitude, of confidence, and of respect for his character, which flowed in addresses from all quarters, on the disbandment of these troops, must have brought a recompense to his mind which none but the patriot can appreciate—it was the only recompense which he asked, or received for all his arduous toils.

During the most embarrassing time of the fall of this year, at a moment when the pervicacity of the eastern states, was throwing every obstacle in his way, to add to his labors and perplexities, the general government were desirous of fitting out an expedition to dislodge the enemy from Castine. They had applied to the governor of Massachusetts, as more immediately concerned, for his aid in raising the necessary funds—this aid was refused. In this dilemma, the situation of the general government was hinted to governor Tompkins. A hint to him was enough. Nobly forgetting the perverse opposition of Massachusetts to all his own labors, and regarding her only as a sister of the union, for whose safety the whole were interested, he magnanimously came forward with his individual credit, and upon his own responsibility, raised the sum of three hundred thousand dollars, which he forthwith subjected to the orders of general Dearborn, then commanding in Massachusetts. Comment upon such an instance of noble generosity and disinterested patriotism, would only sully its lustre. He will find his reward in the love of a grateful people.

It only remains to speak of Mr. Tompkins in his less conspicuous, though not less useful character, of governor of New York. When he entered upon the duties of that office, there was but one arsenal, and not a single magazine in the state. There are now eleven of the former, and three of the latter, abundantly supplied. The arsenal at New York, in its arrangements and equipments, is, perhaps, equal to any thing of its kind in the world; and is an object of universal admiration to those who visit that city. The arms belonging to the state exhibited a strange medley of various manufactures, calibres and lengths, which rendered them not only inelegant in appearance, but nearly useless in service. New York now possesses the best collection of muskets in the United States—of uniform manufacture, and of a model which has been since very generally adopted.

The interests of literature have also received the fostering attention of the governor; and, notwithstanding the many unpropitious circumstances of the times, a greater number of colleges and acadmies have been erected and endowed, than in any former period of the same extent of time, in the history of the state. The facilities of intercourse throughout the state, by land and water, have been greatly encouraged and advanced; and the reputation of New York, at home and abroad, has never stood upon so commanding an eminence, as under the guardianship of governor Tompkins.

At the close of the late war, the governor purchased a farm in Richmond county, commanding an elegant view of the city; where he constantly resides, when not called away by the duties of his public station, enjoying the sweetest solace of which the mind of man is susceptible—the veneration and esteem of all his neighbors.

British Corn Law.

From the Boston Daily Advertiser.

The following is the substance of the corn law which has recently occasioned such a ferment in England. It has already gone into operation, notice having been given that the prices are below the limit prescribed for prohibiting importation for home consumption.

It is enacted that after the passing of the corn law, corn, meal or flour, the produce of any foreign country which may now be imported, shall be allowed at all times to be brought into the united kingdom, to be warehoused there under the existing regulations, without paying any duty whatever; and the same may at any time be taken out of the warehouses and exported without paying any duty, under the regulations already in force. And the same may be also taken out of the warehouses and entered for home consumption, whenever the like articles shall be admissible into the kingdom for home consumption.

Whenever the average prices of British corn, made up and published in the manner already required by law, shall be at or above the following rates, viz: wheat at or above 80s. quarter—rye, peas and beans, 53s—barley beer or bigg, 40s—and oats, 27s; foreign corn meal and flour shall be permitted to be imported for home consumption, free of duty. But when the average prices of British corn shall be below the above rates, foreign corn shall neither be imported for home consumption, nor taken out of the warehouses for that purpose.—The average prices are to be fixed quarterly, on the 15th of Feb. May, August, and November. But if within six weeks after permitting importation for home consumption on any quarterday, the average prices shall be below the above mentioned rates, notice is to be given and importation prohibited from all ports between the river Eyder and Bidaston, until a new average shall be made.

From the British colonies in North America, importations may be made for home consumption, free of duty, whenever the price of wheat be at, or above 67s the quarter; rye, peas and beans 44s; barley, beer and bigg 33s. Corn, meal or flour, from the colonies, whenever not admissible for home consumption, may be warehoused free of duty, and taken out of warehouse for exportation, or for home consumption, when the average prices will permit, in the same manner as the same articles from foreign countries.

Notice was given, May 15, that the ports would be shut in a few days against the importation of foreign grain for home consumption, and would continue shut until the 15th of August.

P. S.—It may be proper to observe, that the equalization of the valuations on the respective districts was not agreed to by all the assessors. The principal assessor of the second and sixth districts complained of the decision, and remonstrated against the principle on which the decision was made—that was, the quota of the different counties, as settled by the legislature, as both illegal and improper. And it is probable, as the subject will be thoroughly investigated, that in case of any future direct tax, a more correct rule of equalization will be observed.

NOTES—*In this district the abstract did not contain the number of dwelling-houses and out-houses of each county distinctly, but the aggregate of the two counties.

†In this district the assistant assessors did not ascertain the dwelling-houses and out-houses correctly. Often lots were named, which contained buildings that are not included in the above enumeration; and, therefore, the number is, by far, too little.

The Floridas.

From the London Morning Chronicle, Sept. 21.

It was natural to expect, after a war like that of the peninsula, in which so much British blood and treasure were exhausted, that the subject of indemnities would come on the carpet, as soon as the object was attained and peace established. It was a very difficult matter, however, to settle this point, in consequence of the indefinite terms of the treaty made by Mr. Canning, and the difficulty of treating with Ferdinand and his ministers, who, far from being prepared to give an indemnity, rather thought we had done more harm than good in aiding to liberate the peninsula, and would have been happy if an Englishman had never trod their ground. Hence, by every means in their power, are they now trying to undo what little, social as well as political, improvements we sought to introduce, and it will be no wonder, if in the next edict issued by the inquisition, it be deemed a crime of heretical pravity, for a Spaniard to be heard speaking English. This indemnity question, consequently, has met with great difficulties, as well for the reasons just assigned as because the services to be compensated were performed to the cortes, and it would be very inconsistent, after his past conduct, for Ferdinand to seek to remunerate them, and indeed he only knows of them by hearsay.

Under this state of things it is easy to conceive the great dilemma in which the ministers have been placed, as well as their worthy representatives in Madrid, who have not learned logic enough to undo the syllogisms and other knotty arguments the monastic counsellors of Ferdinand bring forward on this subject. This indemnity question was, however, warmly agitated in Madrid in November last, and the whole weight and influence of England at last wrested from the tenacious Spaniards, it is generally believed, an indemnity, viz. East and West Florida. It is generally supposed that several demands were made before this point was agreed on, viz. a free trade to Spanish America, the cotton trade of Spain, the Island of Puerto Rico, the Spanish part of St. Domingo, Cuba, the Balears, Canaries and for what we know, the Philippine Islands. Eldier of these bonuses, separately, might, perhaps, have satisfied our wishes, but the Spaniards were too wise to let one go; so it would seem as if he had been forced to be content with the Floridas, because Spain could retain them no longer on account of the North Americans and the neighboring revolutions of Mexico. In making this concession, however, it is not clear, whether some valuable principle has not been given up, and whether some condition has not been exacted from us, opposed to the feelings and wishes of the people of England.—Time will enlighten us on this point a little more, but in Spanish America, we ought to remember, there is at present a general insurrection against tyrannical power, a strong and irresistible impulse of human nature groaning under oppression, a revolution, in short, the most just and interesting in its nature as well as its consequences to the world, to be found in the annals of history.

To suppress this revolution, we know that the Inquisition has been armed with the bayonet and the dagger, that religion has been prostituted, and that all the energies of rancor and malice have been set to work. To suppress this revolution also Spain has frequently called upon England under a plea, that in our treaty we had guaranteed the integrity of the Spanish monarchy. It would be long and tedious to carry our readers through the various occasions in which Spain has urged England to interfere and decide against her ultramarine provinces. but this treaty has even, by the agents of the latter, been interpreted into the right of demanding the persons of Spanish Americans landing in England. It has hitherto been thought that these remonstrances, on the part of Spain, have been unnoticed, but in our last treaty there is an additional clause, inserted on August 24, 1814, as the 3d additional article whereas the body of the same is signed on 5th July, same year, which has created some alarm. It is as follows:

“His Britannic majesty being anxious that the troubles and disturbances which unfortunately prevail in the dominions of his Catholic majesty in America should cease, and the subjects of these provinces should return to their obedience to their lawful sovereign, engages to take the most effectual measures for preventing his subjects from furnishing arms, ammunition, or any other warlike article to the revolted in America.”

To this another circumstance of a more important nature has lately been added, tending to prove that some change has taken place in the policy of England, which in the last parliament was pledged to be strictly, nay, delicately, neutral between Spain and her ultramarine provinces. If so, it is now generally asked, can this be in consequence of the cession of the Floridas to England? Can we have bartered our honor, our national foresight, and integrity, together with our mercantile interests, for this bauble? Let us look for a moment on the real merits of this gift on the part of Spain and what will accrue to us, by being made lords over the Floridas.

We are not aware, that from time to time, long and elaborate memoirs have been presented to government, on the subject of the Floridas, since we held possession of that country, so there have also been respecting the cutting of the Isthmus of Panama, and in all probability they have been on a par. They have been represented as Dorados, or the Elysian fields, and commercial avidity has delineated a comparative desert into a magnificent vent for goods. Yet it is a fact, that the soil of West Florida is sandy, and that the climate is unhealthy, as our experience taught us from the year 1763, till we gave it up, which we even seem to have been glad to do. Neither East nor West Florida supply furs, for the game is extinct, nor are there Indians now to hunt or consume goods. West Florida has indeed some advantages of locality, from being the channel to the sea of a large and fertile tract of country extending from the 31 degree to the sources of the Pearl, Alabama, and Chattahooche rivers; but all this belongs to the United States, and hitherto these rivers have scarcely been used. East Florida possesses no harbors; and indeed the population of both is so extremely thin, that, as commercial and agricultural points, they cannot present an advantage worth the expense of keeping them. They have long been a burden to Spain, who had annually to draw from Mexico 151,000 dollars for their expense of administration. Spain, therefore rids herself of a load, for she is sensible that the inhabitants, who endure all the horrors of Spanish legislation, &c. without either protection or benefits, and behold the rise of Louisiana since its cession to the United States, will not be long before they wish to form part of the same confederation. Nay, this dread of progressive liberty has long given umbrage to the cabinet of Madrid; for this they owe an old grudge to the North Americans, as well as for aiding the revolutions of the Mexicans; but as Spain is too feeble to retaliate, she is now glad to get England to do it for her.

Spain, therefore, in making us masters of the Floridas, would give what to her is scarcely worth keeping, and indeed what she cannot keep long; and we seem to think, that what is worth giving, is worth having. But our possession of the above country seems to be founded on the advantages of a military position, and as a future bridge on the United States. On this score it deserves particular attention.

Beaujour, in his sketch of the United States, a work that certainly develops the views and situation of that country better than any other before published, says, "that the Floridas to the south appear sooner or later, destined to be united to the American republic, since they form part of the boundaries delineated by nature." The government as well as the people of the United States have the same idea; and if England takes possession of that country, they are persuaded it is solely for the purpose of being a thorn in their side, to annoy them in time of war, and counter-balance any attack they may wish to make to the north. Mr. Ellicott, who some years back measured the boundary line between Spain and the United States, observed, "that West Florida must be highly important in a commercial point of view, and, if connected with the country north of it, capable of prescribing maritime regulations to the Gulf of Mexico." That is giving to understand, that in the hands of the United States, and as an outlet to the sea for a great part of the Mississippi Territory and Upper Carolina, and connected with a fertile range of country, in a rapid state of progression, it might be made of great consequence; but these advantages could never be realized by Spain or England, as solitary possessions of a strip of sea coast, and shut out from the interior. Besides, it is only when these back countries are settled and cultivated, that these advantages are to be realized; and this is indeed the material reason why the United States are not possessed of them already. Yet their holding them certainly enters into the future views of the United States; and being so near, with the population in their favor, it is evident they can take them whenever they choose. It is, therefore, when we have laid out large sums in barracks, new cities, (for our garrisons can never be put into Pensacola and Mobile, once the tomb of our countrymen,) and in other necessary objects to make an establishment, that the United States' back-woods-men will sound their bugle, at the first symptoms of war, and all our trouble and expense will be lost.

Whatever then be the consideration we give for the Floridas, it can only be viewed in the light of a bad debt, for which we get what we can; but when we come to consider that this must be the cause of a new war with the United States, sooner or later, if we can get nothing better, would it not be more advisable to dash the sponge over our debt against Spain, than hereafter endanger the Canada? By the war out of which we have just emerged with the United States, we have given that country a tone of importance greater than it would have attained by thirty years' growth, and certainly its inhabitants will never henceforward endure what they have been in the habits of hitherto bearing. The possession of the Floridas can, consequently, bring upon us nothing but a war, and if obtained by the sacrifice of any principle dear to the feelings of Englishmen, and essential to but trifle, disgrace must be the issue. It is then necessary for us to look narrowly into this affair, before the meeting of Parliament, for in it many of the vital interests of this country are implicated. It indeed seems to be the lot of nations, to derive no instruction but from experience, nor, nowadays, do they avail themselves of the past folly of their neighbors. Absorbed as we are in modelling Europe to our wishes, North and South America seem to be entirely neglected, or, if thought of, merely to destroy the future prospects a combination of fortunate circumstances has presented. Sufficient gall has already been infused into the minds of the North American people; their manifesto respecting the late war, and particularly some of its detached features, have been rancorous enough; and if we purchase from Spain a country for the purpose of fomenting dissensions in the bordering States, and placing a barrier to the independence of South America, we create a sympathetic feeling throughout, of which our children may experience the fatal consequences.

Congress of the United States.

IN SENATE.

Monday, December 4.—This being the day appointed by the constitution for the commencement the first session of each congress—

At 12 o'clock, the president pro tempore took the chair; and, the roll being called over, it appeared that the following gentlemen were present, besides the president, (Mr. Gaillard.)

Messrs. Barbour,	Horsey,	Sanford,
Brown,	Howell,	Tait,
Campbell,	Hunter,	Tichenor,
Chace,	Lacock,	Varnum,
Daggett,	Roberts,	Williams,
Fromentin,	Ruggles,	Wilson.

A quorum being present, the senate proceeded to business.

Mr. Varnum and Mr. Hunter were appointed on the part of the senate, to wait on the president, and inform him that they were ready to receive any communication he might have to make.

A communication was received from the citizens who have voluntarily erected a building on the Capitol Hill, for the temporary accommodation of congress; and Messrs. Horsey, Lacock and Fromentin were appointed a committee on the part of this house, to examine and report on the state thereof.

The concurrence of the other house was requested in the two preceding votes.

Messrs. Lacock, Howell and Daggett were appointed the committee of accounts.

Mr. Roberts was appointed on the committee of enrolled bills.

Messrs. Fromentin, Sanford and Tichenor were appointed the committee on engrossed bills.

A resolution for appointing a joint committee on the library concerns, was read three times, passed, and sent to the other house for concurrence.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Monday, December 4.—At 12 o'clock, the clerk took the chair; and, calling over the roll of members by states, it appeared that the following members were present, viz.

From New-Hampshire.—Messrs. Atherton, Cilley, Vose, Wilcox.
Massachusetts.—Messrs. Baylies, Bradbury, Brigham, Brown, Cומר, Hulbert, King, Nelson, Parris, Pickering, Reed, Rice, Ruggles, Strong.
Rhode-Island.—Mr. Boss.
Connecticut.—Messrs. Champion, Davenport, Law, Mosely, Sturges.
Vermont.—Messrs. Chipman, Jewett, Langdon, Noyes, Lyon, Marsh.
New-York.—Messrs. Betts, Bissell, Brooks, Comstock, Crocheron, Gold, Hammond, Lovett, Moffit, Savage, Schenck, Taylor, Throop, Townsend, Ward, Wilkins.
New-Jersey.—Messrs. Baker, Bateman, Southard.
Pennsylvania.—Messrs. Crawford, Darlington, Hahn, Heister, Hopkinson, Ingham, Lyle, Maclay, Milnor, Piper, Smith, Wallace, Whitesides, T. Wilson, W. Wilson.

Delaware.—Mr. Cooper.

Maryland.—Messrs. Herbert, Stuart, Wright.

Virginia.—Messrs. Barbour, Breckenridge, Burwell, Gholson, Goodwyn, Hawes, Hungerford, Lewis, McCoy, Nelson, Newton, Pleasant, Roane, Smith, Tate, Tucker.

North-Carolina.—Messrs. Bryan, Clarke, Culpepper, Macon, Murfree, Stanford, Williams, Yancey.

South-Carolina.—Messrs. Culhoun, Chappell, Lowndes, Mayratt, Middleton, Moore, Taylor, Woodward.

Georgia.—Messrs. Forsythe, Hall, Lumpkin, Wilds.

Kentucky.—Messrs. Clarke, Clay, Desha, Johnson, McLean, Ormsby, Sharp, Taul.

Tennessee.—Messrs. Cannon, Henderson, Powell, Reynolds, Thomas.

Ohio.—Messrs. Alexander, Caldwell, Clendenin, Creighton, McCleave.

Louisiana.—Mr. Robertson.

A quorum being present—

The house proceeded to ballot for a speaker; and the tellers having examined the ballots, reported, that the whole number of votes given was 122; that there were

For Henry Clay	-	-	-	87
Hugh Nelson	-	-	-	13
T. Pitkin	-	-	-	9
N. Macon	-	-	-	7
Joseph Lewis	-	-	-	2
T. Pickering	-	-	-	1
Blanks	-	-	-	3

HENRY CLAY was therefore duly elected, and conducted to the chair; from which he addressed the house as distinctly as the effects of a late serious indisposition would permit; returning his acknowledgments for the honor conferred on him, paying a high tribute to the merits of his predecessor in the chair; pledging the exercise of his best abilities in discharging the duties imposed on him, and throwing himself on the indulgence of the house for occasional errors of judgment, &c. particularly in his present ill health.

The oath to support the constitution having been administered by Mr. Wright to the speaker, the speaker in turn qualified all the members present.

The delegates from the territories, Mr. Lattimore, Mr. Jennings, and Mr. Stephenson, were then also qualified.

The house proceeded to elect a clerk: when it appeared that of 122 votes, Thomas Dougherty, esq. had 114, and was therefor duly elected.

The speaker laid before the house a letter from Joseph Wheaton, offering himself as a candidate for sergeant at arms.

On motion of Mr. Wright, after some little discussion—it was Resolved, that Thomas Dunn be appointed sergeant at arms; Thomas Claxton, door-keeper; Benjamin Burch, assis and door-keeper to this house, &c.

The several resolutions passed by the senate were received, read and concurred in.

Mr. Wright and Mr. Hopkinson were appointed the committee on the part of this house to wait on the president of the United States.

Mr. Lowndes, Mr. Forsythe, and Mr. Champion were appointed to enquire into the state of the new building prepared by the citizens for congress.

The usual orders as to rules, &c. were adopted.

Washington City Dec. 6.—In the senate, Mr. Bibb, of Georgia attended yesterday in addition to those already announced.

In the house of representatives, the following gentlemen attended, in addition: from Pennsylvania, Mr. Irwin; from Maryland, Mr. Baer; from Virginia, Messrs. Sheffy, Johnson, Kerr; from North Carolina, Messrs. Gaston and Forney.

No other business was done yesterday, than reading the president's message; of which five thousand copies were ordered to be printed for the use of the house, and one thousand for the use of the senate.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Yesterday, at 12 o'clock, the president of the United States transmitted to both houses of congress, the following message, by Mr. Todd, his secretary: Fellow citizens of the senate and of the house of representatives:

I have the satisfaction, on our present meeting of being able to communicate to you the successful termination of the war which had been commenced against the United States by the regency of Algiers. The squadron in advance, on that service under commodore Decatur, lost not a moment after its arrival in the Mediterranean, in seeking the naval force of the enemy, then cruising in that sea, and succeeded in capturing two of his ships, one of them the principal ship commanded by the Algerine admiral. The high character of the American commander was brilliantly sustained on the occasion, which brought his own ship into close action with that of his adversary, as was the accustomed gallantry of all the officers and men actually engaged. Having prepared the way by this demonstration of American skill and prowess, he hastened to the port of Algiers, where peace was promptly yielded to his victorious force. In the terms stipulated, the rights and honor of the United States were particularly consulted, by a perpetual relinquishment, on the part of the Dey, of all pretensions to tribute from them. The impressions which have thus been made, strengthened as they will have been by subsequent transactions with the regency of Tunis and Tripoli, by the appearance of the larger force which followed under commodore Bainbridge, the chief in command of the expedition, and by the judicious precautionary arrangements left by him in that quarter, affords reasonable prospect of future security for the valuable portion of our commerce which passes within reach of the Barbary cruisers.

It is another source of satisfaction, that the treaty of peace with Great Britain has been succeeded by a convention on the subject of commerce, concluded by the plenipotentiaries of the two countries. In this result a disposition is manifested on the part of that nation, corresponding with the disposition of the United States, which it may be hoped, will be improved into liberal arrangements on other subjects on which the parties have mutual interests, or which might endanger their future harmony. Congress will decide on the expediency of promoting such a sequel, by giving effect to the measure of confining the American navigation to American seamen; a measure which, at the same time that it might have that conciliatory tendency, would have the further advantage of increasing the independence of our navigation, and the resources for our maritime defence.

In conformity with the articles of the treaty of Ghent, relating to the Indians, as well as with a view to the tranquility of our western and north-western frontiers, measures were taken to establish an immediate peace with the several tribes who had been engaged in hostilities against the United States. Such of them as were invited to Detroit acceded readily to a renewal of the former treaties of friendship. Of the other tribes who were invited to a station on the Mississippi, the greater number have also accepted the peace offered to them. The residue, consisting of the more distant tribes or parts of tribes, remain to be brought over by further explanations, or by such other means as may be adapted to the disposition they may finally disclose,

The Indian tribes within, and bordering on our southern frontier, whom a cruel war on their part had compelled us to chastise into peace, have latterly shewn a restlessness, which has called for preparatory measures for repressing it, and for protecting the commissioners engaged in carrying the terms of the peace into execution.

The execution of the act for fixing the military peace establishment, has been attended with difficulties which even now can only be overcome by legislative aid. The selection of officers; the payment and discharge of the troops enlisted for the war; the payment of the retained troops; and their re-union from detached and distant stations; the collection and security of the public property, in the quarter-master, commissary, and ordnance departments; and the constant medical assistance required in hospitals and garrisons, rendered a complete execution of the act impracticable on the first of May, the period more immediately contemplated. As soon, however, as circumstances would permit, and as far as it has been practicable, consistently with the public interests, the reduction of the army has been accomplished; but the appropriations for its pay, and for other branches of the military service, having proved inadequate, the earliest attention to that subject will be necessary; and the expediency of continuing upon the peace establishment, the staff officers who have hitherto been provisionally retained, is also recommended to the consideration of congress.

In the performance of the executive duty upon this occasion, there has not been wanting a just sensibility to the merits of the American army, during the late war: but the obvious policy and design in fixing an efficient military peace establishment, did not afford an opportunity to distinguish the aged and infirm, on account of their past services; nor the wounded and disabled, on account of their present sufferings. The extent of the reduction indeed unavoidably involved the exclusion of many meritorious officers of every rank, from the service of their country; and so equal, as well as so numerous, were the claims to attention, that a decision by the standard of comparative merit, could seldom be attained. Judged, however, in candor, by a general standard of positive merit, the army register will it is believed, do honor to the establishment; while the case of those officers, whose names are not included in it, devolves, with the strongest interest, upon the legislative authority, for such provision as shall be deemed the best calculated to give support and solace to the veteran and invalid to display the beneficence, as well as the justice of the government; and to inspire a martial zeal for the public service upon every future emergency.

Although the embarrassments arising from the want of a uniform national currency have not been diminished, since the adjournment of congress, great satisfaction has been derived, in contemplating the revival of the public credit, and the efficiency of the public resources. The receipts into the treasury, from the various branches of revenue, during the nine months ending on the 30th of September last, have been estimated at twelve millions and a half of dollars; the issues of treasury notes of every denomination, during the same period, amount to the sum of fourteen millions of dollars; and there was also obtained upon loan, during the same period, a sum of nine millions of dollars; of which the sum of six millions of dollars was subscribed in cash, and the sum of three millions of dollars in treasury notes. With these means, added to the sum of one million and a half of dollars, being the balance of money in the treasury on the 1st of January, there has been paid, between the 1st of January and the 1st of October, on account of the appropriations of the preceding and of the present year, (exclusively of the amount of the treasury notes subscribed to the loan, and the amount redeemed in the payment of duties and taxes) the aggregate sum of thirty-three millions and a half of dollars, leaving a balance then in the treasury estimated at the sum of three millions of dollars. Independent, however, of the arrearages due for military services and supplies, it is presumed, that a further sum of five millions of dollars, including the interest on the public debt payable on the 1st of January next, will be demanded at the treasury to complete the expenditures of the present year, and for which the existing ways and means will sufficiently provide.

The national debt, as it was ascertained on the 1st of October last, amounted in the whole to the sum of one hundred and twenty millions of dollars, consisting of the unredeemed balance of the debt contracted before the late war, (thirty-nine millions of dollars) the amount of the funded debt contracted in consequence of the war, (sixty-four millions of dollars) and the amount of the unfunded and floating debt (including the various issues of treasury notes) seventeen millions of dollars, which is in a gradual course of payment. There will, probably, be some addition to the public debt, upon the liquidation of various claims, which are depending; and a conciliatory disposition on the part of congress may lead honorably and advantageously to an equitable arrangement of the militia expenses, incurred by the several states, without the previous sanction or authority of the government of the United States: But, when it is considered that the new, as well as the old, portion of the debt has been contracted in the assertion of the national rights and independence; and when it is recollected, that the public expenditures, not being exclusively bestowed upon subjects of a transient nature, will long be visible in the number and equipments of the American navy, in the military works for the defence of our harbors and our frontiers, and in the supplies of our arsenals and magazines; the amount will bear a gratifying comparison with the objects which have been attained, as well as with the resources of the country.

The arrangement of the finances, with a view to the receipts and expenditures of a permanent peace establishment, will necessarily enter into the deliberations of congress during the present session.—It is true that the improved condition of the public revenue will not only afford the means of maintaining the faith of the government with its creditors inviolate, and of prosecuting, successfully, the measures of the most liberal policy; but will, also, justify an immediate alleviation of the burthens imposed by the necessities of the war. It is, however, essential to every modification of the finances, that the benefits of an uniform national currency should be restored to the community. The absence of the precious metals will, it is believed, be a temporary evil; but, until they can be again rendered the general medium of exchange, it devolves on the wisdom of congress, to provide a substitute, which shall equally engage the confidence, and accommodate the wants, of the citizens throughout the union. If the operation of the state banks cannot produce this result, the probable operation of a national bank will merit consideration; and, if neither of these expedients be deemed effectual, it may become necessary to ascertain the terms upon which the notes of the government, (no longer required as an instrument of credit) shall be issued, upon motives of general policy, as a common medium of circulation.

Notwithstanding the security for future repose, which the United States ought to find in their love of peace, and their constant respect for the rights of other nations, the character of the times particularly inculcates the lesson, that, whether to prevent or repel danger, we ought not to be unprepared for it. This consideration will sufficiently recommend to congress a liberal provision for the immediate extension, and gradual completion, of the works of defence, both fixed and floating, on our maritime frontier; and an adequate provision for guarding our inland frontier, against dangers to which certain portions of it may continue to be exposed.

As an improvement on our military establishment, it will deserve the consideration of congress, whether a corps of invalids might not be so organized and employed, as at once to aid in the support of meritorious individuals, excluded by age or infirmities, from the existing establishment, and to preserve to the public, the benefit of their stationary services, and of their exemplary discipline. I recommend, also, an enlargement of the military academy, already established, and the establishment of others in other sections of the union. And I cannot press too much on the attention of congress, such a classification and organization of the militia, as will most effectually render it the safeguard of a free state. If experience has shewn in the late splendid achievements of militia, the value of this resource for the public defence, it has shewn, also, the importance of that skill in the use of arms, and that familiarity with the essential rules of discipline, which cannot be expected from the regulations now in force. With this subject is intimately connected the necessity of accommodating the laws, in every respect, to the great object of enabling the political authority of the union, to employ, promptly and effectually, the physical power of the union, in the cases designated by the constitution.

The signal services which have been rendered by our navy, and the capacities it has developed for successful co-operation in the national defence, will give to that portion of the public force its full value in the eyes of congress, at an epoch which calls for the constant vigilance of all governments. To preserve the ships now in a sound state; to complete those already contemplated; to provide amply the imperishable materials for prompt augmentations, and to improve the existing arrangements into more advantageous establishments, for the construction, the repairs, and the security of vessels of war, is dictated by the soundest policy.

In adjusting the duties on imports, to the object of revenue, the influence of the tariff on manufactures, will necessarily present itself for consideration. However wise the theory may be, which owes to the sagacity and interest of individuals the application of their industry and resources, there are in this, as in other cases, exceptions to the general rule. Besides the condition which the theory itself implies, of a reciprocal adoption by other nations, experience teaches that so many circumstances must occur in introducing and maturing manufacturing establishments, especially of the more complicated kinds, that a country may remain, even without them, although sufficiently advanced and in some respects even peculiarly fitted for carrying them on with success. Under circumstances giving a powerful impulse to manufacturing industry, it has made among us a progress, and exhibited an efficiency, which justify the belief, that with a protection not more than is due to the enterprising citizens whose interests are now at stake, it will become, at an early day, not only safe against occasional competitions from abroad, but a source of domestic wealth, and even of external commerce. In selecting the branches more especially entitled to the public patronage, a preference is obviously claimed by such as will relieve the United States from a dependence on foreign supplies, ever subject to casual failures, for articles necessary for the public defence, or connected with the primary wants of individuals. It will be an additional recommendation of particular manufactures, where the materials for them are extensively drawn from our agriculture, and consequently impart and ensure to that great fund of national prosperity and independence, an encouragement which cannot fail to be rewarded.

Among the means of advancing the public interest, the occasion is a proper one for recalling the attention of congress to the great importance of establishing throughout our country, the roads and canals which can best be executed, under the national authority. No objects within the circle of political economy so richly repay the expence bestowed on them; there are none, the utility of which is more universally ascertained and acknowledged; none that do more honor to the government, whose wise and enlarged patriotism duly appreciates them. Nor is there any country which presents a field, where nature invites more the art of man, to complete her own work for his accommodation and benefit. These considerations are strengthened, moreover, by the political effect of these facilities for intercommunication, in bringing and binding more closely together the various parts of our extended confederacy. Whilst the states, individually, with a laudable enterprize and emulation, avail themselves of their local advantages, by new roads, by navigable canals, and by improving the streams susceptible of navigation, the general government is the more urged to similar undertakings, requiring a national jurisdiction, and national means, by the prospect of thus systematically completing so inestimable a work. And it is a happy reflection, that any defect of constitutional authority which may be encountered, can be supplied in a mode which the constitution itself has providently pointed out.

The present is a favorable season also for bringing again into view the establishment of a national seminary of learning within the district of Columbia, and with means drawn from the property therein, subject to the authority of the general government. Such an institution claims the patronage of congress, as a monument of their solicitude for the advancement of knowledge, without which the blessings of liberty cannot be fully enjoyed, or long preserved; as a model instructive in the formation of other seminaries; as a nursery of enlightened preceptors; as a central resort of youth and genius from every part of their country, diffusing on their return, examples of those national feelings, those liberal sentiments, and those congenial manners, which contribute cement to our union and strength to the political fabric, of which that is the foundation.

In closing this communication, I ought not to repress a sensibility, in which you will unite, to the happy lot of our country, and to the goodness of a superintending Providence to which we are indebted for it. Whilst other portions of mankind are laboring under the distresses of war, or struggling

With adversity in other forms, the United States are in the tranquil enjoyment of prosperous and honorable peace. In reviewing the scenes through which it has been attained, we can rejoice in the proofs given, that our political institutions, founded in human rights, and framed for their preservation, are equal to the severest trials of war, as well as adapted to the ordinary periods of repose. As fruits of this experience, and of the reputation acquired by the American arms, on the land and on the water, the nation finds itself possessed of a growing respect abroad, and of a just confidence in itself, which are among the best pledges for its peaceful career. Under other aspects of our country, the strongest features of its flourishing condition are seen, in a population rapidly increasing, on a territory as productive as it is extensive; in a general industry, and fertile ingenuity, which find their ample rewards; and in an affluent revenue, which admits a reduction of the public burthens, without withdrawing the means of sustaining the public credit; of gradually discharging the public debt, of providing for the necessary defensive and precautionary establishments, and of patronizing in every authorized mode, undertakings conducive to the aggregate wealth and individual comfort of our citizens.

It remains for the guardians of the public welfare, to persevere in that justice and good will towards other nations, which invite a return of these sentiments towards the United States; to cherish institutions which guarantee their safety and their liberties, civil and religious; and to combine with a liberal system of foreign commerce, an improvement of the natural advantages, and a protection and extension of the independent resources of our highly favored and happy country.

In all measures having such objects, my faithful co-operation will be afforded.

JAMES MADISON.

Washington, Dec. 5, 1815.

Wednesday Dec. 6.—A petition from Boston, praying a repeal of the duty on hats—and a memorial from the inhabitants of the Mississippi territory, praying admission into the union, were presented, and referred.

On motion of Mr. Taylor of New York, the house proceeded to the appointment of the standing committees.

The house being resolved into a committee of the whole on the state of the union—Mr. Condit in the chair,

Mr. Taylor moved a reference of the several parts of the presidents message to committees as follows:—

That part which relates to foreign affairs; that which relates to the military peace establishment; that which relates to naval affairs, to the establishment of an uniform national currency, to the making of roads and canals, to the establishment of a national seminary in the District of Columbia, and to the classification and organization of the military—all severally referred to select committees. That part which relates to an alleviation of the burdens imposed under the necessities created by the war and to the revenue, to the committee of ways and means; and that which relates to manufactures, to the committee of commerce and manufactures.

Mr. Taylor then moved that the several committees so appointed, should have leave to report by bill or otherwise; which was granted.

The proceedings in committee were agreed to by the house.

Thursday, Dec. 8. The standing committees were appointed as usual—a list of them shall be inserted in our next.

Mr. Lowndes made a favorable report for accepting the house prepared by the citizens for the accommodation of congress; the house agreed thereto and passed a bill accordingly.

The Rev. Spencer Cane was appointed chaplain. The annual report of the secretary of the treasury was received and ordered to be printed.

IN SENATE.

Thursday Dec. 7.—The bill from the house authorising the president to lease the new building on Capitol hill for the accommodation of congress, was read three times and passed.

Two other members appeared, viz from Ohio, Mr. Morrow; from Connecticut, Mr. Dana.

Foreign Articles.

Marshal Oudinot has been appointed commander in chief of the national guard of Paris.

It has been agreed that Lucien and Louis Bonaparte may reside at Rome—Joseph in Russia.

The Parisian punsters call Blucher, their friend Pluscher, (the most dear, or one that cost them most.) Blucher in a letter to his sovereign, speaking of France, says, "this detested nation."

Several frames of houses have been shipped from England for St. Helena.

It is said the allies contemplate the restoration of Gustavus to the throne of Sweden.

A new nation is talked of, to be formed from some of the French and German territories; to be called the kingdom of the Rhine—the archduke Charles to be the sovereign.

Personal attachment. The Polish colonel Pistowski, (says a London paper, of Oct. 7th) who had solicited and obtained permission to join Bonaparte at the island of St. Helena, set out in the brig of war Cormorant, which has sailed for the island.

The families of the late marshal Brune and gen. Labedoyere, were about emigrating to the United States; and marshal Ney, it is said, would follow with his household, on his expected acquittal.

A pamphlet has just been published, by Debuscher, at Ghent, entitled "Doubts to be cleared up respecting the birth of the son of Napoleon."

A letter from the ex-ministers to Louis XVIII. on their resignation, had been transmitted to England for publication, as it could not be inserted in any of the enslaved gazettes of France.

Sir George Prevost was to be tried by a court martial. The charges preferred against him are said to be, for advising capt. Downie to attack the American squadron on lake Champlain, when it was imprudent so to do without the co-operation of the land forces, and for not having afforded that co-operation—for not storming the American works on shore, at the commencement of the action—for having disregarded the signal for co-operation which had been previously agreed on; and for not having attacked the enemy on shore, either during the said naval action or after it was ended, whereby the squadron might have been saved.

Devastation of Alsace. The emperor of Russia has ordered lists to be made out of the widows and orphans and of the peasants in Alsace, whose villages have been destroyed by the events of the war. Routes are delivered to those who choose to repair to Russia. The greater part proceed to the Taurida. [The people of Alsace are chiefly protestants, and they have suffered excessively. There are many things to be approved of in Alexander.]

Extract of a letter from Bordeaux, dated September 30, 1815.—"The allies are beginning to strip the Louvre of all its proudest ornaments, and I much fear, that soon but little will remain of that once immense display of imperial magnificence and taste, but the bare walls. I look upon this dismemberment of the arts, as one of the greatest calamities attending the overthrow of Napoleon. The dispersion of these great monuments of art over all the countries of Europe, will render difficult to all, and impracticable to most travellers, the gratification of a liberal curiosity, which before might have been indulged within the precincts of a city. A military execution took place here on the 27th inst. under circumstances peculiarly interesting:—Two generals of Bonaparte's old army—twin brothers—men who had never been separated from the moment of their birth,—the resemblance so strong between them that they could scarcely be distinguished from each other—their attachment so extraordinary, and so complete a coincidence of opinion, even on the most trifling subjects, that they were scarcely ever known to act separately or dress differently."

"They were condemned to death for adherence to Bonaparte after the return of the king—a crime which hundreds of thousands have been guilty of—but being men of talents, fortune and influence, they were peculiarly obnoxious to the Bordelais. They died as brave men only can. They marched with a firm step to the place of execution—would allow no bandage over their eyes—carried the troops through their exercise—gave the fatal word, and both fell at the same moment. They entered the world together, were never separated through life, and quitted it at the same moment."—N. Y. Eve. Post

Labeledoyere. A letter from Paris says, "A French colonel of infantry was ordered to command the detachment which was to execute the sentence of Labeledoyere. He refused, and said he would sooner be shot himself. For this act of disobedience, he was immediately dismissed the service, and a non-commissioned officer commanded the party which shot the delinquent. Several persons in plain clothes, when Labeledoyere had expired, rushed into the circle, and dipped their handkerchiefs into the blood."

General Porlier. The fate of this interesting man, who made the late attempt in Spain to rid his country of the fools and villains who govern, is certainly sealed. He was put to death, after several days' exposure to the peltings of a bigotted mob, instigated by "holy fathers" in the church, monks and friars. It is truly laughable to see to what the stupid (or blasphemous) Spanish authorities attribute the want of success of Porlier—they attribute it to the "most holy virgin of the Rosary." As curiosities, as well as for record, some of their proclamations on quelling the insurrection, as well as those of Porlier, &c. to excite it, shall be inserted. The general was abandoned by some of the troops that had just joined him; trembling, perhaps, at fear of vengeance from "St. Pocomi's breeches," and given up to the priest party. His second in command has escaped to England, and several of his followers and inferior officers have been executed.

The French fortresses understood to be ceded to the allies by the late treaty, are Landau, Sarrelouis, Philippeville, Marienburg, Versoix, Valenciennes, Conde, Mauberge, Landrecy, Le Quesnoy, Cambrai, Givet, Charlemont, Mezieres, Sedan, Roeroy, Monmedi, Avesnes, Thoinville, Longwy, Bieche and Fort Louis, and perhaps others. Most of these are very strong places, and completely hedge in France, to secure her—independence,—

Some of these appear perpetually ceded—others are to be garrisoned for five years.

The British soldiers at Dieppe have been attacked by the French "patriots" (as they would have been esteemed if the thing had happened in Spain) with knives or any other weapon they could lay hold of. But tranquility, by the aid of the military, had been restored.

Specie. The price of specie has rapidly fallen in England. Dollars, at Liverpool, Oct. 19, 5s. 3d. per ounce—which is about par.

Murat. We have now a report that Murat is organizing an insurrection in Corsica.

The count Lobau (gen. Monthon) has been sent from England to Ostend, to be delivered to the Prussians, who demand him as a prisoner. Prussia, then, is still at war with France!

The Ionian isles are to form a republic under the protection of Great Britain.

The emperor of Russia, it seems fairly to be understood, was the barrier to the annihilation, as it were, of the French nation, by the rapacious Prussians and British. The latter would have every thing, possible, belonging to commerce and manufactures; the other would have every thing.

The late grand review of his troops, was considered in France as a political manœuvre, to give weight to his verbal communications on the subject of the treaty imposed; which is severe enough, but, we believe, would have been much more so, if he has not interfered in a manner that commanded attention.

An Algerine force lately landed between Rome and Naples, and took much property and many prisoners.

Spain still refuses to ratify the act of the congress of Vienna; and Portugal has not decided.

A revolution has taken place in Smyrna; the Dey deposed, and a regency appointed.

The accounts of the duke of Wellington having been lately hooted out of the king of France's box at the Italian theatre, in Paris, is perfectly correct. This box is exclusively reserved for the royal family; and it seems that the duke having gone to the theatre in compliment to Catalina, her husband showed him into it, he not knowing whose it was.

Many of the adherents of Bonaparte, among whom are several silk manufacturers, were preparing to emigrate to the United States.

The French have nicknamed Louis XVIII. L'Inevitable—the Unavoidable.

The London papers mention, that letters from the French ports state, that the emigration is greater from France than ever was known. Every vessel that quits a French port direct for America, is loaded with artisans, manufacturers, and people of property. The silk weavers, quitting their native country, are more numerous than any other description of people.

Military tribunal. The duke of Belluna (Victor) and generals Lauriston, Borde, Soult, and gen. the prince of Broglie, &c. have been appointed for the trial of all military offences committed in France during the late "usurpation."

Taxation. By a letter from Bordeaux it appears that the Americans who happened to be there, were most heavily taxed towards paying the contributions levied by the allies for "delivering" France!—Some of them have paid from 8 to 12,000 francs! This is a sort of robbery that if it had been done by Napoleon Bonaparte, would have been trumpeted to all the world—as it is, it is well enough, for it is "legitimate."

Carnot. In all the changes of France this man has commanded respect and attention. It is stated that the emperor of Russia, of his own accord, offered him an asylum in his states, which he declined. He is also said to have sent him a safeguard in which he guarantees his security!

Extracts from the answer of the peers and deputies to the French king's speech:

By the peers.—"All the peers, sire, feel the duties which the sacredness of the functions, joined to the honor of your choice, imposes upon them. Hereditary counsellors of the crown, born defenders of the rights and liberties of the people, supreme judges of attempts which menace the security of the throne and the state, we will, sire, always be ready as subjects to obey you, as citizens to devote ourselves to the safety of the country, as peers of France to strengthen the royal prerogative, with all the powers which the two chambers may judge necessary for dissipating factions and causing the laws to triumph."

By the Deputies.—"The ills of the country are great—they are not irreparable.

"The first consolation is in the return of the legitimate king. What guarantee in fact exists in this dogma of legitimacy, created much more in the interest of people than in that of kings! This tutelary principle has watched for us—it maintained the succession of our kings and prepared for us, after so many storms, an asylum in the shade of the throne. Violence usurped authority, but imperishable right survived violence.

"Legitimate kings alone know how to devote themselves for their people. Your majesty has proved it more than once."

French contributions. Of the 700 millions of contributions, says the Morning Chronicle, of the 16th October, there are to be given to the Netherlands	60 millions

Lower Rhine	20
Upper Rhine	40
Piedmont	10
Spanish frontier	7½

137½—about £5,700,000 sterling.

About 175 millions of francs, 7 millions sterling, are to be employed in repairing or erecting fortresses on the north and north-eastern frontiers of France. The remaining 388 millions, about 16 millions sterling, are, it is understood, to be divided amongst the four great powers.

Ireland. The state of this country becomes more and more deplorable. The papers are filled with narrations of acts of violence—such as assassinations, conflagrations, &c. The rebels are in great force.

French funds—6 per cents, 57.

Maria Louisa. A Vienna paper, noticing the account of the renunciation of the throne of France by Maria Louisa for herself and her son, says—"at Vienna we have not the least knowledge of these transactions." The whole affair is, therefore, probably, an imposition to subserve political purposes in France.

France, appears full of storms and tempests, yet restrained by the presence of the foreigners. A "seditious spirit," as it is called, is manifested every where; and "suspected persons" are said to abound in all parts. Strange policies (by way of wagers) are opened as to France, in England, but the London editors have declined to give the particulars.

The Prince Regent has issued a proclamation against the refractory seamen at Newcastle, &c. He offers a pardon to those who are concerned who will inform against a principal; and a reward of 100 guineas to any one not concerned who will apprehend any one that is. A formidable naval and military force has been sent to assist the civil authority in subduing the seamen.

Troops were marching to the north of England to "deliver" the seamen of their disaffection.—Coals had risen 20 per cent at London in consequence of the embargoes the sailors had laid at Shields, &c. Many of these poor fellows turned adrift, worn out and exhausted in the service of the king, are in a wretched condition, indeed. In some neighborhoods the people are compelled to protect their potatoe fields with fire arms against the wants of the famishing seamen! Many midshipmen and other petty officers, it also appears, have resorted to robbery for a living. Those who were on our coast are adepts in this line of business.

Louis XVIII. has established a privy council—to discuss only what is specially submitted to them.

Troops are proceeding from England to Ireland. The Austrian archdukes John and Louis are on a visit to England.

On the 27th of September an Algerine squadron made two attempts to land men on the island of Eiba; but were beat back. A Tunisian galliot has been taken.

Stocks, London, Oct. 21.—3 per cent. Consols, 61 1-4; Omnium, 15 3-4.

Rack-rents.—As an instance of the depression of lands in Ireland, The Drogheda Journal contains advertisements of upwards of 1700 acres of different farms to be let, mostly in the neighbourhood of that town, the greater part of which were thrown up by farmers unable to hold them longer.

The governor of Rome has taken severe measures to prevent the introduction of new papers and other political works in the papal citrory.

The ambassadors of foreign powers who are to reside at Paris, are—baron Vincent, for Austria; Pozzo di Bargo, for Russia; sir Charles Stuart, for England; baron Humboldt, for Prussia.

Spain. There has been a sudden revolution in the Spanish court. On the 7th October last about 30 persons, who had been about the king or in his confidence, were banished from Madrid, and there is some talk that the patriots lately immured will be restored to liberty. But we hope no permanent good while fool Ferdinand remains on the throne, and the priests rule. The cause of these changes is unknown.

Emigration. The vessels recently from Europe, brought out many passengers.

The authority at Limerick, (Ireland) have issued a proclamation, giving 48 hours notice to the misguided inhabitants of that city, to save themselves from the Insurrection Act, by delivering up all arms, ammunition, or offensive weapons they may have in their possession.

The Cork Chronicle says, that there are to be 10,000 troops quartered in the county of Tipperary during the ensuing year. There are 32 counties in Ireland.

Toleration! Two of the new peers of France, refusing to take the oath prescribed without a reservation on the subject of religion, (being Protestants) have been excluded from their seats. This must be joyful news to the protestant world!

Two persons have been condemned to several months hard labor for wearing the tri-colored cockade. One of these had it covered with white stuff, but sufficiently transparent to shew the true colors. Another person has been imprisoned for singing the Marseilles hymn in his own house. Truly the French are "delivered" of every thing but the privilege of being slaves.

The kingdom of Poland, it appears, is to have no diplomatic corps, nor ministers of foreign relations, and will have no ministry near the courts of foreign powers. [This is the boasted independence which the magnanimous Alexander has been promising that unfortunate country. It is now worth more than a province of Russia.]

A late Paris paper says—We understand there is a design among those characters who have made their revolutionary principles so conspicuous for the last 25 years, to establish a colony in the island of Madagascar.

Charles Bell, esq. pin and needle maker, and John Sharp, esq. linen draper, have been sworn in as sheriffs of London and Middlesex. Mathew Wood, esq. needle maker is lord mayor of London. In returning thanks for the honor, he said he would maintain as far as lay in his power, not only the rights and privileges of the citizens of London, but of all the world—and while he enjoyed the office of Mayor it should not be disgraced by the want of either hospitality or dignity.

Ney. There is a report that Ney will escape without a trial.

The Swiss have resolved that no Frenchmen shall reside in their territories who are not true Bourbonites!

Of all the sovereigns of Germany, the king of Wurtemberg is the only one who yet refuses his assent to the act of the confederation of Germany.

CHRONICLE.

Several small vessels have been wrecked by late storms on lake Erie. The policy of building large vessels for the commerce of the lakes, is recommended.

The Niagara Journal informs us, that lieutenant Drury, who committed the outrage on the American schr. Mink, on lake Erie, (see page 152,) has gone to Kingston, "under pretence of submitting himself to a court-martial."

At a late entertainment given to general Jackson, by the people of Georgetown, Col. the secretary of the treasury gave the following toast—"speed to the plough, and prosperity to the loom." We hope this may be considered indicative of the spirit of the government.

North Carolina. The popular branch of the legislature of this state, is said to consist of 62 republicans and 55 federalists. All the branches of the government are, as usual, republican.

A dreadful gale has been felt at Jamaica—and the damage sustained was very extensive.

Buenos Ayres. Our accounts from Buenos Ayres are highly satisfactory. Royalty and toryism seem quite under foot—let them remain there! The republicans have established a mint at Potosi, and the coinage of the present year is expected to be considerable. The royalists from Lima, under Don Juan Ramirez, have been completely defeated—Ramirez, with several others high in command, being killed—the loss is said to be irreparable to the Spaniards. They were about sending assistance to the republicans of Chili. Their admiral, Brown, has a fleet of 23 vessels—his flag ship carries 42 guns. Buenos Ayres is defended by 200 pieces of cannon, in three lines, well manned. At a review on the 15th of June, 13,000 men were under arms. The commanders of 45 neighboring districts report 137,000 men ready for service, at the first moment—they are chiefly provided with horses to move with the greater facility. Waggon's are collected and 2,200 oxen in readiness to draw them, besides 1900 horses. These things were provided for the expedition from Spain, which has, however, enough to do at Carthage. There is, also, a good hope that Peru will entirely shake off her dependence on Spain.

Carthage. The royal force in the neighborhood of this important place, appears to have frittered almost to nothing, by battle and disease.

Died, on Sunday last, Dr. JOHN CARROLL, archbishop of Baltimore, in the 80th year of his age. He was interred with much form and solemnity, on Tuesday last. The whole city and neighborhood mourns the decease of this venerable prelate, kind neighbor and excellent man. The liberality of his sentiments and his innocent life, wrested from all who knew him the homage of respect and attention; and to his personal exertions, more than to any other, we owe the happy toleration in opinion, as well as in fact, that so eminently prevails between the protestants and catholics of this city; and we fear his loss, in this respect, will long be deplored by the good of every persuasion. He died full of years and full of honors. May his spirit of charity descend on his successor, the head of the catholic church in the United States—and upon all high in authority over the different sects—that true piety may be promoted, while brotherly love prevails!

An unknown lady has made, through a reverend gentleman, a donation of three thousand dollars to the "Bishop's Fund." This fund, already respectable receives continual additions. [Boston paper.]

The legislature of Tennessee have resolved to move the seat of government from Nashville after the 1st day of March—the choice vibrates between Murfreesborough and Knoxville. They have determined to thank gen. Jackson in the most formal manner for his services—to present him with a gold medal—and generals Carroll and Coffee with swords.

Steam power.—From a late London paper. An important improvement has recently been made in the construction of steam engines, by which no more than one-twentieth part of the coal consumed in an engine of 20 horse, or any other required power, becomes necessary. The construction is as follows:—A furnace, holding about a peck of coals, is made movable into a large iron vessel and has a flaug, which when introduced into the vessel, closes the opening in that part; in an instant the air is rarified; the expanded air passes through a tube, presses upon the piston of a pump, and produces in this a motion of about four feet; the rod of the piston then becomes the moving power of the furnace backwards and forwards; and this is effected about 60 times in a minute. Suppose the air to be rarified about three times, there will then be an excess of two atmospheres, equal to the pressure of 30 pounds on every square inch. The expansion being uniform, there is no danger from explosion; the construction being simple, the expence is comparatively small.

The largest ships of war now in the world, (says the Boston Yankee) are owned by the United States. The New Orleans and the Chippewa, now in lake Ontario, are 16 feet longer than the British ship Lord Nelson. They are proportionably wide, but not so deep as the largest ships in the English navy. Our 74's would appear like frigates along side of these huge ships, which have been named in honor of two of the greatest victories yet achieved by the American land forces.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

NO. 15 OF VOL. IX.]

BALTIMORE, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 16, 1815.

[WHOLE NO. 224.]

Hæc olim meminisse juvabit.—VIRGIL.

PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, NO. 29, SOUTH CALVERT-STREET, AT $5 PER ANNUM.

Never, perhaps, were the advantages of a work like the Weekly Register, more manifest, in a single number, than by that we have the honor herewith to present to our readers. While the ordinary newspapers have been forced to divide and thereby lessen the interest of the elaborate report of the secretary of the treasury, we are able to give the whole at once, and afford to the enquiring mind one of the richest feasts of financial knowledge that ever was, probably, impressed upon a sheet of paper. Let not its length intimidate any one from examining it carefully.

This very long article has entirely deranged the contemplated business of the week, but no apology is necessary because we have devoted our pages to it. A supplement will, perhaps, be published next week to bring up our lee-way.

Annual Treasury Report.

In obedience to the acts entitled respectively, "an act to establish the treasury department," and "an act supplementary to the act entitled an act to establish the treasury department," the secretary of the treasury has the honor to lay before congress the following report comprehending

I. A cursory review of the financial operations of the government, in reference to the recent state of the war.

II. A view of the finances for 1815, with estimates of the public revenue and expenditures for 1816.

III. Propositions for the improvement and management of the revenue, and for the support of public credit.

1. A cursory review of the financial operations of the government, in reference to the recent state of war.

In order to introduce to the consideration of congress with advantage, the measures which will be respectfully suggested, for replacing the finances of the United States upon the basis of a peace establishment, a review of the financial operations of the government, in reference to the recent state of war, appears to be a necessary preliminary.

The restrictive system, which commenced in the year 1807, greatly diminished the product of the public revenue; but it was not until the crisis involved an actual declaration of war, that the augmentation in the expenses of the government became obvious and important. With the occasional aid of temporary loans, the ordinary receipts of the treasury had exceeded the ordinary expenditures, even during the period of a suspended commerce; (*) and a report from this department, presenting the estimates for the year 1812, seems to have given the first intimation, that the portion of extraordinary expenses to be incurred for the military and naval service, on account of the then existing state of the country, would raise the demand upon the treasury, to a considerable amount, beyond the estimated product of the current revenue. (†) The ordinary disbursements for the year ending on the 30th September 1811, were stated as amounting to the sum of 13,052,657 dolls. 73 cts.; and the ordinary receipts for the same year were estimated as amounting to the sum of 13,541,446 dolls. 37 cts.; independent of a temporary loan (raised in 1810 and repaid in 1811) as well as of the balances in the treasury at the commencement and the close of the year. But the estimates for the year 1812, required on account of the current expenses, the sum of 9,400,000 dollars.

For the civil and diplomatic departments	1,260,000
For the military department (including the militia, the indian department, the charge of arsenals, army and ordnance, &c.)	3,415,000
For the naval department,	2,500,000
And for the interest on the public debt,	2, 2, 000
	9,400,000
And the subsisting revenue to meet these expenses was estimated at the sum of 8,220,000 dollars, proceeding
From the customs	7,500,000
From the sale of public lands	600,000
And from miscellaneous payments	100,000
	8,220,000

Leaving a deficit for which it was proposed to provide by a loan amounting to the sum of 1,200,000

Such were the limited objects of expense, and such the limited means of supply, at the commencement of the year in which war was declared. An increase of the expense, and a diminution of the supply, must have been anticipated, as the inevitable consequence of that event; but the government reposed with confidence, for all the requisite support, upon the untried resources of the nation, in credit, in capital, and in industry. The confidence was justly reposed; yet it may, perhaps, be considered as a subject for regret, and it certainly furnishes a lesson of practical policy, that there existed no system, by which the internal resources of the country could be brought at once into action, when the resources of its external commerce became incompetent to answer the exigencies of the time. The existence of such a system, would, probably, have invigorated the early movements of the war; might have preserved the public credit unimpaired; and would have rendered the pecuniary contributions of the people more equal, as well as more effective. But owing to the want of such a system a sudden and almost an exclusive resort to the public credit, was necessarily adopted as the chief instrument of finance. The nature of the instrument employed was soon developed; and it was found that public credit could only be durably maintained, upon the broad foundations of public revenue.

On the opening of the session of congress in November 1811, the legislative attention was devoted to the organization of the military and naval departments, upon the enlarged scale of a war establishment; so that the appropriations for this purpose, far exceeded, in a short time, the estimates and the resources of the treasury, as they have been already described. Ways and means were, therefore, provided to meet the extraordinary demands thus created; but they were derived exclusively from the operations of foreign commerce and of public credit.

1. The Mediterranean fund was at first continued until the 4th of March, 1813, and afterwards on 11 March, 1815, (when it became extinct) affording an additional duty of 2 1-2 per cent. ad valorem, on all imported goods paying duties ad valorem, and a discriminating duty of 10 per cent. upon additional duty, in respect to all goods imported in vessels not of the United States*.

*See the annexed table A, exhibiting a statement of the gross annual receipts and disbursements of the treasury from the year 1791, to the year 1814.

2. There were imposed an additional duty of 100 per cent. upon the permanent duties on goods imported into the United States from any foreign place, a discriminating duty of 10 per cent. upon that additional duty, in respect to all goods imported in vessels not of the United States; and an additional duty of 1 dollar 50 cts. per ton (the previous duty being at the rate of 50 cts. per ton) upon all vessels belonging wholly, or in part, to the subjects of foreign powers. But the continuance of the act being limited to the expiration of one year after the conclusion of the peace, these additional duties will cease on the 17th of February, 1816†.

3. An authority was given to raise by loan, a sum not exceeding 11,000,000 of dollars, and to create stock for the amount, bearing interest not exceeding the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, and reimbursable at any time after the expiration of 12 years from the 1st of January 1813. The payment of the interest, and the redemption or the purchase of this stock, are charged upon the sinking fund.‡

4. And an authority was given to issue treasury notes for a sum not exceeding 5 000,000 of dollars, bearing interest at the rate of 5 2-5 per cent. per annum, and reimbursable at such places respectively, as should be expressed on the face of the notes, one year after the day on which the same shall have been issued. The notes were declared to be receivable in payment of all duties and taxes laid by the United States, and all public lands sold by their authority; and the payment of the interest, and the redemption or the purchase of these notes, were charged like the funded debt, upon the sinking fund.§

The effect of the additional ways and means provided by congress, from time to time, during the late war, may readily be traced. From the treasury report, dated the 1st of December 1812, it appears that the actual receipts into the treasury, during the year ending on the 30th of September 1812, including a portion of the loan, and of the issue of treasury notes, amounted to the sum of 16,782,159 dollars 40 cts. (almost double the amount of the previous estimate) and that the actual disbursements, for the same year, amounted to the sum of 18,368,325 7-100 dollars (which was, also, almost double the amount of the previous estimate) independent of the balance in the treasury, at the commencement and the close of the year.¶ But the estimates for the year 1813, required, on account of the accumulating expenditures, a sum of 31,925,000 dollars.

For the civil and diplomatic departments	1,500,000
For the military department	17,000,000
For the naval department	4,925,000
And for the interest and reimbursement of the principal of the public debt	8,500,000
	31,925,000

And the subsisting revenue to meet these expenditures was estimated at the sum of 12,000,000 of dollars, proceeding

From the customs	11,500,000
From the sale of public lands, &c.	500,000
	12,000,000

Leaving a deficit, for which it was proposed to provide, 1st, by the outstanding balances of the authorised loan and issue of treasury notes; and, 2d, by a new authority to borrow, and to issue treasury notes, to the amount of $19,925,000.

During the sessions of congress, which commenced in November, 1812, and closed on the 3d of March, 1813, the appropriations for the army, the navy, and the other branches of the public service, were considerably augmented, but (without advert- ing to the imposition of a small duty upon imported iron ware*) no new source of revenue was then opened; but additional aid was extended to the treasury, by authorising a repetition of the appeal to public credit.

1. An authority was given to raise by loan a sum not exceeding 16,000,000 of dollars, and to create stock for the amount, bearing interest, not exceeding the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, and reimbursable at any time after the expiration of twelve years from the 1st of January, 1814. The payment of the interest, and the redemption or purchase of this stock, are charged upon the sinking fund.†

2. And an authority was given to issue treasury notes for a sum not exceeding 5,000,000 of dollars, absolutely—with a provisional authority to issue an additional sum of 5,000,000 of dollars, to be deemed and held to be part of the loan of 16,000,000 of dollars, authorised as above stated, to be raised. The notes were to bear interest at the rate of 5 2-5 dollars per cent. per annum, to be reimbursable at such places respectively, as should be expressed on the face of them, one year after the day on which they should be issued; to be receivable in payment of all duties and taxes laid by the United States, and all the public lands sold by their authority; and the payment of the interest, and the redemption or purchase of these notes, were charged, like the funded debt, upon the sinking fund.‡

The necessities of the treasury becoming, however, more urgent, and the reliance on the public credit becoming more hazardous, congress determined, at a special session, which commenced in May, 1813, to lay the foundation of a system of internal revenue; selecting, in particular, those subjects of taxation, which were recommended by the experience of a former period, and computing their general product at the sum of 5,000,000 of dollars.¶ The continuance of these taxes being limited, at first, to one year after the termination of the war, they acquired the denomination of "the war taxes;" but, by subsequent laws, almost all the existing revenues are pledged, with the faith of the United States, to provide for the payment of the expenses of government, for the punctual payment of the public debt, principal and interest, according to the contracts; and for creating an adequate sinking fund, gradually to reduce, and eventually to extinguish, the public debt; until those purposes shall be accomplished, or until congress shall provide and substitute by law, for the same purposes, other duties, which shall be equally productive. In the session of May, 1813—

1. A direct tax of 3,000,000 of dollars, was laid upon the United States, and apportioned to the states respectively for the year 1814; and it was afterwards subjected to the general pledge above stated.§

2. A duty of four cents per pound was laid upon all sugar refined within the United States. The continuance of the duty, was limited to one year after the war; and as the general pledge has not been applied to it, the duty will cease on the 17th of February, 1816.*

3. A duty was laid on all carriages, for the conveyance of persons, kept by any person for his own use, or to be let out for hire, or for the conveyance of passengers; which was graduated according to the denomination of the carriage, from the yearly sum of twenty dollars, to the yearly sum of two dollars. The continuance of this duty was originally limited to the war: but the general pledge has been applied to it, with some modification in the mode of laying and collecting the duty.†

4. A duty was imposed on licenses to distillers of spirituous liquors, which was graduated according to the capacity of the still, the time of employing it, and the materials consumed. The continuance of this duty was originally limited to the war; but the general pledge has been applied to it, with considerable modifications in the principle and provisions of the law.‡

5. A duty was laid on sales at auction of merchandise, and of ships and vessels, at the rate of 1 per cent. of the purchase money of goods, and of 25 cents for every hundred dollars of the purchase money of ships and vessels. The continuance of this duty was originally limited to the war; but the general pledge has been applied to it, with a considerable addition to the amount, and a modification of the provisions of the law.§

6. A duty was laid on licenses to retailers of wines, spirituous liquors, and foreign merchandise, graduated according to the place of retailing, and the nature of the article retailed. The continuance of this duty was originally limited to the war; but the general pledge has been applied to it.||

7. A duty was laid on notes of banks and bankers; on bonds, obligations, or promissory notes, discounted by banks or bankers; and on foreign or inland bills of exchange above 50 dollars, and having one or more endorsers; graduated according to the nominal amount of the instrument. The continuance of this duty was limited to one year after the war; and as the general pledge has not been applied to it, the duty will cease on the 17th of February, 1816.¶

But besides the direct tax and the internal duties, there were added to the resources of the treasury, during the sessions of May, 1813—

8. A duty of 20 cents per bushel upon all salt imported from any foreign place into the United States; which being limited to the war, and not being included in the general pledge, will cease on the 17th of February, 1816.

9. And an authority to raise a loan not exceeding 7,500,000 dollars, and to create stock for the amount reimbursable at any time after the expiration of 12 years, from the 1st of January, 1814. The rate of interest was not limited by the law; but it was provided that no certificate of stock should be sold at a rate less than 88 per cent. or 83 dollars in money for 100 dollars in stock. The payment of the interest and the redemption, or the purchase of this stock are charged upon the sinking fund.*

The sources of revenue thus opened in 1813, could not, however, be expected to aid the treasury until 1814; and, accordingly, in the annual report from this department, dated the 8th of January, 1814, neither the direct tax, nor the internal duties, will be found as an item of the actual receipts into the treasury, during the year ending the 30th of September, 1813. The amount of those receipts was stated, in the proceeds of the customs, of the sales of public lands, &c. at 13,568,042 dollars 43 cents, and in the proceeds of loans and treasury notes at 23,976,912 dollars and 50 cents, making together 39,907,607 dollars 62 cents; and the actual disbursements of the same period were stated at 32,928,855 dollars 19 cents, independent of the balances in the treasury, at the commencement and the close of the year.† But the estimates for the year 1814 required a sum of 45,350,000 dollars:

For civil, diplomatic and miscellaneous expenses	1,700,000
For the payment of interest on the old and new debt, and the instalments of the principal of the old debt	12,200,000
For the military establishment	24,550,000
For the naval establishment	6,900,000
	45,350,000

And the subsisting revenue to meet these expenditures was estimated at the sum of 14,370,000 dollars, proceeding from the customs and sales of public lands	6,600,000
From the internal duties and direct tax	340,000
From a balance of loans and treasury notes	4,270,000
	14,370,000

Leaving a deficit for which it was proposed to provide, 1st, by a part of the balance in the treasury; and, 2d, by loans and treasury notes, amounting to 30,980,000.

For the deficit, thus approaching the sum of 3 millions dollars, the only provision made during the session which commenced in December, 1813, rested again upon the public credit:

1. An authority was given to issue treasury notes for a sum not exceeding 5,000,000 of dollars, absolutely; with a provisional authority to issue an additional sum of 5,000,000 of dollars, to be deemed and held to be part of any loan which might be authorized during the session. The notes were to bear interest at the rate of 5 2-5 dollars per cent. per annum; to be reimbursed at such places respectively, as should be expressed on the face of them, one year after the day on which they should be issued; to be receivable in payment of all duties and taxes laid by the United States, and all public lands sold by their authority; and the payment of the interest, and the redemption, or purchase of these notes, were charged, like the funded debt, upon the sinking fund.‡

2. And an authority was given to raise by a loan a sum not exceeding 25,000,000 of dollars; and to create stock for the amount, reimbursable after the expiration of twelve years from the last day of December, 1814. Neither the rate of the interest, nor the price of the stock was limited; and the payment of the interest, and the redemption, or purchase of the stock, are chargeable on the sinking fund.§

The embarrassments of the treasury, after the adjournment of congress in the year 1814, became extreme. It appears|| that the disbursements during the first half of that year, had amounted to the sum of 19,693,731 dollars 27 cents:

For the civil, diplomatic and miscellaneous expenses	1,444,002 60
For the military department	11,210,938
For the naval department	4,612,199 90
For the public debt	5,026,300 77
	19,593,781 27

And the balance of the appropriations for the same objects of expenditure required during the other half of the same year was stated at the sum of 27,576,391 19

But the actual receipts into the treasury during the first half of the year 1814, had amounted to 19,219,946 dollars, 33 cents, proceeding

From the customs	4,182,093 25
From the sale of public lands (including those in the Mississippi territory, the proceeds of which are payable to the state of Georgia)	540,065 63
From the internal duties and direct tax	2,492,722 40
From postage and incidental receipts	166,744
From loans	9,679,676
From treasury notes	2,334,000
	19,219,946 33

And it was estimated that there would be received from the same sources of revenue (including loans and treasury notes to the amount of 2,330,000 dollars) during the other half of the same year, the sum of 13,160,000

32,379,946 33

To this amount add the balance of the cash in the treasury on the 1st of July, 1814, 4,722,693 22

And the estimated aggregate of the funds to meet the demands on the treasury to the close of the year 1814 was the sum of 37,102,639 55

Leaving a deficit for the service of 1814, after absorbing all the cash of the treasury amounting to the sum of 10,167,586 91

To supply this deficit of 10,167,586 91 dollars; to provide an additional sum for the contingencies of the year; and to accelerate the fiscal measures which were essential to the prosecution of the war, in 1815, the interposition of the legislature was deemed indispensable. The plan of finance, which was predicated on the theory of defraying the extraordinary expenses of the war by successive loans, had already become inoperative. The product of the revenues had ceased to furnish an amount equal to the expenditure of the former peace establishment, with an addition of the interest upon the debt contracted on account of war. And the sudden suspension of specie payments at the principal banks established in the different states (however it may be excused or justified by the apparent necessity of the case) had exposed the government, as well as private citizens, to all the inconveniences of a variable currency, devoid alike of national authority, and of national circulation. The treasury could no longer transfer its funds from place to place; and it became, of course, impracticable to maintain the accustomed punctuality in the payment of the public engagements.

Under these circumstances, the congress was convened by the special call of the president, in September, 1814; when the citizens of every occupation and pursuit, seemed eager to second the legislative efforts to replenish an exhausted treasury, and to renovate the public credit. Commerce continued to contribute, perhaps, to the extent of its capacity. Agriculture, though suffering the want of a rent for some of its important staples, was everywhere prepared for the requisite exertion. Domestic manufactures, which had scarcely surmounted the first struggle for existence, yielded to the patriotic impulse. And the capital of individuals, in all its variety of form, offered a ready tribute to relieve the necessities of the country. Thus, during the session which commenced in September, 1814, and closed on the 3d of March, 1815,

1. The following internal duties were increased in their amount; the duties were rendered permanent; and the general pledge was applied to them:

1. The direct tax was raised to an annual sum of six millions of dollars; and it was extended to the district of Columbia.
2. The duty on carriages was raised, and a duty on the harness, was added.
3. The duty on licenses to distillers of spirituous liquors was continued, and a duty on the spirits distilled was added.
4. The duties on sales at auction, and on licenses to retail wines, spirituous liquors, and foreign merchandises, were raised.
5. The rates of postage were raised 50 per cent.

2. The following new duties were permanently laid; and the general pledge was applied to them. But it was at the same time declared, that so long as the duties imposed upon the articles of domestic manufacture should continue to be laid, the duties then payable on the like description of goods imported into the United States, should not be discontinued or diminished.

1. Duties on various articles manufactured or made for sale within the United States, or their territories; as specified in the annexed table marked B.
2. Duties on articles in use, to wit—
On household furniture, the value in any one family, (with certain exceptions) exceeding 250 dollars in money, according to a scale graduated from 1 dollar on a value of 400 dollars, to .06 dollars on a value of 90 0 dollars.
On every gold watch kept for use—2 dollars.
On every silver watch kept for use—1 dollar.

But besides establishing these sources of revenue (and others were contemplated at the period, when the treaty of Ghent was announced) congress sought to confer upon the treasury the means of anticipating the collection of the duties; of recovering the punctuality of its payments; and of inviting the co-operation of the monied institutions and monied men of the United States, in plans for restoring a uniform national currency. With these views various measures were sanctioned.

1. An authority was given to raise by loan a sum not exceeding 3,000,000 of dollars (particularly destined to provide for the expenditures of the last quarter of the year 1814) and to create stock for the amount, reimbursable at any time after the 31st of December, 1814. No limitation was prescribed as to the rate of interest, or the price of the stock, but it was declared, that in payment of subscriptions to this loan, or to loans authorised by any other act of congress, it should be lawful to receive treasury notes becoming due on or before the 1st of January, 1815, at their par value, together with the interest accrued.

The payment of the interest, and the redemption, or the purchase of the stock to be thus created, were charged upon the sinking fund, but the act contained these further assurances: 1st. That in addition to the annual sum of 8,000,000 of dollars heretofore appropriated to the sinking fund, adequate and permanent funds should be provided and appropriated, during the session of congress, for the payment of the interest, and the reimbursement of the principal of the stock; and, 2dly. That an adequate and permanent sinking fund, gradually to reduce, and eventually to extinguish the public debt, contracted during the war, should also be established during the same session of congress.

2. An authority was given to anticipate the collection and receipt of the duties on licenses to distillers of spirituous liquors, and on distilled spirits, by obtaining a loan upon the pledge of the duties, to an amount not exceeding 6,000,000 of dollars, and at a rate of interest not exceeding six per cent. per annum, and a similar authority was given to raise a like sum, at the same rate, by the pledge of a direct tax.

3. An authority was given to issue treasury notes, for so much of the sums authorised to be borrowed under the acts of the 24th of March, and the 15th of November, 1814, as had not been borrowed, or otherwise employed in the issue of treasury notes; provided, that the whole amount should not exceed the sum of 7,500,000 dollars. And by the same act, an authority was also given to issue a further sum of 3,000,000 dollars, to supply a deficiency in the appropriations for the expences of the war department. The treasury notes issued under these authorities were in all respects similar to the prior issues of treasury notes, except that the payment of the interest, and the reimbursement of the principal were not, as heretofore, charged upon the sinking fund, but upon any money in the treasury, not otherwise appropriated.

4. An authority was given to issue and re-issue treasury notes for a sum not exceeding 25,000,000 of dollars, upon principles, essentially different from the prior issues.

1. These treasury notes might be of any denomination. If they were of a denomination less than 100 dollars, they were to be payable to the bearer, to be transferable by delivery, and to bear no interest. This denomination has acquired the designation of "small treasury notes." If they were of the denomination of 100 dollars, or upwards, they might conform to the foregoing description; or they were to be payable to order, to be transferable by endorsement, and to bear interest at the rate of 5 2-5 per cent per annum. This denomination (of which only notes for 100 dollars, bearing interest, have been issued) has acquired the designation of "treasury notes of the new emission."

2. The principal and interest of these treasury notes are not payable at any particular time; but the notes are every where receivable, in all payments to the United States.

3. The holders of "small treasury notes" may exchange them, at pleasure, in sums not less than 100 dollars, for certificates of funded stock, bearing interest at 7 per cent. per annum from the first day of the calendar month next ensuing that in which the notes shall be presented to the treasury of the United States, or to a commissioner of loans, for the purpose of exchange.

4. The holders of "treasury notes of the new emission" may exchange them, at pleasure, in sums not less than 100 dollars, for certificates of funded stock, bearing interest at 6 per cent. per annum from the first day of the calendar month next ensuing that in which they shall be presented to the treasury of the United States, or a commissioner of loans.

5. The stock thus created by the exchange of treasury notes, of either denomination, is reimbursable at any time after the 31st of December, 1821, and it is charged upon such funds as had been, or should be, established by law, for the payment and reimbursement of the funded public debt, contracted since the declaration of war.

5. An authority was given to raise by loan a sum not exceeding 18,452,800 dollars, and to create stock for the amount, reimbursable at any time after the expiration of twelve years from the last day of December, 1815. Neither the rate of interest, nor the price of the stock, was limited; but it was declared, that there might be received in payment of subscriptions to the loan, such treasury notes as were actually issued, before the passing of the act, and which were made by law a charge on the sinking fund. And the payment of the interest, and the reimbursement, or the purchase of the principal stock, are charged upon the sinking fund.

6. It was declared, that any holder of any treasury notes issued, or authorised to be issued, under any laws previously passed, might convert them into certificates of funded debt, bearing an interest of six per cent. per annum.

7. And it was declared, that it should be lawful for the secretary of the treasury to cause to be paid the interest upon the treasury notes, which have become due and remain unpaid, as well with respect to the time elapsed before they became due, as with respect to the time that shall elapse after they become due, and until funds shall be assigned for the payment of the said treasury notes, and notice thereof shall be given.

The progress of expenditure, and of revenue, for the entire period of the war, is thus developed; and independent of the balance of appropriations for the year 1814, which is transferred to the accounts for the year 1815, the subject may be reduced to the following general abstract.

The actual receipts of the Treasury.
In 1812 they amounted to the sum of 22,639,372 75
From revenue 9,801,131 76
From loans 10,700,407
From treasury notes 2,835,700

But as the receipts of the treasury for the year 1815 are derived principally from the war revenue and resources, and as its expenditures arise also principally from the arrearages of the war demands; it is proper to comprize them, as far as they are ascertained, in the following supplemental statement:

1. The gross receipts of the treasury for 1812 1813, and 1814, amounted as above stated to the sum of 98,042,309 95
The receipts into the treasury for 1815, to the 30th September last, cannot be precisely stated, as the accounts to that time are not yet actually made up; but they are estimated to have amounted to the sum of 39,372,000
From revenue 12,400,000
From loans 11,034,000
From treasury notes 15,938,000

The aggregate of the receipts of the treasury from the 1st of Jan. 1812, to the 30th of Sept. 1815, being the sum of 137,414,309 95

2. The gross disbursements of the treasury for 1812, 1813 and 1814, amounted as above stated to the sum of 100,017,557 15

The disbursements of the treasury for 1815, to the 30th of Sept. last amounted to the sum of 33,686,323 18
For the civil, diplomatic and miscellaneous expenses 2,537,000
For the military service, &c. 15,790,147 71
For the naval service, &c. 7,050,000 25
For the public debt 8,909,178 22

The aggregate of the disbursements of the treasury from the 1st Jan. 1812, to the 30th of Sept. 1815, being the sum of 133,703,880 33

It will be natural here to enquire into the general effects of the war upon the public debt of the United States; and the annexed table marked C. exhibits a detailed statement of the unsatisfied amount on the 1st day of Jan. annually, from the year 1791 to the year 1815, both inclusive. The subject, however, may be placed distinctly, in the following point of view, upon estimates referring to the date of the 30th of Sept. 1815.

Of the Public Debt.

1. The amount of the funded debt contracted before the war, which remained unsatisfied on the 30th Sept. 1815 may be stated at the sum of 39,135,484 dollars 98 cents, to wit:

1. In old 6 per cent. stock, the nominal amount being 17,55 371 39
And the amount reimbursed being 13,167,55 7

Balance due on the 30th Sept. 1815, 3,783,284 39

2. In deferred 6 per cent. stock, the nominal amount being 9,358,320 85
And the amount reimbursed being 4,152,543 93

Balance due on the 30th of September 1815 5,235,776 42

3. In 3 per cent. stock 16,153,177 43

4. In exchanged 6 per cent. stock under the act of 1812 2,984,745 72

5. In 6 per cent stock of 1796 8,000

6. In Louisiana 6 per cent. stock. 10,923,500

Balance due on the 30th of Sept. 1815, of the whole of the public debt contracted before the war 39,135,484 96

2. The amount of the funded debt contracted on account of the late war on the 30th of Sept. 1815, may be stated at the sum of 63,144,972 dollars 50 cents; to wit:

1. In 6 per cent. stock of 1812 (the 11,000,000 loan) authorised by the act of the 4th of March, 1812, obtained at par, and not reimbursable before the year 1815 7,860,500

2. In 6 per cent. stock of 1813 (the 16,000,000 loan) authorised by the act of the 8th of Feb. 1813, obtained at the rate of 88 dollars in cash for 100 dollars in stock, and not reimbursable before the year 1826 18,109,377 48

3. In 6 per cent. stock of 1813 (the 7,500,000 loan) authorised by the act of the 2d of Aug. 1813, obtained at the rate of 82 dollars 25 cents in money for 100 dollars in stock, and not reimbursable before the year 1826 8,498,581 95

4. In 6 per cent. stock of 1814 (which arose from loans in parts of a sum of 25,000,000 of dollars, called the ten million loan and the six million loan) authorised by the act of the 24th of March, 1814, obtained at different rates, and not reimbursable before 1827, to wit:

12,992,888 90 at 89 per cent. stock, 15,366,111 21
140,810 at 85 per cent. 165,618 82
43,222 21 at 90 3-4 per cent. 47,627 79
74,350 75 at 90 1-2 per cent. 82,420 72

1,551,511 87 15,661,818 54

5. In 6 per cent. stock of 1815, the 12,000,000 loan authorised by the act of the 31d March, 1815, obtained at different rates, payable in treasury notes or in cash, and not reimbursable before 1827, to wit:

7,942,119 59 at 95 per cent. stock 8,741,283 77
1,047,346 30 at 96 1-2 1,085,851 08
32,978 49 at 97 33,998 44
275,000 at 98 280,611 24
4,000 at par 4,000

9,745,745 53

In 7 per cent. stock of 1815, created by funding treasury notes not bearing interest issued at par, and part upon an advance, under the act of the 24th of Feb. 1815, and not reimbursable until 1825 2,258,949

Estimated amount of the whole of the funded public debt in reference to the late war 63,144,972 50

3. The amount of the floating debt, contracted since the commencement of the late war, calculated to the 30th of September, 1815, may be stated at the sum of 17,355,101 dollars, to wit:

1. The aggregate of the treasury notes, issued under the authority of the several acts of congress, passed prior to the act of 24th Feb. 1815, amounted to the sum of 2,200,000 dollars, to wit:

Payable in 1814, but unpaid 2,790,200
Payable in 1815 7,547,200
Payable in 1816 2,774,720
Payable also in 1816 (issued under the special authority of the act of the 22th Dec. 1814) 8,312,400

21,737,600

Product the amount reimbursed in 1815 (at Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Charleston and Savannah) 1,536,000

20,201,600

Of this aggregate there has been subscribed in principal and interest to the loan of 1815, about the sum of 4,531,587 6 From which deducting an average estimate of near one years interest, about the sum of 216,587 6

There will remain for the amount of principal subscribed to the loan, about the sum of 4,315,000
And it is estimated that there has been paid on account of duties and taxes, to the collectors of the customs, the internal duties and the direct tax, about the sum of 1,300,000

Outstanding amount of treasury notes, bearing interest at 5 2-5 per cent. per ann. about the sum of 5,515,000
14,686,600

2. The aggregate of 'small treasury notes,' issued and re-issued under the act of the 24th Feb. 1815, amounts to about the sum of 4,142,800

Of this aggregate there has been funded for 7 per cent. stock included in the foregoing statement of the funded public debt, about the sum of 3,263,949
And there has been paid on account of duties and taxes, about the sum of 50,000

Outstanding 'small treasury notes,' about the sum of 822,901

3. The aggregate of the treasury notes of the new emission, issued under the act of 4th of February, 1815, amounts to about the sum of 694,600

Leaving the amount of the floating public debt in treasury notes, on the 1st of Oct. 1815, about the sum of 16,203,101

But to this amount of the floating public debt in treasury notes, there must be added the following temporary loans, to wit:

1. A temporary loan made by the state bank of Boston in 1812, payable the 15th and 31st of December, 1814, but unpaid, 500,000

2. A temporary loan made by the Cumberland bank in 1812, payable the 15th of November, 1817, 50,000

3. A temporary loan made by the bank of the state of South Carolina in 1814, payable the 1st of December, 1815, 50,000

4. A temporary loan made by the Mechanics' bank of New-York in 1815, payable when demand'd, 200,000

5. A temporary loan made by the state of New-York, payable in the year 1817, 350,000

1,150,000
Making the aggregate amount of the floating public debt about the sum of 17,355,101

RECAPITULATION.

1. The amount of the unsatisfied funded public debt, contracted before the war, on the 30th Sept. 1815, was the sum of 39,135,484 96

2. The amount of the funded public debt, contracted in reference to the late war, on the same day, the sum of 63,144,972 50

3. The amount of the floating public debt, contracted since the war, was, on the same day, the sum of 17,355,101

Total of the ascertained amount of the public debt, created since the war to the 30th of Sept. 1815, 80,500,073 50

Total amount of the national debt on the 30th of September, 1815. 119,635,558 46

It is proper to remark, that the aggregate of the national debt, thus stated to the 30th of September, 1815, is subject to considerable changes and additions. The floating debt in treasury notes is convertible, at the pleasure of the creditors, into funded debt; and independent of a direct application of the current revenue to discharge the treasury notes, as well as the temporary loans, there must be a great, though gradual reduction of the floating debt by the payments made in treasury notes for duties, taxes, and public lands. There are, indeed, some claims known to exist for loans, supplies, and services, during the late war, which have not been liquidated, or are not embraced by existing appropriations; and, doubtless, there are other legal and equitable claims which have not been brought into view, in any form at the accounting departments, but which may eventually receive the sanction of congress. It is not, however, within the scope of an estimate hitherto made, to state the probable addition to the funded debt, under all circumstances, at more than 5,000,000 of dollars.

which would consequently place the aggregate of the funded debt created in consequence of the war at a sum not much exceeding 70,000,000 of dollars. But it may be important to recollect, that the war debt has not been entirely incurred for objects limited to the continuance of the war; and that the military and naval establishments in particular, have derived durable advantages from the expenditures of the treasury.

For the payment of the interest, and the reimbursement, or gradual extinguishment, of the national debt, the resources of the treasury are abundant; although the state of the circulating medium (which will be more particularly considered hereafter) has rendered it impracticable to obtain at all times, upon reasonable terms, the local currency of some of the places appointed for the discharge of the public engagements. These resources depend upon the sinking fund, connected with the faith of the United States, which is pledged to supply from the existing, or from other subjects of revenue, the deficiencies of that fund.

THE SINKING FUND.

The public debt amounted, on the 1st of January 1791, to the sum of 73,463,476 dollars 52 cts.; and it consisted.

Of the foreign debt,	12,812,821 92
Of the domestic debt,	60,650,654 60
	73,463,476 52

The foreign debt experienced various changes in form and in amount. From 1792 to 1795, it rose above the amount stated for 1791; but from that period it was gradually reduced; and on the 1st of January 1801, it stood at the sum of 10,419 000 dollars. From the year 1801, however, the annual reduction was more rapid; and in the year 1810, the foreign debt became extinct.

The domestic debt has also experienced various changes in form and amount. It was originally stipulated, that it should be subject to redemption by payments not exceeding, in one year, on account both of principal and interest, the proportion of 3 dollars upon 100 dollars of the stock; and when the sinking fund was constituted and organized, provision was made for effecting the payments in that proportion, until the whole debt should be extinguished, by dividends payable on the last days of March, June and September, in each year, at the rate of $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, and on the last day of December in each year, $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, upon the original capital. During the first period of about ten years, from 1791 until the 1st of January 1801, the amount of the domestic debt never fell below the sum which has been stated, and in 1801 it stood at about the sum of 72,619,050 dollars 80 cents. The augmentation created on account of the purchase of Louisiana (amounting to 15,000,000 dollars) raised the capital of the domestic debt in 1804, to the sum of 80,691,120 dolls. 88 cents; but from that period there was a considerable annual diminution of the amount, until it was reduced, on the 30th of September 1815, to the already specified sum of 39,135,484 dolls. 96 cents.

The sinking fund, by whose operations these beneficial effects have been produced, may be regarded as coeval with the organization of the present government, but it has undergone many important modifications.

1. The early appropriations of the revenue were confined to the payment of the interest and instalments of the foreign debt, and to payment of the interest of the domestic debt; but so early as the 4th of August 1790, the proceeds of the sales of the public lands in the western territory were permanently and exclusively appropriated and pledged towards sinking and discharging the debts for which the United States were then holden. The annexed table D. will exhibit a statement of the quantity of the public lands, which have been annually sold, and of the proceeds of the sales, as far as can be now ascertained.

2. In the year 1792, however, commissioners were designated and authorised to purchase the public debt, at its market price not exceeding the par value; and the interest of the debt purchased, together with the surplus of certain other appropriations was assigned for that purpose. When the annual amount of the fund thus created should be equal to 2 per cent on the 6 per cent stock, it was directed to be first applied to the redemption of that stock, according to the right reserved; and then to the purchase, at its market price, of any other public stock.

3. In the year 1795, "the sinking fund" was established by name; its resources were vested in the same commissioners; and its operations were subjected to their direction and management. The duty of the commissioners, independent of temporary objects, consisted in applying the sinking fund, 1st, to the payment of the 6 per cent stock, at the stipulated rate of 8 per centum per annum; 2d, to the payment of the deferred stock after the year 1801, according to the same stipulation; and, 3d, if any surplus remained, towards the further and final redemption of the public debt, of every denomination. For the accomplishment of these purposes, there were permanently appropriated and pledged, in addition to the other monies constituting the sinking fund, and the interest of the amount of the purchased or redeemed debt, 1st, a sufficient sum arising yearly, and every year, from the duties on imports and tonnage, and the duty on domestic distilled spirits and stills, as might be rightfully paid of the principal of the 6 per cent. stock, commencing on the first of January 1796; and the deferred stock, commencing on the first of January 1802.—2d, the dividends on the public shares in the Bank of the United States, but the shares were sold in 1796 and 1802, under an authority given in 1795. 3d, the net proceeds of the sales of public lands in the western territory. 4th, monies received into the treasury on account of old debts. 5th, the surplusses of revenue, beyond the amount of the appropriations.

4. Such was the outline of the sinking fund, when on the 6th of April 1802, the internal duties were repealed, and on the 29th of April 1802, a new and additional provision was made for the redemption of the public debt. Thus, an annual sum of 7,300,000 dollars, was permanently appropriated and vested in the commissioners of the sinking fund, to be produced, 1st, by the monies (other than the surplusses of revenue) which then constituted the fund, or should arise to it by virtue of any previous provisions; 2d, by the sums annually required to discharge the interest and charges of the public debt; and, 3rd, by so much of the duties on merchandize and tonnage, as would be necessary, together with the preceding resources, to complete the annual investment of 7,300,000 dollars.—The act not only placed the reimbursement of the principal, but also, the payment on account of interest and charges, of the public debt, under the superintendence of the commissioners; making it their duty to cause the fund to be applied in payment, 1st, of such sums as by virtue of any acts they had previously been directed to pay; 2d, of such sums as may be annually wanted to discharge the Interest and charges accruing on any other part of the then debt of the United States; 3d, of such sums as may be annually required to discharge any instalment of the principal of the then debt; and 4th, as to any surplus, to apply it towards the further and final redemption, by payment or purchase of the then debt. The act of the 10th of November, 1803, having created 6 per cent stock to the amount of 11,250,000 dollars, in pursuance of the convention for the purchase of Louisiana, added an annual sum of 700 000 dollars to the sinking fund, to be paid out of the duties on merchandize and tonnage; and to be applied by the commissioners to the payment of the public debt, including the Louisiana stock, in the manner above stated. It may be added, that the interest on the Louisiana stock is payable in Europe; but the principal is reimbursable at the treasury of the United States in four annual instalments commencing in 1808.

It is obvious that a sinking fund of 8,000,000 of dollars, (independent of the general pledges in prior laws) was ample for the payment of the interest and the principal of the public debt, amounting only to the sum of 86,000,000 dolls. extinguishing the 6 per cent stock in 1818, the deferred stock in 1824, and the Louisiana stock in 1822, as fast as the terms of the contracts, and the policy of the government would permit. The general operation of the fund, indeed, has been shewn; but it is proper, more particularly to add, that on the 1st of January 1815, there had been transferred to the credit of the commissioners, in the books of the treasury, an amount of public debt equal to the sum of 33,873,463 dollars 98 cents, of the following denominations, to wit:

3 per cent. stock	8,250,000
4 1-2 per cent. stock	820,000
4 per cent. stock	3,180,000
		12,200,000
2. Domestic debt.
4 per cent. stock	1,946,026	92
3 per cent. stock	698,555	41
Deferred 6 per cent. stock	1,005,179	83
4 per cent. stock	6,482,500
Exchanged 6 per cent. stock	6,291,051	12
Computed 6 per cent. stock	1,889,850	70
4 1-2 per cent. stock	170,000
3 1-2 per cent. stock	1,344,900
Navy 6 per cent. stock	711,700
Louisiana 6 per cent. stock	3,650,000
6 per cent. stock of 1812	321,200
		21,673,463 98
		33,873,463 98

But the charges upon the sinking fund have accumulated, in consequence of the late war, to an amount which it has not the capacity to defray; while its operations, in other respects, have been obstructed by the temporary failure of the revenue arising from duties on merchandize and tonnage, and the protracted embarrassments of the circulating medium. Thus,

1. The annual appropriation for the sinking fund amounts to 8,000,000 of dollars, and consists at present,

Of the interest on such parts of the public debt as have been reimbursed or paid off (which, however, is self derived from the customs) estimated on the 30th of September, 1816, at the sum of	1,960,577 64
Of the net proceeds of the sales of the public lands, exclusive of lands sold in the Mississippi territory (which as yet belong to the state of Georgia) estimated annually at the sum of	800,000
Of the proceeds of duties on imports and tonnage, to complete the annual investments, estimated at the sum of	5,230,422 35
	8,000,000

2. The annual charge upon the sinking fund, estimated for 1816, will amount, probably, to the sum of 14,524,200 dollars,

On account of the interest and the instalments of the old debt, the sum of	3,460,000
On the account of the interest of the new debt computed on a capital of seventy millions of dollars, about the sum of	4,700,000
On account of the principal and interest of treasury notes, issued under the act of the 30th of June, 1812, the 25th of February, 1813, and the 4th of March, 1814, (after allowing for the amount reimbursed, subscribed to the loan, and paid for duties) about the sum of	6,364,200
	14,524,200

Deficit in the amount of the sinking fund, compared with the charges upon it, estimated for 1816, 6,524,200.

From this view of the financial operations of the government, the secretary of the treasury, with every sentiment of deference and respect, presents the following general conclusions, for the consideration of congress:

1. That the existing revenue of the United States, arises, 1st, from duties on imported merchandize; and the tonnage of vessels; 2d, internal duties, including the direct tax upon lands, houses, and slaves; and 3d, the proceeds of the sales of public lands; but some of these duties and taxes are permanently imposed, and some are limited in their duration.

2. That the following duties or taxes are either partially or wholly limited in their duration. 1st. The duties on merchandize and tonnage, will be reduced one half on the 17th of February, 1816; except such as are imposed on goods of the like description with the articles of domestic manufacture, on which duties have been laid, and included in the general pledge. 2nd, the new duty on salt; the duty on sugar refined within the United States, and the stamp duty on bank notes, promissory notes discounted, and on bills of exchange, are not included in the general pledge, and will wholly cease on the 17th of February, 1816.

3. That the following duties or taxes are not limited in their duration, and are included in the general pledge. 1st, The direct tax upon lands, houses, and slaves. 2nd, The duties upon licences to distillers of spirituous liquors, and upon the liquors distilled. 3d, The duty upon licences to retailers of wines, spirituous liquors, and foreign merchandize. 4th, The duty upon sales at auction. 5th, the duty upon carriages and harness. 6th, the duties upon household furniture and watches. 7th, The duties on articles manufactured or made for sale within the United States. 8th, The rate of postage.

4th. That the faith of the United States, and the revenue arising from the duties and taxes, which are not limited in their duration, are pledged for the punctual payment of the public debt, principal and interest, according to the terms of the contracts respectively; and for creating an adequate sinking fund, gradually to reduce and eventually to extinguish the debt. But this pledge will be satisfied by the substitution of other adequate duties or taxes; and the increase in the proceeds of the duties on merchandize and tonnage, subsequent to the pledge, afford an advantageous opportunity of making such substitution, in respect to the more inconvenient and burthensome portion of the internal duties.

5. That the establishment of a revenue system, which shall not be exclusively dependent upon the supplies of foreign commerce, appears, at this juncture, to claim particular attention.

II. A view of the finances for 1815, with estimates of the public revenue and expenses for 1816.

At the close of the last session of congress, the demands upon the treasury were interesting in their nature, as well as great in their amount. Exclusively of the ordinary expences of the government, they consisted of demands for the payment of the army, preparatory to its reduction to the peace establishment, with other very heavy arrearages and disbursements on the war and navy departments; for the payment of the dividends on the funded debt, and of the arrearages as well as the accruing claims, on account of the treasury note debt, and for the payment of the Louisiana dividends, with other considerable debts contracted in Europe, in consequence of the late war.

The efficiency of the means which were possessed for the liquidation of these demands, depended upon circumstances beyond the control of the government. The balance of money in the treasury consisted of bank credits, lying chiefly in the southern and western sections of the union. The revenue, proceeding from the provision, made prior to the last session of congress, was, comparatively, of small amount. The revenue, proceeding from the provision made during that session, could not be available for a great portion of the present year; and, in both instances, the revenue was payable in treasury notes, or it assumed the form of bank credits, at the respective places of collection. The only remaining resources for immediate use, were an additional issue of treasury notes, and a loan; but the successful employment of these resources was rendered, for some time, doubtful, by the peculiar situation of the credit and currency of the nation.

The suspension of specie payments, throughout the greater proportion of the United States, and the consequent circulation of the interchange of bank notes and bank credits, between the institutions of the different states, had deprived the treasury of all the facilities of transferring its funds from place to place; and a proposition, which was made at an early period, to the principal banks of the commercial cities, on the line of the Atlantic, with a view, in some degree to restore those facilities, could not be effected, for the want of a concurrence in the requisite number of banks. Hence, it has happened (and the duration of the evil is without any positive limitation) that, however adequate the public revenue may be in its general product to discharge the public engagements, it becomes totally inadequate in the process of its application; since the possession of public funds, in one part, no longer affords the evidence of a fiscal capacity to discharge a public debt, in any other part of the union.

From the suspension of specie payments, and from various other causes, real or imaginary, differences in the rate of exchange, arose between the several states, and even between the several districts in the same state, and the embarrassments of the treasury were more and more increased; since congress had not sanctioned any allowance on account of the rate of exchange, and the amount of the legislative appropriations, was the same, wherever the legislative objects were to be effected. But the treasury notes partook of the inequalities of the exchange in the transactions of individuals, although the treasurer could only issue them at their par value. The public stock, created in consideration of a loan, also partook of the inequalities of the exchange; although to the government, the value of the stock created, and the obligation of the debt to be discharged, were the same wherever the subscription to the loan might be made. Thus, notwithstanding the ample revenue provided and permanently pledged, for the payment of the public creditor; and notwithstanding the auspicious influence of peace upon the resources of the nation, the market price of the treasury notes and of the public stock, was every where far below its par or true value, for a considerable period after the adjournment of congress; vibrating, however, with the change of place, from the rate of 75 to the rate of 90 per cent. Payments in bank paper were universally preferred during that period, to payments in the paper of the government; and it was a natural consequence, that wherever the treasury failed in procuring a local currency, it failed, also, in making a stipulated payment.

Under these extraordinary and perplexing circumstances, the great effort of the treasury was, 1st, to provide promptly and effectually for all urgent demands, at the proper place of payment, and to the requisite amount of funds: 2d, to overcome the difficulties of the circulating medium as far as it was practicable; so that no creditor should receive more, and no debtor pay less, in effective value, on the same account, than every other creditor, or every other debtor: and third, to avoid any unreasonable sacrifice of the public property; particularly when it must, also, be attended with a sacrifice of the public credit. It was not expected that this effort, would every where produce the same satisfaction, and the same results; but the belief is entertained, that it has been successful in the attainment of its objects, to the extent of a just anticipation.

OF THE ISSUES OF THE TREASURY NOTES.

The treasury notes which were issued under acts passed prior to the 24th of February, 1815, were for the most part, of a denomination too high, to serve as a current medium of exchange; and it was soon ascertained, that the small treasury notes, fundable at an interest of 7 per cent, though of a convenient denomination for common use, would be converted into stock almost as soon as they were issued. With respect to the first description, therefore, the issue has not been restrained; but, with respect to the second description, the issue has been generally limited to cases of peculiar urgency; such as the payment of the army preparatory to its reduction; the payment of the dividends on the public debt, where the local currency could not be obtained; and the payment of an inconsiderable amount of miscellaneous claims, apparently entitled to distinction. The annexed table marked E, contains a statement of the amount of the small treasury notes, which had been issued on the 30th of September, 1815, from which it appears,

1. That there had been issued for the payment of the army, a sum of	1,465,069
2. That there had been issued for the payment of the public debt, the sum of	1,203,100
3. That there had been issued for sundry miscellaneous claims, the sum of	109,681
4. That there has been sold at an advance producing 32,107 64 for the purpose of raising funds to meet the general engagements of the treasury, a sum of	1,365,000
	4,142,850

OF THE LOAN.

The act of the 3d of March 1815, authorized a loan, for a sum not exceeding 18,452,800 dollars; it was made lawful to accept in payment of subscriptions such treasury notes, as had been charged on the sinking fund; and a commission not exceeding one quarter of one per cent. was allowed, for selling the certificates of stock, or procuring subscriptions to the loan. Under this authority the annexed notice, marked F, dated the 10th of March 1815, was published, opening a loan for the sum of 12,000,000 dollars, with a view, 1st, to absorb a portion of the treasury note debt; 2d, to obtain funds for paying the unsubscribed arrearages of that debt; and 3d, to aid the treasury with a supply of the local currencies of different places, in some proportion to the probable amount of the local demands.

The offers to subscribe to the loan prior to the 19th of April, 1815, placed (as it was proper to place) money and treasury notes upon the same footing; but the offers varied essentially, in the terms and conditions that were annexed to them; and, in point of fact, no direct offer was made to subscribe at a higher rate than 89 per cent. while some of the offers were made at a rate lower than seventy five per cent. Upon this experiment, therefore, it was seen at once, that the new situation of the treasury required a new course of proceeding, and that neither the justice due to the equal rights of the public creditors, nor a fair estimate of the value of the public property, nor an honorable regard for the public credit, would permit the loan to assume the shape and character of a scramble; subservient to the speculations which create what is called a market price, and shifting in every town and village of every state, according to the arbitrary variations of what is called the difference of exchange.

In this view of the subject, all the offers of subscription to the loan, made in the first instance, were declined; but it was declared, at the same time, that offers at the rate of 95 per cent. would be accepted. The rate thus proposed, was adopted; upon a consideration of the value of the stock; of the equitable, as well as legal claim of the holders of treasury notes; and of the real condition of the public credit. The object of the loan being (as already stated) to absorb a portion of the treasury note debt, and to acquire a sufficiency of local currency, for local purposes, the price of the stock at the treasury was, of course, independent of the daily up-and-down prices of the various stock markets in the union, and could only be affected by the progress towards the attainment of those objects. Thus, while the wants of the treasury were insufficiently supplied, offers to subscribe were freely accepted, and the parties were sometimes authorised and invited to increase the amount of their offers; but where local funds had so accumulated, as to approach the probable amount of the local demands, the price of the stock was raised at the treasury; and, where the accumulation was deemed adequate to the whole amount of the local demands, the loan was closed.

The policy of the course pursued at the treasury was soon demonstrated. Offers of subscription to the loan, at the rate of 95 per cent. payable in treasury notes, or in money, were presented to a large amount, soon after the rule of the treasury was declared; and the annexed table marked G, will exhibit the progressive and actual state of all the subscriptions to the 30th of September last.

In the district of Columbia, the money subscriptions (including the subscription of certain liquidated claims upon the treasury) were successively at 95, 96½, 97 and 98 per cent. and finally, at par. In the city of Baltimore, the money subscriptions have been at 95 and 96½ per cent. In the city of Philadelphia, the money subscriptions have been entirely at 95 per cent. The price was raised at the treasury from 95 to 98 per cent. on the 18th of June (subject, of course, to all unexecuted subscriptions previously accepted or authorised) and, since that time, considerable offers have been received at 95 and 96 per cent. but none have been received at the increased rate of 98 per cent. The subscriptions payable in treasury notes have been made in all places, at the same rate of 95 per cent. A general abstract of the state of the loan, may, therefore be reduced to the following form:

In the district of Columbia the subscriptions have amounted,
1. In money to the sum of	2,282,037 38
2. In treasury notes to the sum of	257,276 65
		2,539,314 03
In Baltimore, the subscriptions have amounted,
1. In money to the sum of	1,994,818 56
2. In treasury notes to the sum of	668,661 90
		2,663,480 40
In Philadelphia, the subscriptions have amounted,
1. In money to the sum of	1,845,0 0
2. In treasury notes to the sum of	1,260, 68 69
		3,105,568 59
In New-York, the subscriptions have amounted,
1. In money to the sum of	601 44
2. In treasury notes	658,671 61
		658,973 05
In Rhode-Island, the subscriptions have amounted,
in treasury notes, to the sum of		132,020 69
In Massachusetts, the subscriptions have amounted,
in treasury notes, to the sum of		97,301 32
In New-Hampshire, the subscriptions amounted, in treasury notes, to the sum of		52,386 26
In North Carolina, the subscriptions amounted, in treasury notes, to the sum of		95,000
		9,84,044 38

Having thus absorbed a portion of the treasury note debt, and deeming the treasury to be possessed of a sufficient supply of the local currency of the places at which the treasury notes, unsubscribed, and in arrears, were payable by law, except in the cities of New York and Boston, the secretary of the treasury proceeded to assign funds for the payment of the treasury notes, and to give notice thereof, in the form of the annexed copies, (marked respectively H. and I.) in pursuance of the act of congress, passed on the third of March, 1815. As a sufficient supply of the local currencies of Boston and New York had not been obtained, the overture was made in the same notice to discharge the treasury notes payable in those cities and in arrears by accepting them in subscriptions to the loan, at the rate of 95 per cent. by exchanging them for other treasury notes, in which the interest due should be included as principal; or by giving drafts for the amount upon any of the banks, in which the government possessed funds. This overture is still open to the consideration and acceptance of the holders of the treasury notes in question; and it has been accepted, in the shape of subscriptions to the loan, to a considerable extent. Since the 30th of September these amount, including some subscriptions, the details of which have not yet been completed, to more than two millions of dollars.

Of the transfer of balances of appropriations and of revenue from 1814 to 1815.

In the administration of the finances, it has been the practice to consider the demands and supplies of each year, as distinct subjects for legislative provision, independent of the balances of appropriations, or of revenue, existing at the close of the preceding years. The same course will now be pursued, but with a few explanatory remarks. The annual appropriations have never been entirely absorbed, during the year for which they were made; and the credit given, by law, for payments in every branch of the revenue, necessarily introduces a discrimination between the amount of duties which accrues within the year, as a debt to the government; and the amount which is paid, within the year, as money into the treasury. The annual appropriations, however, are not charged upon the revenue of the year, specifically, in which they are made; and in point of fact, they are satisfied whenever demanded out of any unappropriated money in the treasury; without reference to the time, when the revenue accrued, or when the money was actually received at the treasury.

The inconvenience of continuing appropriations in force, which were liable to be drawn from the treasury during an indefinite period, induced congress to enact in the year 1795, that any appropriations (except permanent appropriations for the interest of the funded debt, or appropriations for the payment of loans, and the accruing interest; for the sinking fund; and for purposes, which specially require by law a longer duration) remaining unexpended for more than two years after the expiration of the calendar year in which the act of appropriation was passed, should cease and determine; and that the unexpended sum should be carried to an account on the books of the treasury, to be denominated "the Surplus fund." By the operation of this provision, no ordinary appropriation can now survive the specified period of two years; and notwithstanding the formal designation of a particular account, in which the entry shall be made, the sum disengaged by the determination of each appropriation, becomes again an undistinguishable part of the public treasure, which is subject to the future dispositions of the legislature.

With these remarks, it will be useful, for the purposes of general information, to exhibit the gross amount of the balances of appropriations for the year 1814 transferred to the year 1815, without entering into a comparative detail of the appropriations, and of the revenues during the particular year in which the appropriations were made by law. Thus,

The gross amount of the appropriations for 1814, including the aggregate of the balances of appropriations for the year 1813, amounted to the sum of	55,978,464 20
Of this there was paid on or before the 31st of Dec. 1814, the sum of	38,028,230 32
And on the 1st of Jan. 1815, there was carried to the surplus fund the sum of	597,309 99
	38,620,540 31

Leaving as a general balance of the appropriations of 1814, payable at the treasury in 1815, the sum of 17,357,923 89

Of the demands on the treasury for 1815.

The demands authorised by acts of appropriation during the year 1815 (exclusive of certain indefinite appropriations, the amount of which is not yet ascertained) were the following:

For civil, diplomatic and miscellaneous expenses, besides the unascertained product of fines, penalties, and forfeitures, assigned to pay the charges of courts, the sum of	3,080,656 22
For military expenses, including those of the Indian department, and the permanent appropriation of 200,000 dollars for arming and equipping the militia, the sum of	5,618,790 41
The naval expenses, including the annual appropriation of 200,000 dollars for the purchase of timber	5,233,022
	13,932,463 06
For the public debt, to wit, the interest on the debt contracted before the war	1,909,000
The interest on the debt contracted since the war (including the loan of 1815, and excluding the interest of treasury notes)	3,560,000
The interest of 5 2-5 per ct. per annum, upon treasury notes, outstanding on the 1st of January, 1815, including notes due in 1814, and not paid, (the principal being then 10,616,480) the sum of 575,000 |

The annual reimbursement of the principal of the old 6 per cent. and deferred stocks, the sum of
 1,590,000 |

The principal of treasury notes payable in 1814, and the 1st of Jan. 1815, but not then paid, the sum of
 2,799,200 |

The principal of treasury notes payable in 1815, and the 1st of January 1816, the sum of 7,947,280 |

The principal of temporary loans payable in 1814, but not then paid
 500,000 |

18,771,460

The amount of appropriations and demands for the public debt for 1815 being the sum of 32,703,948 62 |

The total amount, therefore, demandable at the treasury during the year 1815, was
 50,061,871 95 |

Consisting of appropriations made prior to that year, and unsatisfied at its commencement, amounting to 17,357,923 89 |

And of appropriations, and demands on account of the public debt, made and arising during the year 1815, amounting to 31,703,948 06 |

50,061,871 95

Of the ways and means of the treasury for the year 1815.

These may be considered in a two-fold aspect:

1. as to the ways and means placed by the laws within the power of the treasury: and 2, the amount capable of being realized, or made actually available by the treasury during the year.

Under the 1st view, the ways and means consisted,

1. Of the cash in the treasury at the commencement of the year, which amounted to	1,526,998 63
2. Of the outstanding revenue, which accrued prior to the year 1815, and remained unpaid at its commencement, estimated, exclusive of the sums due for public lands, at about	4,600,000
3. Of the revenue accruing in the year 1815, estimated at 33,850,000 dollars, viz.
Customs	25,000,000
Direct tax, net product	5,400,000
Internal duties, do.	7,000,000
Public lands	1,000,000
Postage and incidental receipts	450,000
	33,850,000

4. Of the unexecuted authority to borrow money, and to issue treasury notes, conferred by acts of congress, passed prior to the year 1815, viz:

The loan act of March 14, 1812,	765,300
Do. of March 34, 1814	7,562,119
Do. of November 15, 1814	3,000,000
	11,327,419

Treasury note act of March 4, 1814	2,772,720
Do. of December 26, 1814, estimated at	8,600,000
	11,372,720

5. Of the authority to borrow money and to issue treasury notes, conferred by acts of congress, passed in the year 1815, viz:

The loan act of March 3, 1815	18,157,800
Do. of February 13, 1815, for (public buildings in Washington)	500,000
Treasury notes act of February 24, 1815 (exclusive of the re-issues authorised by this act)	25,000,000
	43,652,800

112,629,937 63

This great apparent surplus of ways and means within the power of the treasury arose, in part, from the great increase in the amount of the customs, accruing in the year 1815; which instead of 4,000,000, the amount estimated prior to the peace, will probably, in consequence of that event, amount to the sum of 25,000,000 as here stated. A great portion also of the sums authorised to be borrowed, or raised, upon treasury notes, it was evident, could not be obtained or raised within the year; and the several successive acts, by which the authority was given, although they were nominally accumulative, were actually the results of attempts to vary or modify this authority in such a way as to render it more easy or more effectual in its execution.

The 2d view of the ways and means for the year 1815, exhibits the amount actually authorized and received into the treasury during that year. As the year is not yet terminated, this can only be given by way of estimate: the result will probably not differ materially from the following—

1. Cash in the treasury, at the commencement of the year	1,526,998 63
2. Receipts from revenue, including that which was outstanding at the commencement of the year, viz:
Customs	8,900,000
Direct tax	2,000,000
Internal duties	4,700,000
Public lands	1,000,000
Postage and incidental receipts	450,000
	16,350,000

3. Receipts from loans and treasury notes:
Loans, under the act of March 14, 1812	50,000
Do. do. Nov. 15, 1814	950,000
Do. do. March 3, 1815	9,84,044 33
Do. do. temporary loan	650,000
	9,034,044 33
Under act of Feb. 1815	100,000

Amount actually borrowed to the 30th Sept. 1815, per statements annexed (marked G. and K.) 11,034,044 33

Amount estimated to be borrowed from the 1st of Oct. to the 31st Dec. 1815: 3,000,000

Treasury notes.

Amount issued prior to the 1st Oct. 1815:

Under the act of March 4, 1814	2,772,700
Do. do. Dec. 26, 1814	8,318,400
Do. do. Feb. 24, 1815	691,600

Per statement annexed, [L.] 11,785,720

Small treasury notes, not bearing interest, under the act of Feb. 24, 1815: amount issued and re-issued per statement, marked E. 4,152,850

Amount estimated to be issued and re-issued from Oct. 1 to Dec. 31, 1815 1,000,000

	16,938,570
	30,972,614 83
Making the total amount estimated to be actually received into the treasury during the year 1815	48,849,613 01

The application of the monies actually received into the treasury, during the year 1815, will be as follows: to the 30th of September, the payments have amounted to the following sums nearly—the accounts not being yet made up, the precise amount cannot be given:

For civil, diplomatic and miscellaneous expenses	2,537,000
Military service	15,190,134 71
Naval service	7,050,000 25
Public debt (exclusive of the sum of 300,000 dollars repaid by the commissioner of loans for Georgia)	8,909,178 22

33,686,323 18

During the fourth quarter of the year, the payments are estimated to amount to the following sums, viz:

For civil, diplomatic and miscellaneous expenses	500,000
Naval service	1,500,000
Public debt, to the 1st Jan. 1816, inclusive,	3,000,000
	5,000,000

38,686,323 18

As the receipts into the treasury during the year have been estimated at 48,849,613 01

The sum left in the treasury at the end of the year, will be 10,163,289 83

And will consist principally of treasury notes, paid on account of the revenue and loans.

Of the estimates of the public revenue and expenditures for 1816.

In the consideration of this subject it is proper to premise, that the revenue of 1816 must be charged with the payment of a considerable amount of the unliquidated debts incurred during the war; and, consequently, that the proportions of revenue and expenditure for that year, cannot be reduced by the scale of a peace establishment. The arrearages in the war and navy departments, and generally the outstanding balance of the floating public debt, including treasury notes and temporary loans, must be satisfied, before a permanent and uniform arrangement of the finances can be effected; but it is believed that the period of a single year will be sufficient for that purpose.

It is, also, proper to premise, that although the estimates of the demands on the treasury for 1816 may be satisfactorily made, there is no settled ground on which estimates of the ways and means can be confidently formed. The entire system of the external and internal taxation must necessarily be revised, during the present session of congress; and the sources as well as the product of the public revenue, can only be ascertained from the result of the legislative deliberations. In order, however, to obviate this difficulty, as far as it is practicable, distinct statement will be presented for 1816; 1st, of the probable demands on the treasury; 2ndly, of the revenue estimated according to laws now in force; and 3dly, of the revenue estimated according to the modifications, which will be respectively submitted.

1. Of the probable demands on the Treasury.

The amount of the civil, diplomatic and miscellaneous expenses is estimated at the sum of	1,800,000
The amount of the military expenses is estimated at the sum of	14,549,46
For the military establishment of 1816,	5,112,159
For the arrearages of 1815, beyond the amount of the appropriations	9,437,087

14,549,46
The amount of the naval expenses (supposing them to be reduced on the peace establishment to one-half of the amount appropriated for 1815, and adding the annual appropriation of 60,000 dollars for the purchase of timber) is estimated at the sum of 2,716,510

The amount of the payments required on account of the public debt is estimated at the sum of 23,818,513

For the interest and annual reimbursement of the principal of the funded debt prior to the war 3,460,000

For the interest on the funded debt created since the war, estimated on a capital of 70,000,000 of dollars 4,200,000

For the balance of principal and interest on treasury notes of every denomination, now due or payable in 1815 and 1816, or estimated to be paid in those years by being received for duties and taxes, as set forth in the annexed table, marked L. 15,458,518

For the amount of temporary loans, due to the state bank of Boston [300,000 dollars] and the Mechanics' bank of New York [200,000 dollars.] 700,000

23,818,513

42,884,669

From this aggregate of the demands for 1816, the charges of a temporary nature being deducted, to wit:

Deduct the amount of the arrearages for the military service of 1815 9,437,087

And the amount of floating debt to be liquidated in 1816 16,158,513

25,595,600

There will remain, as the probable annual expenditure of the peace establishment, independent of any addition to the sinking fund, the sum of 17,288,669

2. Of the revenue for 1816, estimated according to the laws now in force.

By the laws now in force, there venue arising from customs, during the year 1816, will be affected in the following manner: the present rates of duties continue until the 18th of February, 1816, when the duty on salt imported will cease, and the rates of duties on merchandise of every description, imported in American vessels, will fall to one half of the existing amount, with the exception of certain manufactured articles, being of the same kinds as the manufactured articles on which internal duties have been imposed; the duties on the imported articles continuing at the existing rates, so long as the existing internal duties shall be continued upon the corresponding articles of domestic manufacture.— On the 13th of February the extra duty on merchandise imported in foreign vessels, which is now $15\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on the amount of the duty in American vessels, will fall to 10 per cent. on that amount, and the tonnage duty on foreign vessels, which is now two dollars per ton, will fall to fifty cents per ton. The extra duty is also liable to be affected by the operation of the act for abolishing all discriminating duties upon a basis of national reciprocity. By the laws now in force, the revenue arising from internal duties will be affected in the following manner: The duties on bank notes, on notes discounted by banks, and bills of exchange, (commonly called the stamp duties,) and the duty on refined sugar, will cease on the 18th day of February, 1816. All the other internal duties, together with the direct tax and the increased rates of postage, will continue.

Under these circumstances, the revenue which will accrue to the United States during the year 1816, is estimated as follows:

From customs	13,000,000
Internal duties	7,000,000
Direct tax, net produce of the treasury,	5,500,000
Sales of public lands	1,000,000
Postage and incidental receipts	400,000
	27,000,000

The sums actually receivable into the treasury during the year, are estimated as follows:

From customs,	20,000,000
Internal duties,	6,500,000
Direct tax, including the arrears of 1815	8,500,000
Sales of public lands	1,000,000
Postage and incidental receipts	400,000

If to this be added the probable amount of money in the treasury at the commencement of the year 1816, which may be estimated, exclusively of treasury notes paid in previously to that time, on account of revenue and of loans, at the sum of

The effective ways and means of 1816 will produce, in the whole, the sum of	3,000,000
But as the demands upon the treasury for the same year will amount, as above stated, to	39,400,000
	42,884,269

There will be left a deficit, to be supplied by means other than the revenue of the sum of

	3,884,269
--	-----------

3. Of the revenue for 1816, estimated according to the modifications, which will be respectfully submitted.

From the review of the financial measures of the government, in reference to the recent state of war, which constitutes the first part of the present report, it appears that the almost entire failure of the customs, or duties on importations, and the increasing necessities of the treasury, rendered it necessary to seek for pecuniary supplies, in a system of internal duties; but both in respect of the subjects of taxation, and to the amount of the several taxes, the return of peace has always been contemplated as a period for revision and relief. In the fulfilment of that policy, a reduction of the direct tax, a discontinuance of taxes, which, upon trial, have proved unproductive, as well as inconvenient; and, above all, the exoneration of domestic manufactures from every charge that can obstruct or retard their progress, seem to be the objects that particularly invite the legislative intention. There will still remain, however, a sufficient scope for the operation of a permanent system of internal duties, upon those principles of national policy, which have already been respectfully suggested. As an equivalent for the diminution of the revenue by the contemplated abolition or reduction of some of the duties and taxes; and in observance of the public faith, which is pledged, in the case of such abolition or reduction, to provide and substitute other duties and taxes equally productive; it is intended respectfully to recommend a continuance of the duty on imported salt, and a competent addition to the permanent rates of the duties on merchandize imported. In the general tariff, which has been directed by a resolution of the house of representatives to be prepared, and which will be submitted to congress, as soon as materials for forming it can be digested and arranged, the subject will be more distinctly as well as more satisfactorily presented, but, as it is not probable, that this measure can be matured, so as to go into operation on the 18th of February next, it becomes necessary to suggest the expediency of continuing the present rates of duties until the 30th of June; when the new rates, with all the necessary details to give effect to that system, may be introduced, and sufficient notice be given to the merchants, to regulate their commercial operations accordingly.

In relation, then, to the internal duties, it is intended respectfully to recommend, that the duties imposed at the last session of congress on various articles manufactured within the United States shall be abolished on the 18th day of April next, which will complete the year commencing from the time the duties went into operation; that the duty imposed during the last session of congress on spirits distilled within the United States, shall be abolished on the 30th June next; but that at the same time there be added one hundred per cent. on the rate of the duty which had been charged on licenses to distillers of spirituous liquors in the year 1813; that the duty on household furniture, and on gold and silver watches, be abolished on the 31st day of March next; that the additional duty imposed during the last session of congress on licenses to retail wines, spirituous liquors and foreign merchandize, be abolished on the 31st day of December, 1816; and that the duties on refined sugar and stamp duties, be continued. And finally, in relation to the direct tax, it is intended respectfully to recommend, that on the 31st day of March next, it be reduced to one half its present amount, that is, to the annual the amount of three millions dollars.

The subtraction from the revenue by these charges and reductions in the direct tax and the internal duties, is estimated at the annual sum of 7,000,000 of dollars. But the substitute for supplying the equivalent amount, are estimated to produce; 1st, from the increase of the duty on licences to distillers and continuance of the stamp duties and duties on refined sugar, the annual sum of 1,500,000 dollars; 2d, from the continuance of the duty on imported salt, the annual sum of 500,000 dollars; and 3dly, from an increase upon the permanent rates of duties on the importation of foreign merchandise, the annual sum of 5,000,000 of dollars.

The full effect of the alterations which have been stated, will not be developed until some time after the year 1816; but if they be adopted, the state of the revenue for that year in the two views of which it is susceptible; 1st, of revenue accruing during the year; and 2d, of money receivable into the treasury during the year; may be estimated as follows:

1. The revenue which will accrue in 1816, may be estimated,

From customs	17,000,000
Internal duties	4,500,000
Direct tax—net product of the treasury,	2,700,000
Sales of public lands	1,000,000
Postage and incidental receipts	400,000
	25,000,000

2. The money which will be actually receivable in the treasury, from revenues, in 1815, may be estimated,

From customs	21,000,000
Internal duties	5,000,000
Direct tax, including arrears of 1815,	6,000,000
Sale of public lands	1,000,000
Postage and incidental receipts	400,000
	33,400,000

If to the sum, thus estimated to be receivable in the treasury from the revenue during the year 1816
There be added, the money which will probably be in the treasury at the beginning of the year

The aggregate will be the sum of	36,400,000
And the demands being estimated as above, at	42,834,269
There will be left a deficit of	6,434,269

It is here, however, to be recollected, that the estimate of the demands on the treasury comprehends the gross amount of the arrearages of the war department, and a provision for the whole of the floating public debt: and although for the purposes of a legislative appropriation, the aggregate of the expenditures to be authorized for the year 1816, is necessarily made the basis of the official estimates, yet the uniform experience of the treasury evinces, that the demands for a considerable portion of the annual appropriation will not be made during the year.

It may also be observed, that to raise a revenue by the imposition, or even by the continuance of taxes adequate to the immediate discharge of every unliquidated demand upon the treasury at the close of an expensive war, seems hardly to be necessary, under the present circumstances of the country. The product of the revenue arranged in the manner which has been stated, may be estimated, after the year 1816, at an annual amount of nearly four millions greater than the sum required for the interest on the public debt, and for the probable expenses of the peace establishment. If the public debt, therefore, were increased in the year 1816, by a sum equal to the whole amount of the deficit as above stated, an equivalent reduction could be effected in less than two years. The unexecuted authority to borrow money and issue treasury notes, already provided by the acts of congress, is sufficient to enable the treasury to meet the deficit in either of these modes, and, consequently, no further legislative aid, (except, perhaps, in the modification of the issues of treasury notes,) appears at this time to be required.

III. Propositions for the improvement and management of the revenue, and for the support of public credit.

The propositions which are now to be respectfully submitted, relate, 1st. to the revenue; 2d, to the sinking fund; and 3d, to the national circulating medium.

1. Propositions relating to revenue.

The changes contemplated in the revenue on the estimates of a peace establishment, having been already stated as the intended objects of recommendation, it is now only necessary to submit to the consideration of congress, the measures requiring their sanction for carrying the plan into effect.

First. It is respectfully proposed, that the act of the 1st July, 1812, imposing an additional duty of 100 per cent. upon the permanent duties on goods, wares and merchandise, imported into the United States from any foreign port or place, and the act of the 29th July, 1813, imposing a duty upon imported salt, be continued in force until the 30th day of June, 1816.

Second. It is respectfully proposed, that the act of the 24th of July, 1813, imposing a duty on sugar refined within the United States, and the act of the 2d of August, 1813, imposing a duty on bank notes, notes discounted, and bills of exchange, be continued by law, in force without limitation, but with proper amendments, to render the collection of the duties more equal and more certain: And that the act of the 15th of December, 1814, imposing duties on carriages and the harness therefor: and that so much of the act of the 23d of December, 1814, as relates to the duties on sales at auction, and to the increasing of the rates of postage, be allowed to remain in force.

Third. It is respectfully proposed, that there be a reduction or modification in the following taxes and duties:

1. That the direct tax be reduced from six millions to three millions of dollars, for the year '18 6, and for each succeeding year.
2. That the duties on distilled spirits be discontinued after the 30th day of June, 18 6; and that the duty on licenses to distillers be raised on that day, to double the amount fixed by the act of the 24th of July, 1813.
3. That the duties on licenses to retailers of wines, spirituous liquors, and foreign merchandize, be reduced to the rates of the year 1813, with proper regard to the periods when licenses commence and expire.

Fourth. It is respectfully proposed, that the act of the 18th of January, 1815, and the act of the 27th of February, 1815, imposing duties on various articles manufactured or made for sale within the United States, and the act of the 18th of January, 1815, imposing duties on household furniture and watches, be absolutely and entirely repealed.

Fifth. It is respectfully proposed, that the act of the 3d of March, 1815, further to provide for the collection of the duties on imposts and tonnage; and the act of the 3d of March, 1815, to fix the compensation and increase the responsibility of the collectors of the direct tax and internal duties, and for other purposes connected with the collection thereof; and as far as relates to the compensation of the collectors of the direct tax and internal duties, be continued in force without limitation.

2. Propositions relating to the sinking fund.

The sinking fund, as it is at present constituted, amounts to the annual sum of	8,000,000
It is charged in the first instance with the payment of the interest and the annual reimbursement of the principal of the old funded debt, which will require, for 1816 and each of the two ensuing years, the sum of	3,460,000
And it is charged with the payment of the interest and the eventual reimbursement of the principal of the new funded debt. The interest computed on a capital of 70,000,000 of dollars, will require for the year 1816, and each subsequent year, the sum of	4,200,000

The total present charge on the sinking fund, on account of the funded debt, being the annual sum of

7,660,000

In the year 1818 the fund will be released from the annual charge of 1,380,000 dollars, accruing upon the old six per cent. stock, as the stock will be then paid and extinguished; but in the same year it will be subject to a charge of 3,000,000 dollars, for the first instalment of the principal of the Louisiana stock, which will then become payable. In each of the two succeeding years a similar sum will be payable; and in the year 1821 such sum will be payable as may be necessary to complete the reimbursement of that stock, and which is estimated at 1,923,500.

The sinking fund is also, at present, charged with the payment of the principal and interest of the Treasury notes issued under the act of the 4th March, 1814, and prior acts; and of certain temporary loans obtained under the loan acts of 1812, and of subsequent years. The several acts charging these payments on the sinking fund have directed that such sums, in addition to the annual appropriation of $8,000,000, should be taken from any funds in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, as should be necessary to meet and satisfy the demands. The temporary loans and treasury notes will, therefore, probably be paid or absorbed in 1817; and it is deemed unnecessary for the present purpose, to include them in the consideration of the form and extent which it is proposed to give to the sinking fund in that year.

In 1803, when the sinking fund was established on its present footing, the principal of the public debt was about $86,000,000 of dollars, and the interest annually payable upon it, about $4,500,000 dollars. At that time there was assigned to the sinking fund out of the public revenue, $8,000,000 of dollars; of which about $3,500,000 dollars were annually applicable to the reduction of the principal of $86,000,000 of dollars. At the commencement of the year 1817, it is estimated that the principal of the funded debt will amount to $110,000,000 of dollars, requiring the sum of $6,150,000 dollars for the payment of its annual interest. If a sum applicable to the reduction of the principal of the debt, were now to be assigned, bearing the same proportion to that principal which the sum assigned in 1804 then bore to the principal, it would amount to about $4,350,000 dollars. When it is added, therefore, to the sum of $6,150,000 dollars which is necessary for the payment of the interest, there would be required for the amount now to be set apart to constitute the sinking fund, the sum of $10,500,000 dollars per annum. It is proposed, however, to carry the amount only to the sum of $10,000,000 of dollars, which will allow about $3,850,000 dollars as applicable to the reduction of the principal of the debt; a sum sufficient, if strictly and regularly applied without interruption, upon a compound principle, to pay off the whole of the funded debt in a period less than eighteen years.

Upon these grounds, then, the secretary of the treasury respectfully submits the following

PROPOSITION.

That in the year 1817, and annually in every subsequent year, there be appropriated the sum of $2,000,000 dollars in addition to the sum of $8,000,000 of dollars now annually appropriated for the payment of the interest and principal of the public debt; that the payment of this additional sum be made out of the proceeds of the revenue derived from the customs, the sales of public lands, and the internal duties, or from either of them; available after the payment of the sums for which they are now respectively pledged or appropriated; and that the said additional sum of $2,000,000 of dollars annually, be payable to the commissioners of the sinking fund, to be applied by them in the same manner as the monies which they are now entitled by law to receive; that is to say: 1st, To the payment of the interest on the public funded debt; 2d, To the reimbursement of the principal, from time to time, as the same, or any portion of it, shall become reimbursable, according to the terms of the contracts by which it has been created; 3dly, After having answered these purposes if there shall remain a surplus at their disposal, to the purchase of such parts of the funded public debt as shall appear to them to be most for the advantage of the United States, in the manner prescribed by law and at a rate not exceeding the par value.

3dly. Proposition relating to the national circulating Medium.

The delicacy of this subject is only equalled by its importance. In presenting it, therefore, to the consideration of congress, there is occasion for an implicit reliance upon the legislative indulgence.

By the constitution of the United States, congress is expressly vested with the power to coin money, to regulate the value of the domestic and foreign coins in circulation, and (as a necessary implication from positive provisions) to emit bills of credit; while it is declared by the same instrument, that "no state, shall coin money, or emit bills of credit." Under this constitutional authority, the money of the United States has been established by law, consisting of coins made with gold, silver, and copper. All foreign gold and silver coins at specified rates, were placed in the first instance, upon the same footing with the coins of the United States, but they ceased, (with the exception of Spanish milled dollars and parts of such dollars,) to be a legal tender for the payment of debts and demands in the year 1809.

The constitutional authority to emit bills of credit, has also been exercised in a qualified and limited manner. During the existence of the bank of the United States, the bills or notes of the corporation were declared, by law, to be receivable in all payments to the United States; and the treasury notes which have been since issued for the services of the late war, have been endowed with the same quality. But congress has never recognized by law the notes of any other corporation; nor has it ever authorised an issue of bills of credit to serve as a legal currency. The acceptance of the notes of banks which are not established by the federal authority, in payments to the United States, has been properly left to the vigilance and discretion of the executive department; while the circulation of the treasury notes employed either to borrow money or to discharge debts, depends entirely (as it ought to depend) upon the option of the lenders and creditors to receive them.

The constitutional and legal foundation of the monetary system of the United States is thus distinctly seen; and the power of the federal government to institute and regulate it, whether the circulating medium consists of coin or of bills of credit, must in its general policy, as well as the terms of its investment, be deemed an exclusive power. It is true that a system depending upon the agency of the precious metals, will be effected by the various circumstances which diminish their quantity or deteriorate their quality. The coin of a state sometimes vanishes under the influence of political alarms; sometimes in consequence of the explosion of mercantile speculations, and sometimes by the drain of an unfavorable course of trade. But whenever the emergency occurs that demands a change of system, it seems necessarily to follow, that the authority which was alone competent to establish the national coin, is alone competent to create a national substitute. It has happened, however, that the coin of the United States has ceased to be the circulating medium of exchange; and that no substitute has hitherto been provided by the national authority. During the last year the principal banks established south and west of New-England, resolved that they would no longer issue coin in payment of their notes, or of the drafts of their customers, for money received upon deposit. In this act the government of the United States had no participation; and yet the immediate effect of the act was to supersede the only legal currency of the nation.

By this act, although no state can constitutionally emit bills of credit, corporations erected by the several states have been enabled to circulate a paper medium subject to many of the practical inconveniences of the prohibited bills of credit.

It is not intended, upon this occasion, to condemn, generally, the suspension of specie payments; for appearances indicated an approaching crisis which would probably have imposed it as a measure of necessity, if it had not been adopted as a measure of precaution. But the danger which originally induced, and perhaps justified the conduct of the banks, has passed away, and the continuance of the suspensions of specie payments must be ascribed to a new series of causes. The public credit and resources are no longer impaired by the doubts and agitations excited during the war, by the practices of the enemy; or by the proceeds of an illicit commerce; yet the resumption of specie payments is still prevented, either by the reduced state of the national stock of the precious metals; or by the apprehension of a further reduction to meet the balances of a foreign trade; or by the redundant issues of bank paper. The probable direction and duration of the latter causes, constitute, therefore, the existing subject for deliberation. While they continue to operate singly or combined, the authority of the states individually, or the agents of the state institutions, cannot afford a remedy commensurate with the evil; and a recurrence to the national authority is indispensable for the restoration of a national currency.

In the selection of the means for the accomplishment of this important object, it may be asked—1st. Whether it be practicable to renew the circulation of gold and silver coins? 2dly. Whether the state banks can be successfully employed to furnish a uniform currency? 3dly. Whether a national bank can be employed more advantageously than the state banks for the same purpose? And 4thly. Whether the government can itself supply and maintain a paper medium of exchange, of permanent and uniform value, throughout the United States?

1st. As the United States do not possess mines of gold or silver, the supplies of these metals must, in a time of scarcity, be derived from foreign commerce. If the balance of foreign commerce be unfavorable, the supply will not be obtained incidentally, as in the case of the returns for a surplus of American exports, but must be the object of a direct purchase. The purchase of bullion is, however, a common operation of commerce, and depends like other operations, upon the inducements to import the article.

The inducements to import bullion arise, as in other cases, from its being cheap abroad, or from its being dear at home. Notwithstanding the commotions in South America, as well as in Europe, there is no reason to believe, that the quantity of the precious metals is now, more than at any former period, insufficient for the demand throughout the commercial and civilized world. The price may be higher in some countries than in others; and it may be different in the same country at different times; but generally, the European stock of gold and silver has been abundant, even during the protracted war which has afflicted the nations of Europe.

The purchase of bullion, in foreign markets, upon reasonable terms, is then deemed practicable; nor can its importation into the United States fail eventually to be profitable. The actual price of gold and silver in the American market would in itself afford for some time an ample premium; although the fall in the price must of course be proportionate to the increase of the quantity. But it is within the scope of a wise policy to create additional demands for coin, and in that way to multiply the inducements to import and retain the metals of which it is composed. For instance, the excessive issue of bank paper has usurped the place of the national money; and under such circumstances gold and silver will always be treated as an article of merchandise; but it is hoped that the issue of bank paper will soon be reduced to its just share in the circulating medium of the country; and consequently that the coin of the United States will resume its legitimate capacity and character. Again, the treasury, yielding from necessity to the general impulse, has hitherto consented to receive bank paper in payment of duties and taxes; but the period approaches when it will probably become a duty to exact the payment either in treasury notes, or in gold or silver coin of the United States. Again; the institutions which shall be deemed proper in order to remove existing inconveniences, and to restore the national currency, may be so organized as to engage the interests and enterprise of individuals in providing the means to establish them. And finally, such regulations may be imposed upon the exportation of gold and silver, as will serve in future to fix and retain the quantity required for domestic use.

But it is further believed, that the national stock of the precious metals is not so reduced as to render the operation of reestablishing their agency in the national currency either difficult or impracticable. The quantity actually possessed by the country is considerable; and the restoration of public confidence in bank paper, or in other substitutes for coin, seems alone to be wanting to render it equal to the accustomed contribution for a circulating medium. In other countries, as well as in the United States, the effect of an excessive issue of paper money to banish the precious metals has been seen, and under circumstances much more disadvantageous than the present; the effect of public confidence in national institutions, to recall the precious metals to their uses in exchange, has also been experienced. Even, however, if it were practicable, it has sometimes been questioned, whether it would be politic again to employ gold and silver for the purpose of a national currency. It was long and universally supposed, that to maintain a paper medium without depreciation, the certainty of being able to convert it into coin was indispensable; nor can the experience which has given rise to a contrary doctrine be deemed complete, or conclusive. But what ever may be the issue of that experiment elsewhere, a difference in the structure of the government, in the physical as well as the political situation of the country, and in the various departments of industry, seems to deprive it of any important influence as a precedent for the imitation of the United States.

In offering these general remarks to the consideration of congress, it is not intended to convey an opinion that the circulation of the gold and silver coins can at once be renewed. Upon motives of public convenience, the gradual attainment of that object is alone contemplated; but a strong though respectful solicitude is felt, that the measures adopted by the legislature should invariably tend to its attainment.

2d. Of the services rendered to the government by some of the state banks during the late war; and of the liberality by which some of them are actuated in their intercourse with the treasury; justice requires an explicit acknowledgment. It is a fact, however, incontestably proved, that those institutions cannot at this time be successfully employed to furnish a uniform national currency. The failure of one attempt to associate them with that view, has already been stated. Another attempt, by their agency in circulating treasury notes, to overcome the inequalities of the exchange, has only been partially successful. And a plan recently proposed, with the design to curtail the issue of bank notes, to fix the public confidence in the administration of the affairs of the banks, and to give each bank a legitimate share in the circulation, is not likely to receive the sanction of the banks. The truth is, that the charter restrictions of some of the banks; the mutual relation and dependence of the banks of the same state, and even of the banks of different states; and the duty which the directors of each bank conceive that they owe to their immediate constituents upon points of security or emolument; interpose an insuperable obstacle to any voluntary arrangement, upon national considerations alone, for the establishment of a national medium through the agency of the state banks. It is, nevertheless, with the state banks that the measures for restoring the national currency of gold and silver must originate; for until their issues of paper be reduced; their specie capitals be reinstated; and their specie operations be commenced; there will be neither room, nor employment, nor safety, for the introduction of the precious metals. The policy and interest of the state banks must therefore be engaged in the great fiscal work, by all the means which the treasury can employ, or the legislative wisdom shall provide.

3d. The establishment of a National Bank is regarded as the best and perhaps the only adequate resource to relieve the country and the government from the present embarrassments. Authorized to issue notes which will be received in all payments to the United States, the circulation of its issues will be co-extensive with the union; and there will exist a constant demand, bearing a just proportion to the annual amount of the duties and taxes to be collected, independent of the general circulation for commercial and social purposes. A national bank will therefore possess the means and the opportunity of supplying a circulating medium of equal use and value in every state, and in every district of every state. Established by the authority of the government of the United States; accredited by the government to the whole amount of its notes in circulation; and entrusted as the depository of the government with all the accumulations of the public treasure; the national bank independent of its immediate capital, will enjoy every recommendation which can merit and secure the confidence of the public. Organized upon principles of responsibility, but of independence, the national bank will be retained within its legitimate sphere of action without just apprehension from the miscolours of its directors, or from the encroachments of the government. Eminent in its resources, and in its example, the national bank will conciliate, aid, and lead, the state banks in all that is necessary for the restoration of credit, public and private. And, acting upon a compound capital, partly of stock and partly of gold and silver, the national bank will be the ready instrument to enhance the value of the public securities and to restore the currency of the national coin.

4. The powers of the government to supply and maintain a paper medium of exchange will not be questioned; but for the introduction of that medium there must be an adequate motive. The sole motive for issuing treasury notes has hitherto been to raise money in anticipation of the revenue. The revenue, however, will probably become in the course of the year 1816, and continue afterwards sufficient to discharge all the debts and to defray all the expenses of the government, and consequently there will exist no motive to issue the paper of the government as an instrument of credit.

It will not be deemed an adequate object for an issue of the paper of the government, merely that it may be exchanged for the paper of the banks, since the treasury will be abundantly supplied with bank paper by the collection of the revenue, and the government cannot be expected to render itself a general debtor, in order to become the special creditor of the state banks.

The co-operation of the government with the national bank, in the introduction of a national currency may, however, be advantageously employed by the issues of treasury notes as long as they shall be required for the public service.

Upon the whole, the state of the national currency and other important considerations connected with the operations of the treasury, render it a duty respectfully to propose,

That a national bank be established at the city of Philadelphia; having power to erect branches elsewhere; and that the capital of the bank, being of a competent amount, consist of three-fourths of the public stock, and one-fourth of gold and silver.

All which is respectfully submitted,

A. J. DALLAS, Secretary of the treasury.
Treasury Department, 6th December, 1815.

$15,458,512 94

NOTE. These documents occupy fourteen whole sheets of paper in the official copy—fully one half which is inserted in detail, word for word and figure for figure, together with what we consider sufficient abstracts of the other half, for every common purpose, in three and a half pages of the REGISTER! It cost a good deal of trouble to do this, but it is a grand object with us to save room.

Winter. Yesterday, says a Quebec paper October 31, our cabriolets began to run, such is the quantity of snow that has fallen. This morning the thermometer was 12 below the freezing point.—This cold fixes the snow for the present; and this is the month of October.

ASSESSMENT UNDER THE DIRECT TAX LAW.

The aggregate amount of property in Alexandria county, and that part of Washington county, south-east of the Eastern Branch, is $3,277,794

In Georgetown, and that part of the county of Washington, west of Rock creek 2,325,875

In Washington city, and that part of the county west of the Eastern Branch and east of Rock creek 3,490,488

9,094,157

Rate of the direct tax, twenty-two and a half cents on every hundred dollars value of lands and slaves; or less than one-fourth of one per cent.

It is very obvious to those acquainted with the value of property on this side the Potomac, and probably on the other, that the valuation is very moderate, the actual value of property being generally much above the assessment.

VIRGINIA. The valuation of lands and slaves in Virginia, under the law laying a direct tax, is $263,584,600. The tax amounts to 28 cents for every hundred dollars value, or rather more than a quarter of one per cent.

☞We hope that some gentleman in Virginia may favor the public with a detailed statement of this assessment. Such things add greatly to the stock of useful information; and, collected to a focus, are exceedingly important as well as interesting.

Kentucky Statistics.

Frankfort, November 24.

The president of the board of principal assessors (who have been engaged in apportioning the direct tax for some days past) has politely furnished us with the following list of the valuation of property and apportionment of tax in each county, from which every man who knows the valuation of his property can at once ascertain how much tax he will have to pay.

BOARD OF PRINCIPAL ASSESSORS.

Frankfort, November 21st 1815.

STATEMENT of the valuations of lands, lots with their improvements, dwelling houses and slaves within the several counties of the state of Kentucky, as revised and settled by the board of principal assessors, and the amount of the quota of each.

We certify that the rate of assessment directed by the board of principal assessors, to be taken for raising the quota of the state of Kentucky, of the direct tax for the year 1815, imposed by the act of congress of the 9th Jan. 1815, is thirty-nine cents on the hundred dollars of the value of the property subject to the direct tax within the said state.

TREASURY OFFICE, Dec. 11th, 1815.

SIR—I have the honor of laying before the general assembly, a report of the accounts of the treasury office, for the year ending the 30th September last, in conformity to the act entitled, "An act, changing the fiscal year of this commonwealth, and for other purposes," passed the 12th of February, 1814.

The document marked (A) is an account of money received at the treasury, from the 1st of October 1814, to the 30th day of September, 1815, inclusive—the time when received, and on what account; arranged under the different heads of revenue.

That marked (B) exhibits an account of the disbursements within the same period—the month when disbursed, and on what account, agreeably to the law appropriating the public revenue.

And that marked (C.) is a general account of receipts and disbursements, predicated on the two foregoing accounts, which shews a balance of ninety-six thousand one hundred and thirty-one dollars and ninety six cents, in the treasury, on the 30th day of September last.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

JOHN PRESTON, Treasurer.

The hon. the Speaker of the house of delegates.

DOCUMENT—(C.)

The public Treasury, between the 1st day of October, 1814, and the 30th day of September, 1815, inclusive—

To balance against the treasury, on 30th day of September, 1814, as per report of the committee, appointed to examine the treasurer's accounts $140,353 02

Deferred Articles.

London, Oct. 5.—On Monday evening Mr. Palmer arrived here from Paris, followed by 663 enormous bales, containing all the effects of Bonaparte, which he had acquired. Among them is his carriage of ceremony, which surpasses any thing of the kind we have ever seen in this country.

October 21.—The Exchange on Paris is 24, which is at par.—This has not been the case before or since the revolution; gold bullion is also lower; a guinea is precisely worth 21s. according to the price of gold.

September 30.—The whole of the Tripolitan armed ships are now at sea, to the number of nine, including a corvette of 16 guns, which is said to have passed the Straits of Gibraltar. The greater part of these cruisers are luteen rigged, resembling the Genocse schebecs.

Re-li-g-i-ous. In the remonstrance of the Belgian (Catholic) bishops, to the king of the Netherlands, dated July 28th, we perceive the very unchristian protest, which follows, against the proclamation of July 13, declaring equality of religious rights:

"Already the proclamation of your majesty, which announced that the new constitution should insure the liberty of religions, and give all equal favor and protection, filled every heart with consternation. It is known that this dangerous system is one of the main articles of the modern philosophy, which has been the source of so many misfortunes to us; that evidently aims at exciting indifference to all religions; at lessening their influence from day to day, and at destroying them in the end entirely.

Missionary to Ceylon! "The right reverend Dr. McKeny, (says the Westmeath Journal) formerly porter to Mr. Keene of Dublin, has had great success on the mission in Ceylon; it is supposed, with the assistance of our brethren in arms, many of the inhabitants of that country will be converted."

The curse of "legitimacy." A horrible war has been carrying on in France, by the Catholics against the protestants, and tens of thousands of the latter, men, women, and children, have been massacred. The Austrians have interfered to prevent their extermination. The religious legitimates actually roasted a young girl alive at Nismes! O God! that such things should be done in the name of the Saviour!—Who can weep when such villains are swept from the face of the earth? Nothing of this kind happened under Napoleon—his mighty genius stilled even the rage of the priesthood.

"Perish the invaders!" The following is from a late London paper. A general rising of the East India "patriots" would, indeed, be "a consummation devoutly to be wished." May God give them union and strength to expel the murderous foreigners that despoil their beautiful country!

"The statement in our private communications, respecting the unpleasant results of the war against Napaul, are confirmed by the following extract of a letter from Madeira, March 12, 1815:—

"The despatches by the last and present fleets are perhaps of a more alarming character than any that have been received in Leadenhall street for the last twenty years. In Bengal our armies have not only been repeatedly defeated, but obliged to act on the defensive; and the moral effects of this are never to be removed from the minds of the natives. The war against the brave and hardy highlanders of Napaul, has been undoubtedly commenced under an ignorance of their character and resources, and it has in consequence been conducted with inadequate means. The times are miserably changed, when (as is the fact at this moment,) our troops are forming entrenched camps, within the company's ancient possessions—indeed I fear to repeat the alarming reports which the post of each day brings us. On this side of India, we are on the eve of a Muhretta war, the certain consequence of a failure in Napaul. Sir T. Hislop has taken the field, and is organizing an army of 30,000 men!—The government paper is at a heavy discount.—This is an unfavorable view of our situation, but unfortunately it is too true a one."

Mrs. Clarke, having settled with her creditors, as reported, appeared at Margate, seated in a new and remarkably light and elegant barouch landau, drawn by four bay blood horses; in the vehicle were her two daughters, dressed in all the paraphernalia of modern fashion; out riders in elegant liveries completed the set out. [This lady was reported to be dead.]

Paris, August 22.—The print shops every where expose for sale, an elegant copper-plate likeness of Labadoyere.

September 14.—The Spanish troops under the command of count Abisbal, which had advanced to the walls of Bayonne, have now re-crossed the Bidassoa, and gone back to Spain. This retrograde march has taken place in consequence of a convention made at Perpignan between the duke of Angoulême and the commander of the Spanish army, by which the former has bound France to pay thirty millions to Spain.

Extract from a letter of the French minister of finance to the prefect of the department of Lower Seine.—

"It is of extreme importance that the collection of the extraordinary levy of 100 millions should be completed by the precise time, and even by anticipation; inasmuch as, if the royal treasury should be deprived of this resource, it would be painful to think of the lamentable consequences that must follow. The king therefore (says the minister) expects this sacrifice from the persons under your government. demands it in order to preserve them from greater evils, and their interest ought to prompt them to compliance. They will hasten, therefore, I doubt not, to discharge a debt so sacred, and they will not reduce you to employ rigorous measures, even to the extent of causing to be seized and sold, an extremity extremely painful, but which must, if necessary, be resorted to, so pressing are the circumstances, so important are the wants of the royal treasury."

TRIPOLI, AUGUST 31, 1815.

Stephen Cathalan, Esq. Consul of the United States of America at Marseilles.

SIR—On the 6th instant, commodore Decatur appeared off Tripoli, with a squadron of five sail, and after three days negotiation, we concluded all differences with this regency, by making the bashaw pay 25,000 dollars, the full value of the prizes of the Abellino, that were taken in this port by the English brig Paulina, and obtaining the release of ten slaves; as a remuneration for the detention of the privateer, in this port, by the English brig, after I had demanded twenty-four hours' start of her.

The American colors were again hoisted on the 9th inst. on the consular house, and saluted with twenty-one guns by the bashaw, while a full band of music played the President's March and Yankee Doodle. We have thus obtained ample satisfaction and the bashaw has been punished for his want of energy and firmness in supporting his neutral rights, and protecting a friendly power who sought protection in his port.

Commodore Bainbridge appeared off Tripoli on the 26th, with a squadron of four sail, but hearing from me of recent disturbances at Tunis, immediately sailed for that place. He has more than twenty sail under his command in the Mediterranean, half of which will continue here, to keep the barbarians in awe, and protect our commerce.

At Tunis we compelled them to pay to the concern of captain Wyer, 46,000, dollars for the two prizes taken from them.

With sentiments of regard, &c.

(Signed)

RICH'D. B. JONES.

Count Rumford.—The late count Rumford, though he had been for many years absent from his native country, and received distinguished honors in the service of foreign powers, always recollected the land of his birth with affection. A very strong proof of this he has given in his last will, a copy of which was brought out to this country by Mr. Wm. Crawford, late ambassador in France. By this will, count Rumford has made a donation to the Cambridge university, of immediate incomes and reversions, the capital of which it has been supposed may amount to between thirty and forty thousand dollars. The corporation are taking steps to secure these bequests. The object of this gift, as stated in the will, "is to found a professorship, to teach by a regular course of lectures, the utility of the mathematical and physical sciences, for the melioration of the useful arts, and for the extension of the industry, the prosperity and happiness of society."

Sentence of Death (says a New York paper) was this morning pronounced, in the court of oyer and terminer, at the city-hall, upon Thomas Burk, for the murder of his wife, and Ishmael Frazer and Jacob Vanderpool, two mulatto fellows, for felony and arson, in setting fire to an inhabited building at the corner of Washington and Liberty-streets in August last.

The awful judgment of the court was pronounced by his honor judge Platt, and accompanied by a solemn and impressive elucidation of the enormity of their crimes and admonition to the unhappy felons to prepare for their fate, and their higher and final sentence in the world to come. Their execution is fixed for the third Friday, the 19th January next. A large concourse of citizens, crowded the court-room and avenues on this unusual occasion.

British army bills.—We have every few days some new report about British army bills being counterfeited. Why do the British make such an outcry about this? Agreeably to British laws, any man in the United States may make as many of these bills as he pleases—they are not the current money of this country, and, therefore, all persons are at liberty to manufacture them!!—Such is British morality! The British government are the grandest counterfeiters in the world. Stephen Burrows was a fool to the least of them. Witness the ship-loads of "continental money" and French assignats; and more recently the open forgeries of American shipping papers. But our laws are different, and the forgery of any thing with a view to fraud, is liable to punishment.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

No. 17 of VOL. IX.] BALTIMORE, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 23, 1815. [WHOLE NO. 225.

Hæc olim meminisse juvabit.—VIRGIL.

PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, No. 29, SOUTH CALVERT-STREET, AT $5 PER ANNUM.

Those gentlemen who file the WEEKLY REGISTER, will please to observe that there is a lapse of eight folios between this number and the last.—The design was to have published a supplement with the present number, to get in, in regular succession, the important and useful tables attached to the report of the secretary of the treasury—but the sudden frost having frozen up a vessel in the Elk river that was to have brought on a supply of paper, whereby the last number was kept from the press until Tuesday morning, instead of issuing at its usual time, rendered it impossible, with any sort of convenience or propriety, to come up to the plan. But the proposed supplement will appear next week, so pagéd as to immediately follow the report and precede the present number.

The friends of the navy will find much in this number to interest them. The list of the late appointments in our gallant little army, and some other articles belonging to its establishment, will probably appear in our next. Several essays, &c. in manuscript, and a multitude of articles in print, are lying over.

It is with sincere regret that the editor gives an opinion that a supplement of twelve sheets, to cost one dollar, will be necessary for the present, or 9th volume of the REGISTER. The work gets in a vast quantity of matter,* but the body of documents and facts that late events at home and abroad have originated, is beyond all precedent, and such busy times may never occur again. It is with regret he gives this opinion, for the profits realized on such supplements to the 5th, 7th and 8th volumes, have been too small to indemnify the labor and expence they cost. However, there is another object besides that of making a living for his family, that almost as powerfully influences the proprietor of this work; which is, to furnish a mass of matter so great and so various as to suit every taste, and meet every research for important papers and facts, foreign and domestic; to accomplish this, he would freely make considerable sacrifices of time and money. The WEEKLY REGISTER is his "hobby," and whatever adds to its value, adds to his happiness. This will be believed when the truth is stated, that, independent of the additional labor he has imposed upon himself in the last four years by the publication of gratuitous supplements, that these supplements have cost him in cash, not less than $2,200. And they would have been more numerous, if the want of means has not always been in violent hostility with the will to give them. If it should be resolved to publish this heavy supplement (which it is sincerely hoped will be the last of the kind that may be required) due notice shall be given of it. It is expected, among other things, to contain the laws passed at the present session of congress.

*The copy of the report of the secretary of the treasury cost the editor one dollar. The same matter will cost the patrons of this paper less than ten cents.

Letter from Buenos-Ayres.

Buenos-Ayres, 26th Sept. 1815.

"To H. NILES,

SIR—You will be surprised at being addressed by a stranger to you, from this place; but a few numbers of your very interesting REGISTER having reached this city, their contents have justly excited my curiosity for the subsequent publications. Moreover, I perceive with pleasure, yet mingled with no small regret, that you are the only American editor who has deemed the important changes operating in this country worthy a marked attention. Surely, the fate of so many millions endeavoring to escape the tyranny of so bigotted a monarch as Ferdinand, cannot be indifferent to the citizens of the United States, who reflect on what they were and duly esteem the rank they now fill in the world as a nation. Surely, they cannot long remain passive observers of the efforts made by this hitherto terribly oppressed population, to obtain liberty and independence. Surely, they must sympathise with us in all our exertions for freedom. Please to send," &c.

Your obedient servant,

Accompanying this letter was a file of the Buenos-Ayres Gazette down to the 26th of September. But it contained nothing important or interesting, further than is noticed in the "Chronicle."

Some general remarks on the preceding, are necessarily deferred. An essay on the affairs of Mexico and South America, of considerable length, has long been nearly prepared for the press, and shall be introduced on some other suitable opportunity, when we are less pressed for room. The editor, however, feels it an act of justice to decline the compliment that he is the "only" one interested in the fate of his republican brethren of South America. There are several who regard their struggles with deepest solicitude—and thousands of our citizens who regret that the world is so circumstanced at present, as to make it imprudent and improper for us to give that open and honest aid, which political feeling and commercial interest so powerfully plead for. If we had only to do with Spain—if the state of society was settled—why, we might do things ten thousand times more important to the United States, than all that we said about the "Spanish patriots, &c." opposing Bonaparte and allied to England, to put a thing like Ferdinand upon the throne, and unite with his crimes the infernalisms of the "Holy Inquisition."

Letter from England.

The following plain and simple letter from a weaver resident at Bolton, in England, has been handed to me for my perusal. But it so pointedly shews the situation of that country, that I have thought it might serve a useful purpose to publish it. It appears to be an unsophisticated story of a poor, but honest man; and shews a vigor of intellect highly honorable to the writer. Except in the correction of the orthography and punctuation, I give it as it is in the original before me.

BOLTON, SEPT. 14, 1815.

"Dear Friend—I make bold to address you, hoping you and your family are well, as I am at present, thank God for the blessing, as health is the only comfort we can expect in the present circumstances of Old England. Indeed, peace seems to be the death-blow to our manufactures. While the war seemed most destructive, 600 reeds were at 28s. at present they are at 13s. Fancy work is very dull. I believe a man out of work would find it difficult, if not impossible, to procure any at this time. The prospect at present is that we shall have a worse winter than ever. One cause is our execrable corn laws. We are told that there would have been a greater sale of our manufactures to America if their flour and rice were admitted. It is reported that many thousand barrels are spoiling in the warehouses at Liverpool. Another cause is the failure of some great houses in London—the cotton manufacturers are much involved with them. All parties think trade is entirely run out, and we are alarmed at the consequences. Had you been at Bolton when the decrees of Bonaparte and the American embargo were in force, you might have seen numbers of respectable householders who were enrolled with the paupers, waiting daily from morning till long after sun-set for weeks together [for a pittance of food.] It is impossible to describe the shifts and distresses of the overseers [of the poor] and the unhappy applicants at that period. Still there was hope that a turn in the fortune of war, a change of the ministry, or, at least, that peace would some time arrive and put an end to our misery, and trade and commerce flourish. Alas! how are we disappointed—our manufactures cannot flourish without war!—We cannot trade with foreign nations in equal terms through the peace. In short, it is thought government cannot exist two years in peace. War is essential to the funding system—our debt is eleven hundred millions, and the interest cannot be paid without war. Dear friend, the prospect for the industrious artisan or manufacturer is dismal. I shall be obliged to you if you will inform me of the state of the country, particularly with regard to manufactures, &c.

Our press is under restriction. Give no account of the battle of Baltimore. NILES' REGISTER is much read when it finds its way. You could send on a parcel to be sent by the coach, &c. should an acquaintance come to Liverpool, &c.

To Mr. _____, Baltimore.

In the preceding the reader will observe a confirmation of many facts that have been enforced in this paper, especially in regard to the situation of England on a peace establishment, as stated in the editor's letter to Mr. Cobbett.

By the President of the United States of America.
A PROCLAMATION.

WHEREAS, it has been represented, that many uninformed or evil disposed persons have taken possession of, or made a settlement on the public lands of the United States, which have not been previously sold, ceded, or leased by the United States, or the claim to which lands, by such persons, has not been previously recognized and confirmed by the United States; which possession or settlement is, by the act of Congress passed on the third day of March, one thousand eight hundred and seven, expressly prohibited; and whereas the due execution of the said act of Congress, as well as the general interest, require that such illegal practices should be promptly repressed:

Now, THEREFORE, I, JAMES MADISON, President of the United States, have thought proper to issue my proclamation, commanding and strictly enjoining all persons who have unlawfully taken possession of, or made any settlement on the public lands as aforesaid, forthwith to remove therefrom: and I do hereby further command and enjoin the marshal, or officer acting as marshal, in any state or territory where such possession shall have been taken, or settlement made, to remove, from and after the tenth day of March, one thousand eight hundred and sixteen, all or any of the said unlawful occupants; and to effect the said service, I do hereby authorise the employment of such military force as may become necessary, in pursuance of the provisions of the act of Congress aforesaid, warning the offenders, moreover, that they will be prosecuted in all such other ways as the law directs.

In testimony whereof, I have caused the seal of the United States of America to be affixed to these presents, and signed the same with my hand. Done at the City of (L. S.) Washington the twelfth day of December, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fifteen, and of the Independence of the said United States of America, the fortieth.

JAMES MADISON.

By the President,

JAMES MONROE, Secretary of State.

Naval Report.

Report of the Secretary of the navy to the Senate relative to the gradual and permanent increase of the navy

The importance of a permanent naval establishment appears to be sanctioned by the voice of the nation; and, I have a satisfaction in stating that the means of its gradual increase are completely within the reach of our national resources, independently of any foreign country. The materials for building and equipping ships of war are all at command. Steps have been taken to ascertain the best growth and quantities of timber for naval construction, preparatory to contracts and purchases. The want of a mould loft for the naval constructor, to lay out the moulds by which the timber is to be cut and shaped, previously to transportation, has delayed the completion of arrangements for an adequate supply. A building has been erected at the navy yard in this city, for that purpose, and will soon be finished, when the business will progress.

Cannon foundries, manufactories of sheet copper, cordage, canvas, and the mechanical branches, are in a state to furnish the several supplies which may be required.

The commerce of the United States, increasing with the resources and population of the country, will require a commensurate protection, which a navy alone can afford; and the experience derived from the active and vigorous employment of a limited navy, during the period of the late war, has demonstrated its efficient utility.

I do, therefore, with confidence, recommend an annual increase of our navy, of one ship of the rate of 74 guns; two frigates of the first class, rated at 44 guns; and two sloops of war, which can be built with the surplusage of smaller timber, and with a great saving in that material.

The act to increase the navy, passed January 24, 1813, authorized the building of "four ships, to rate not less than 74 guns; and six frigates, to rate 44 guns, each." This act has been partly carried into effect, by building three ships of the rate of 74 guns, and three frigates of 44 guns, in the Atlantic ports;

the residue of the appropriation, under that act, was applied to the building of large ships and frigates upon lake Ontario.

The concentration of our navy in one or two of the principal ports of the United States, where the depth of water is sufficient for the convenient ingress and egress of the larger vessels, will necessarily lead to the enlargement of the navy yards at such places, with docks for repairs and the collection of all important materials, for the armament and equipments of the different classes of vessels, in order to bring them into active service, upon any emergency, with the advantage of combined force.

A general system for the gradual and permanent increase of the navy, combining all the various objects connected with an enlarged naval establishment, such as building docks, and extending the accommodations of navy yards and arsenals of general deposit, will from the subject of a more extensive report, to be laid before congress during the present session.

The Navy.

Three essays, over the signature of a "Navy Advocate," were addressed to the editors, and have appeared in the New-York Columbian. As they particularly apply to subjects which have been discussed in the Register, the author has corrected them, and requested their insertion by us.

Gentlemen—Some late letters published in Niles' Weekly Register, upon the subject of a navy, and headed "from a naval officer," derive so much importance from the general interest taken in that portion of our national strength, that I am led to request the favor of a few columns in your paper, in reply to some observations of the writer. I would premise however, that I do not wish to be considered as desirous to provoke controversy. My aim is, to obtain a thorough enquiry, and by putting facts against theory, and experience against speculation, give to the subject a liberal examination.

In letter 1st, we have the writer's ideas as to the powers of the board and their collision with the duties of the secretary. But when, in his remarks, he lays claim to an independence from the control of the secretary, he runs into an error in the face of the law. The first section of the act of congress expressly attaches the board to the office of the secretary, and gives him a superintendence over it, and it is under such superintendence only, that the board can discharge the ministerial duties of their office. If there be, then, any meaning at all in this expression, in its lowest sense it must be, that the board is an appendage to the office of the secretary, and that all its acts must pass his revision. For what does the term superintendence mean? Is it that the board should barely tell the secretary what they have done or what they intend to do?—or, that they should merely put their official letters into his hands to look at? No such thing. Its plain meaning is—control—a power of approving or rejecting. But the language of the law is stronger still, and more explicit in sec. 2, which declares that the rules and regulations to be formed by the board can only be adopted "by and with the consent of the secretary." If he does not approve of them, they are not rules. I cannot well conceive how terms stronger than these, could have been used to show that the board is subordinate to the secretary, and if, indeed, a different construction has obtained, it is most undeniably contrary to the plain letter of the act as it now stands.

I agree with the "Naval officer" however, that such an act ought never to have been passed. It had its origin, I conceive, in the report made last session, which recommended to congress to retain the secretary's office, under whose management our navy had acquired such distinction. But the view presented in that report was a very imperfect one. The individual bravery of our officers and men shone with great brilliancy, no doubt; but, what has that to do with the secretary's management of the whole department? If Decatur took the Macedonian, and Jones the Frolick; if Porter defended himself with a bravery never surpassed; if Perry and Macdonough annihilated the enemy on the lakes; are these reasons why the secretary's office is indispensable to the good management of the navy? Let us look further. I ask in my turn, what improvements that office has ever yet made in our ships of war, in equipping them, in fitting them with dispatch for sea, in making regulations, ensuring economy in purchases and expenditures, in enjoining an accountability for stores, and above all, in establishing dockyards upon an efficient system? I ask where is the dockyard ordered to be built? where the other 74 and four frigates authorised by acts of congress? Where the collections of timber for which repeated appropriations have been made? Where the asylum for disabled and decrepid navy officers, seamen and marines? How is it, that our vessels remain for months in port from inability to repair and refit them with dispatch? These questions are in the nature of facts which cannot be controverted by any ingenuity whatever, and I think the conclusion from them is plain—that the secretary's office ever since its establishment in April, 1798, never has possessed the information necessary to conduct with judgment the affairs of the navy. Indeed, if any further proof of this were necessary, it may be drawn from the act itself establishing the navy board, which is plainly an attempt to bring into public service, in aid of the secretary's knowledge, all that could be drawn from the experience of professional men likewise. In expressing this opinion, and presenting these facts, I disclaim utterly any view to disparage the abilities of any of the gentlemen who have been at the head of the department. The error has been in continuing the secretary's office as proper for the management of the navy on its present extent, because it was sufficient at its commencement; and not discerning, that when new modelled, the system should have been adapted to its existing state and future increase.

It will be seen, then, that I disagree with "the naval officer" in his construction of the powers of the board of commissioners, but that I agree with him in the opinion, that the secretary's office is unnecessary. Nothing further need be said to that point than what he has himself exposed well to the public. But, as he seems to be apprehensive that this office may be continued with the same powers it now holds, he appears willing to compromise in the 4th paragraph of his 1st letter, by "taking to the board the performance of ministerial duties expressly designated by the act, and abandoning to the secretary those stated in a general way, or derived by inference." To this suggestion I will, however, remark, that in such case there will exist imperium in imperio, and that a designation of duties admitted by one secretary, will not bind his successor, if he please to construe the law differently. Nor is it possible that any act to be passed upon the subject, can draw the line, by which duties branching out into what might almost be called infinity from the nature of the service, and respecting which in the progress of the establishment, new explanations would daily be necessary, can be apportioned to two such departments independent and distinct. It is an easy matter, I know, to say on paper, that thus and thus shall the duties be apportioned; and the president of the U. States himself may sanction such an arrangement, described under a few general heads; notwithstanding, the details of business to be comprehended under such an arrangement, must be nearly as undefined as ever. For, suppose the board have the power to make all contracts for supplies, and give all orders for repairs, will this give them a right to expend the money voted for the navy, when the secretary only is accountable for it to congress? If the board have the power to order certain stores to be sold, will they direct under what appropriation the money received therefor is to be expended? Shall the board have the power to fix the establishments of officers and men for the dock yards? If so, who shall fix the salaries? Who shall give orders relating to the marine corps? Who give direction for remittances of money at home or abroad? A very cursory view of this part of the subject must shew to any one, that one department must finally merge in the other.

Difficulties thus originating from a vain attempt to make two departments act together, when it is in the nature of impossibility to define their duties, or the details of business arising out of them, will be continually recurring. The only mode by which, in my judgment, they can be avoided, is, by abolishing the office of secretary, devolving its duties upon the navy board, and adding another member to it as its president, to be designated as such by the president of the United States, who should take his seat in the cabinet, and who should sign all orders, commissions and warrants, as the secretary now does. Unless some plan like this be adopted, it is difficult to see, how present embarrassments or increasing collision can be prevented. Even if a possibility of this nature exist, it is at once a sufficient reason to change the present system; otherwise, in a moment of danger, of pressure, or of necessity for the most vigorous exertion, every effort at the board may be paralyzed at the will of the secretary, who may withhold the necessary funds, or judge the measures adopted inexpedient, or refuse altogether his consent to regulations proposed. How does all this comport with expediency? Certainly not at all. For if there are axioms in military science, some of them are—that the power to issue orders should belong to one superior only;—that whoever has the right to give orders, should have the means to carry them into effect, and to carry them into effect in a moment.

A NAVY ADVOCATE.

THE NAVY—No. II.

The "Naval Officer" in his 2d letter, devotes his whole attention to the navy-yards, and begins it with what he calls an undeniable proposition.—"That considering the present state of our navy, of all the yards at this time belonging to the department, none are of real use but the one at Boston." As this is an expensive compliment if it is intended by way of relative utility, I beg leave to reply in answer to its application to New York, that during the year 1815 alone, there has been equipped, repaired, and sent to sea from that yard

- 4 frigates.
- 5 brigs,
- 1 corvette,
- 3 schooners, and 2 store ships,

besides supplies furnished to other vessels. To this should be added the whole of the lake service, together with the general details of duty which are daily occurring. All this has been done with an establishment of officers whose pay has not reached one-half of the amount stated to have been expended at the yard at Norfolk. I admit very willingly that this may be owing to the intelligence and activity of the officer in command, which the naval officer allows may affect the degree of utility of the yards: but such admission only proves the necessity on the part of the Board to make this general; and the same result will be obtained every where. But if, as the naval officer says, the yard at New-York has been more expensive than that at Norfolk, I answer that his error consists in applying to it the pay of the officers belonging to the line of the navy who are ordered to report themselves to the commanding officer of the yard, acting as commanding officer of the station, in order that they may receive full pay. It is well known, however, that their pay is given from the usual appropriation of "pay of the navy," is extraneous to the navy-yard establishments altogether, and that such officers are in no wise necessary to them. If such indulgence is, however, accorded to meritorious officers, because there is no invalid establishment, be it so, by all means. But if bad officers, as is stated, are more favored in that respect, be the blame where it ought; in either case the argument proves nothing against the yards.

I admit with the "Naval Officer" that the yards at Portsmouth, N. H. and at Boston, possess a sufficient depth of water for large vessels; and respecting those at Washington and Philadelphia, I do not care to controvert his opinion so far as it is intended to apply against making them yards for fitting, not building vessels of war. As he has admitted that the one at Washington will answer for that purpose, so, no doubt, will the one at Philadelphia also. Nor will I waste time on his remarks respecting that at Norfolk, as he has given an opinion in favor of one at York: But I hold his recommendation to abandon the yards at Portsmouth, New-York and New Orleans, to be extremely injudicious, and not founded upon a view of the line of our coast, nor that foresight of those emergencies continually incident to a state of war, and against which timely provision ought to be made. If the reader will cast his eye upon the chart of our coast, he will find the following distances, ship's course:

From our Eastern boundary line to	miles
Portsmouth, N. H.	310
From Portsmouth to Boston	54
From Boston to Newport	245
From Newport to New-York	230
From New York to York River	260
From York River to New Orleans	1260

According to the naval officer's ideas, we are to have one dock yard at Boston, one at Newport, and a third at York River. The distance from Boston to Newport is 245 miles, and from Newport to York River 490. Suppose then that we are at war, and balancing with a less disparity of force; than heretofore, the scales of victory. The West Indies would probably be the theatre for deciding the conflict, as the most vulnerable point of our enemy. Or, if we are the weaker party, he will come in search of us, and either attempt to block us up as heretofore, or keeping his fleet in a body, endeavor to intercept our return. Should an action take place in the latitude of Charleston, or further south, or between the Capes of Virginia and Newport, and some of our ships are dismantled and crippled, if the enemy gain any advantage at all in the action, the distance he would have to follow us would be so great, and his knowledge of the few points where our vessels could be repaired, so perfect, that it would be almost a miracle if we escaped falling into his hands. But if to do this, our vessels should run into ports where immediate repairs could not be made, and supplies of spars, guns, shot, gun-carriages, &c. immediately supplied, the effect upon us would be nearly the same as the loss of a battle. Or, if our fleet, or single ships on their return home, find Boston blockaded, they must bear away for Newport; if Newport be blockaded, they must bear away for York, 430 miles distant, be their condition what it may. If they then find the enemy safely moored in Hampton Roads, they must again attempt Boston or Newport, where the same ill fortune may again attend them; for, according to the Naval Officer's plan, there are to be no other ports where they could be repaired or re-equipped. Now, in circumstances like these, if Portsmouth and New York be retained, our vessels would gain two more points and thus nearly double the chances of their escape from the enemy, and of immediate and active hostility. Thus, during the late war, the Congress got into Portsmouth, the Essex into Philadelphia, and the United States and Macedonian into New York.

The objection against the harbor of New-York on account of the difficulty of getting out, unless the wind blows from certain points of the compass, is applicable likewise to Boston and York in Virginia. As to that from the bar, it ought not to be insisted upon, provided the harbor, in other respects, be advantageous, and the place afford facilities for equipments. This it does most fully. Mechanics are at command, every kind of work can be done, all kind of supplies furnished, and the greatest force brought into operation in less time, with more facility and greater effect, than at any other port in the union, provided the yard be placed upon such an establishment as will admit of engraving upon its usual means, any addition required by emergencies. For these reasons, the objection to the bar ought to be waved, and professional men should rather turn their attention to lessen it as much as possible, by improving the model of our ships, or by other expedients, such as they are never at a loss to discover in difficulties. I am very free to say upon this subject, that if objections no stronger than this single one against the harbour of New-York, be admitted as conclusive, and no attempts be made to remove the obstacle by any expedient whatever, that we shall be confined to a very few dock yards indeed, and of course to a very inefficient naval force. But there is another reason for retaining the yard at New York, or establishing one up the North River, which has escaped altogether the observation of the "Naval Officer," and that is, the absolute necessity of one or the other to the operations on the Lakes. It is now perfectly well known that this is the point from which, only, dependence can be placed to conduct operations on Lakes Champlain and Ontario, and it is as good for Lake Erie as Philadelphia. The prodigious exertions made from October 1812, to Feb. 1813, prove, beyond dispute, the immense resources of this place. Had they been less, or had it been necessary to have placed our dependence for supplies upon other places, we had certainly failed, nor would the resources and ability of our government have appeared in that striking light they must now, to Great Britain. When the campaign of 1814 closed, the enemy were in undisputed command of Lake Ontario. They then had afloat one ship of 100 guns, and the keel of another laid. Notwithstanding this advantage, notwithstanding the lateness of the season when our government determined again to contest the command of that Lake, notwithstanding the early closure of the North River by the ice, and notwithstanding the number and variety of obstacles which lay in the way to defeat or extend our operations, yet, when the news of peace reached Sacket's Harbour the middle of February, we were preparing to launch our first ship of the line, which would have been perfectly ready for sea as soon as the ice broke up; a second would have been ready in June; a third in September; and a fourth in November, had it become necessary. I am here told that all this would have been done without a navy yard at New-York, or as well from Newport, I deny both assertions. A navy yard is the depot of all kinds of stores, and badly regulated as the one at New-York has always been, it supplied at that important moment many stores which required time to procure, or to make, but which, from the nature of such establishments, must always be on hand to some considerable extent. As to the second objection, it is equally unfounded; for in conducting operations where immense material is to be transported for long distances, Newport affords no facilities; and unless the operations be commenced at a point where such facilities exist, they never can be created, but at an expence of 125 per cent. additional, besides staking the event of the campaign upon contingencies and casualties, which may very probably defeat it. For illustration, I remark, that in the Lake operations of last winter, we used 2,000 teams in the course of two months and an half, upon a line of 220 miles, which distance the stores were to be transported. Now, had we not been able to throw these stores at some point, where 1000 teams could be at command in one month, the operation would have failed, and all the plans of the government which depended upon it. Schenectady is this point. It is to the state of New-York what Philadelphia is to Pennsylvania. For a century past, it has carried on the business of land-carriage, and of water-carriage by the Mohawk for the fertile and well settled country to the West, and it now affords every advantage we could desire, to conduct with an effect almost instantaneous, any operations on the three Lakes, in contemplation of the government. But the stores must be sent up the North River, and thrown on Albany or near it. Any distance below Albany increases the expence in proportion to the distance, increases the difficulty, and jeopardizes the plan of the campaign. Forego these advantages when we may, by breaking up the yard at New-York, and refusing another on the North River, and I insist upon it, we abandon the lakes to the enemy, and give him entrance into the heart of Vermont, and of New-York, within 70 miles of Albany itself.

Before I close my remarks upon this particular part of the subject, I will present a few ideas as general ones, which any person may apply. Wherever there is a place at which a naval force is to rendezvous, or is stationed, be it ships of the line, frigates, Fultons, or gun-boats, establishments in the nature of navy-yards, become at once matter of necessity. The reason is obvious. Docks to go into, supplies of masts, spars, shot, gun-carriages, &c. ought to be ready at a moment's warning, in case of emergency; for unless this important desideratum be obtained, that is, immediate supplies and repairs, our means of offence or defence will be rendered in efficient, and often useless. A navy yard is the depot for all this, for the preservation of stores when returned from the vessels, and for the vessels themselves when laid up in ordinary. Now, as the city or New-York, the emporium of the commerce of the union, is to draw a great portion of her defence from Fulton, aided occasionally by vessels of war, what is to be done when it becomes necessary in the midst of war, to overhaul their bottoms, to make repairs, and to furnish supplies, unless a yard be continued at that place?

Leaving considerations like these, which I cannot but think must have weight with all who examine fairly their application to the subject, I am led by the course of these remarks to fix the attention of the friends of the navy, upon the dock-yards. They are a branch of the navy department—a part of the civil establishment of the navy, and should receive orders from the navy board alone. Their object is, to serve as depots for every kind of supplies allowed to vessels of war by the regulations of the service: to have dry docks ready for vessels to go into, and workmen at hand to commence and complete repairs as expeditiously as is possible, in short, the object in establishing them, is dispatch, without which all military operations, ever since military operations existed, have been inefficient, disgraceful or ruinous. If this then be their object, and if this object can be obtained in no other way, let any one say what will be the result if we break up those at Erie, Sacket's Harbor, Whitehall, Portsmouth, New-York, Philadelphia, and New-Orleans. If we do, we shall have to commence anew at the beginning of another war—The stores will be lost—the flotilla and ships go to ruin—and, at the very moment when we ought to strike our enemy, we shall again be parrying, as before, with feeble efforts, his well prepared and vigorous assaults. But the proper course, I conceive, is, to continue the minor establishments wherever vessels are laid up, with barely officers and men sufficient to keep them and their stores in a state of preservation and order; and to organize perfectly and encrease the larger yards where the material of the navy is to be made and collected, and whence it may be distributed to different points, as the navy board may direct. It is no time to pull down but to build up; no time to waste, but to preserve every thing: no time to scatter, but to gather. Every officer who has been in command knows that we are very bare of supplies for our navy even upon its present establishment—that it is the work of time to collect supplies, and much more the work of time to organize establishments from their foundation, and make them efficient. Are we at all upon a par with the British preparations and establishments even as they exist at our very doors? They are fortifying Isle-aux-Noix, to give them entrance, if possible, into Lake Champlain, and make it Cádiz to the state of New-York. The naval depot at Kingston is made the seat of government of the province. Their vessels of war have again appeared on lake Erie, though annihilated once by the gallant Perry. The Floridas are ceded to them. They issue from Halifax in the north with their fleets, scour our coasts from one end to the other, and blockade our ports at pleasure. If crippled in a gale, they refit in Kingston or Bermuda. With all these facts staring us in the face of preparations for another conflict, and of the powerful means of our enemy at his command, to the north and to the south, and on every side of us, to abandon all we have done during the late war—is to abandon experience already too dearly bought to this nation.

As much of the reasoning by which I have established the necessity of continuing the yard at New-York, or establishing one up the North river, and much of the general reasoning throughout, has relation to the lake service, I will make a few more remarks upon that subject. I am well aware that some persons are of opinion that the lakes should be abandoned altogether. That point, however, let the president of the United States decide. Others are of opinion that by establishing ourselves upon the banks of the St. Lawrence with a strong body of troops, we cut the communication by the only route used between the upper and lower provinces of Canada, and that the upper would fall of course. To this I reply, that the time is gone when that project was a good one. Does any man seriously believe, that during the interval between the late war and the next, that the British will stand still and make no preparations for a plan on our part so obvious? If we do believe so, we deceive ourselves. New roads through the interior will be opened from as low down as Quebec, no doubt, to communicate with the route by the Utawas from Montreal to join lake Huron; and even if peace continues but two years, supplies of every kind will be sent to the upper lakes to enable them to stand a siege with us at any future time. This is the constant practice of the British; they are now acting upon it, and we may be assured that if we neglect our naval force on these waters, and let every thing go to ruin, we shall inevitably have the extensive frontier of Vermont, New York, Pennsylvania, and the Michigan territory, again at their mercy, and that of their allies, during the two first years of another war.

A NAVY ADVOCATE.

Naval Affairs.

Our old correspondent has again presented us with an important letter on the subject of naval establishments, particularly those on the lakes. The curious policy of Great Britain during our late war with her, in drawing our attention from the Atlantic to the lakes, so far as regarded the operations of our gallant navy, is here distinctly and satisfactorily developed. Her commerce was only vulnerable upon the high seas, and from the devastation that had already been committed upon it, she was extremely desirous soon after the commencement of the war of removing our brave tars to a scene of action, where they could not molest that commerce, nor capture the ships of her national marine. How well she succeeded in these arch designs, will be best understood from the language of our correspondent.

A fourth interesting letter from an officer of the United States' navy, to his friend, a member of congress, dated at

NEW-YORK, DEC. 8th, 1815.

DEAR SIR—Having adjusted a few indispensable matters at this place, I shall now sit down to answer as definitely and briefly as the nature of the subject will permit, the several inquiries contained in your letter of the 29th ult. relative to the naval establishments of the United States.

I shall begin with those upon the lakes, and interweave with my remarks upon them as I pass along, some observations in illustration of the effect which a naval war in that quarter will be likely to have upon our navy proper, or oceanic force; at the same time requesting you to bear in mind, that in touching upon this subject, I must be excused from an investigation of the means most proper for conducting a system of warfare upon the Canadian frontiers. From what has already occurred, I draw my conclusions in regard to the future. It is a fact well known to all who have paid the slightest attention to the progress and termination of the late war, that upon the cessation of hostilities most of our national ships were dismantled upon the Atlantic coast, and that by building and capturing we had acquired three powerful fleets upon the lakes. By the capture of a fleet upon two of these waters, we from that moment necessarily rendered our own entirely useless as a weapon of warfare, as neither of them could by any human efforts be removed to a scene of new exertion; and from those which did not signalize themselves by a decisive victory, we derived no advantage at all. The constant augmentations of the enemy occasioned the necessity of adopting similar measures on our part; and, by carefully avoiding an action, as well on account of fear as of policy, he obtained the principal object of his skilful management—the use of the lakes, and detention of our seamen from the Atlantic. On these inland seas he had no commerce for us to injure; he encouraged us in the extravagant plan of building annually, to place ourselves on an equal footing with him, and it was not until we had nearly completed two of the largest ships in the world, and foregone the incalculable benefits of almost all our Atlantic ships, by sending their brave crews to the lakes, in addition to the exhaustion of our navy yards and arsenals of their maritime and military material, and the expenditure of millions, that we discovered his policy. At the commencement of the war, the Atlantic was daily blazing with the captured wrecks of the enemy, and the flag of the United States was invariably to be seen in our harbors waving triumphantly over the British. In many instances, the prizes taken from the enemy were re-equipped, and sailed again under other auspices in pursuit of the enemy's commerce. Some of our ships penetrated even into the British channel, and the havoc made there under the very eyes of the enemy by the Argus brig, affords a distinguished proof of the aggregate millions that were burnt and sunk, never to be recovered. Some of them cruised along the coasts of Scotland, Ireland, and the remote northern regions of Europe—others hovered upon the shores of France, Spain, Portugal, Africa, and the Brazils—while our proud banner floated upon the north and south Pacific oceans. An extraordinary number of ships were appointed by the enemy to protect his convoys—a no less extraordinary number were sent in squadrons, to pursue our single ships—and in every sea a powerful force was stationed to guard against the effects of our enterprize. In this state, the affairs of the enemy were an alarming aspect: the spirit of his mercantile pursuits was broken down, and his traders, both foreign and coasting, became totally heartless. The navy of the United States increased rapidly in numerical force and in renown, and England, being now reduced to the necessity of acting on the defensive, could spare no force to blockade our harbors; the consequence was, that the few ships she had upon our coast hovered together in squadrons for mutual protection, whilst ours sailed in and out at pleasure. The charm of British invincibility was dispelled by Hull—"Britannia rules the waves" became an obsolete drinking song—and an order was issued by the lords of the admiralty, that no British frigate should singly engage a frigate of the United States. These, sir, were the most glorious days of our navy—these were the trophies its valor had won—and my cheeks still glow with exultation when I think from what a towering height we degraded the naval fame of Great Britain. The nation, too, justly rejoiced in these achievements of its tars; and though general Hull surrendered and the attempt upon Canada failed, the victories over the Queenie and Macedonian more than compensated for the mortification of these events.

But now affairs took a different turn. The strength of the Canadas was made known, and our own weakness exposed, by the operations of general Hull; and although it was obviously impossible for the enemy to blockade all our ports, and effectually to protect his extended commerce from the depredations of our cruisers, yet these wholesome facts were totally overlooked, and the groundless fears which were entertained for the safety of our ships on the high seas, and the hopes of an immediate conquest of Canada, induced the government to fix its attention upon the lakes. Almost the same views entered into the policy of the enemy in regard to us, having now rendered the war on our frontiers defensive. From what experience had already taught him, he was in just dread of our navy proper; and, being aware of the impracticability, as well of preventing its departure from the ports of the United States, as of effectually securing his own commerce against it, he set himself to work in devising some scheme to counteract its future exertions. Accordingly, a few superfluous officers and men were sent out to build a ship at Kingston; and, as a matter of policy towards acquiring the superiority on the lake—we did the same at Sackett's Harbor. To man this vessel, a ship was laid up in one of the Atlantic ports, and the enemy had thus the satisfaction to see his scheme partly carried into effect. He then built another, and again had the pleasure to see us follow his example, and to bring another brave crew from their proper theatre of action to where they could do him no harm. In proportion to the success of this scheme his operations were enlarged, and in fact, the contest became apparently no longer that of the sword, but of the purse and axe. Fleets succeeded to single ships—our navy yards were drained of stores, guns, and other military articles, to be transported across the country from the most distant parts for the service of the lakes—and thus, by a steady and persevering sagacity, (although two entire fleets was captured by us) England succeeded in causing to disappear from the ocean, a navy which she had boasted to destroy in three months. True, our victories upon the lakes Erie and Champlain, were brilliant in the extreme, notwithstanding their effect was attempted to be weakened by England, in facetiously denominating them victories over a "provincial" marine. It was enough for her, however, that we were left to wage war with the Canadas, and that our Atlantic ports, in consequence of the dismantling of our ships and the employment of their crews upon the lakes, could be easily and effectually blockaded by single small craft. It is not yet forgotten, that a few ships carrying a parcel of mercenaries entered the Chesapeake bay, and with scarcely any resistance, excepting the severe defeat they met with at Baltimore, ravaged its defenceless shores. Nor will it soon be forgotten that two frigates and some smaller vessels sacked Alexandria—that the communication by water between Baltimore and Philadelphia was virtually cut off by a single frigate—that a trifling force blockaded the harbors of New-York, Long Island Sound, New-Port, the Vineyard, Boston bay, &c. and that a few contemptible vessels of inferior force, commanded the ports of North and South Carolina, Georgia and Louisiana.

When the news of peace reached this country, we had barely one frigate and two sloops navigat-the seas!—And yet in the capture of the British ships Cyane, Lexant and Penguin, by this frigate and one of the sloops, and the destruction caused to the enemy's East Indian commerce by the other, more was done to the injury and humiliation of England, than all that had been effected in this way, during the whole war, by the several ships that were merely launched and moored at Sackett's Harbor. When the fleets of Ontario, and Champlain were dismantled last spring, upon the conclusion of hostilities, we had more than a sufficiency of officers and men to man the largest fleet that ever crossed the Atlantic under the American flag: and this powerful fleet had been rendered totally useless to us during the greater part of the war, by the ingenious device of the enemy in drawing their crews from the Atlantic to the lakes. We, who in every thing else outwitted the enemy, could not in this instance discern his object, until a monument was erected to our want of penetration by the creation of a fresh water fleet at Sackett's Harbor, nearly equal in force to the effective navy of Great Britain. Sir George Prevost had long boasted, that, if the war continued, he would blockade the whole American navy in the lakes of Canada; and Sir George had the satisfaction to see this boast fully verified. Even at this day, England is still employed in preparing for a future naval contest upon the lakes. We are told by a recent writer that her agents "are fortifying Isle au Noix to give them an entrance, if possible, into lake Champlain," and that "the naval depot at Kingston is made the seat of government of the province." Having succeeded in one deep experiment—it rests with us whether she shall hereafter succeed in another.

These remarks, in some measure, grow out of your enquiry respecting the utility of the navy yard at New-York. If that yard has rendered any facilities toward the equipment of the lake fleets, I do not by any means consider that fact as a proof of its importance, under present circumstances, to the navy of the United States. I deny, however, that it has been of any service to the equipment of the lake fleets, except as a depot for the public stores; and for this especial purpose Albany is universally allowed to be preferable. Yet, surely, no one will maintain, that because it possesses this single advantage, Albany is a fit place for the establishment of a navy yard upon a proper scale. But, admitting for a moment, that New-York possessed the advantages suggested in your letter, it does not follow that Newport is the less to be preferred; more especially as an extensive naval establishment at the latter place, by giving complete protection to the navigation of Long-Island Sound, would render the transportation of stores from thence to Albany as easy as from New-York. With regard to New-Orleans, it would certainly be advisable to keep a small depot of stores there for the use of the flotilla on that station; but an extensive naval establishment, such as our navy now requires, I conceive to be altogether unnecessary; as no vessel, drawing more than fourteen feet of water, can enter the mouth of the Mississippi. Nor do I know of a single spot between the Chesapeake bay and New-Orleans, except Pensacola, possessing a sufficient depth of water for the admission of ships of the line. At a future day, perhaps, when our navy has acquired a great magnitude, it will be very expedient to have a station for the accommodation of the largest ships somewhere south of the Chesapeake; and, in that case, I presume there will be no hesitation in occupying Pensacola for that purpose. From this point, indeed, a more effectual protection could be given to Louisiana, and a greater annoyance directed against the enemy's West-India Islands. At the same time, it would have the unavoidable effect of rendering the establishment at New-Orleans entirely useless.

Before I close this letter, I cannot avoid remarking how much I was amused a few days since, by reading an essay in the New-York "Columbian," purporting to be a reply to some of my former letters, and signed by "a Navy Advocate." I was amused to see a writer, apparently possessing considerable talents, endeavoring to handle a subject about which he evidently knows so little, and very gravely measuring along our coast, to prove that, in locating the yards, I had not made an equal division. In my opinion, he seems to rest the whole force of his argument upon the propriety of hiding ourselves from the enemy, rather than manfully meeting him; for he beats about from place to place, unable to find shelter and security from a pursuing foe, inasmuch as I did not recommend the establishment of yards at Portsmouth, N. H. New-York and Philadelphia. But admitting the establishment of proper yards at these places, let me ask this writer, whether these could ensure greater benefits to our navy than such as I would recommend at Boston, Newport and Yorktown? You may judge, however, of the nature of his arguments, when I assure you, that the principal ground upon which he relies for awarding the preference to Portsmouth, N. H. New-York and Philadelphia, is, that during the late war, the Congress got into Portsmouth, the Essex into Philadelphia, and the United States and Macedonian into New-York!—I notice this singular logician only, because he has taken the pains to notice me, and, as he no doubt expects an answer to the above weighty argument, it is my duty to reply, that these frigates could have entered the said ports equally as well had there been no yards established at them, and, in all probability, could have been equally as well accommodated with whatever they required. He seems to think, that unless the United States have three or four brick ware-houses and half a dozen of decayed hulks at the Wallabout, with an adequate number of officers and men to take charge of them, they cannot possibly buy a bolt of canvas, a pound of powder, or a barrel of pitch from the New-York merchants for the service of the lakes. Nevertheless, I am inclined to believe, that were there not the least trace of a yard at the Wallabout, it would be one of the easiest things in the world for the board of navy commissioners, when occasion required, to send an agent direct into New-York, and purchase as many thousand dollars' worth of naval stores as they might wish, either for the service of the lakes, or any other service. And I will even go so far as to say, that I firmly believe the stores would not be a whit the worse for not having passed through the brick stores at the Wallabout. Then again, the "navy advocate" is of opinion, that, instead of building our frigates and seventy-fours in a manner best calculated to ensure their fast-sailing, strength, beauty and durability, they should be built with a view to suit the bar across the harbor of New-York. "For these reasons," says he, "the objection to the bar ought to be waved, and professional men should rather turn their attention to lessen it as much as possible, by improving the model of our ships, or by other expedients, such as they are never at a loss to discover in difficulties."—He insists also, that "in conducting operations, where immense materials are to be transported for long distances, Newport affords no facilities." Here, again, I am under the necessity of entering my dissent—for to me it appears just as feasible to transport "immense materials" from Newport to Albany, by way of Long-Island Sound and the North river, as from the Wallabout or the city of New-York. If it should ever again be deemed expedient to lay up our Atlantic ships and conduct a naval war upon the lakes, there are but few stores which the lake fleets would require that the city of New-York does not lay at our feet, independent of the naval depot at the Wallabout; and such as it did not afford, might be easily brought from Newport.

If this writer is desirous of shewing his ingenuity to advantage, I would advise him to turn the whole of his attention to the lake fleets, (as he appears to be more interested for these than any other) and, amongst other judicious plans, to devise some method of removing them into the Atlantic, where they might be of use to us. The task, indeed, would be not more difficult than the one he has undertaken, for I should as soon expect to see the New-Orleans and the Chippewa brought into the Atlantic, as the objections against the bar at Sandy-Hook definitively removed.

I am, your obedient.

SEQUEL OF COM. PORTER'S EXPEDITION IN THE SOUTH SEA.

We are indebted to the politeness of one of the officers of the government for a copy of the following letter, addressed by captain GAMBLE (of the marines) to commodore PORTER, on the return of the former to the United States, in August last. Capt. Gamble (the reader will recollect) was left by commodore Porter with a few men, in charge of two or three vessels and public property, when he sailed from Madison Island for Valparaiso, previous to his ever-memorable battle in the Essex. The following letter comprizes all the subsequent occurrences:

Copy of a letter from captain Gamble to com. Porter.

NEW-YORK, August 30, 1815.

SIR—With regret I have to inform you, the frigate had not got clear of the Marqueses before we discovered in the natives a hostile disposition towards us, who in a few days became so insolent, that I found it absolutely necessary, not only for the security of the ships and property on shore, but for our personal safety, to land my men and regain by force of arms the many things they had, in the most daring manner, stolen from the encampment; and what was of still greater importance, to prevent, if possible, their putting threats into execution which might have been attended with the most serious consequences on our part, from duty requiring my men to be much separated.

I, however, had the satisfaction to accomplish my wish without firing a musket, and from that time lived in the most perfect amity with them, until the 7th of May following, when my distressed situation placed me in their power.

Before mentioning the lamentable events of that day, I shall give you a brief account of a few preceding occurrences, which were the sources of great uneasiness to me. The first was the death of John Vetter (marine) who was unfortunately drowned in the surf, on the afternoon of the 28th of February, and the desertion of four of my men. They took the advantage of a dark night, and left the bay unobserved by any person; all, excepting one, (a prisoner) having the watch on deck. They took with them several muskets, a supply of ammunition, and many articles of but little value. My attempt to pursue them was prevented by their destroying partially the only boat (near the beach) at that time sea-worthy.

On the 12th of April, began to rig the ships Seringapatam and Sir Andrew Hammond, which, as I calculated, employed the men until the 1st of May. All hands were then engaged in getting the remainder of the property from the Greenwich to the Seringapatam, as I began to despair of your rejoining me in that place.

The work went on well, and the men were obedient to my orders, though I discovered an evident change in their countenances, which led me to suppose there was something wrong in agitation, and under that impression, had all the muskets, ammunition, and small arms of every description, taken to the Greenwich (the ship I lived on board of) from the other ships, as a necessary precaution against a surprise from my own men.

On the 7th of May, while on board the Seringapatam, on duty which required my being present, a mutiny took place, in which I was wounded, and the mutineers succeeded in getting the Seringapatam out of the bay—two days after, when making the necessary preparations to depart for Valparaiso, we were attacked by the savages, and I have, with the deepest regret, to inform you, sir, midshipman Wm. Felters, John Thomas, Thomas Gibbs and William Burdine were massacred, and Peter Coddington (marine) dangerously wounded. After bending the jib and spanker, we cut our moorings, and fortunately had a light breeze that carried the ship clear of the bay, with six cartridges remaining out of the only barrel left us by the mutineers.

After getting out of the bay, we found our situation most distressing. In attempting to run the boat up, it broke in two parts, and we were compelled to cut away from the bows the only anchor, not being able to cat it. We mustered altogether eight souls, out of which there was one cripple, one dangerously wounded, one sick, one just recovering from the scurvy, and myself confined to the bed with a high fever, produced by my wound.

In that state, destitute of charts, and almost of every means of navigating the ship, I reached the Sandwich Island, after a passage of seventeen days, and suffering much from fatigue and hardships. I was there unfortunately captured by the English ship Cherub, remained a prisoner on board of her seven months, during which time my men were treated in a most shameful manner. We were then put on shore at Rio de Janeiro, without the possibility of getting away until after hearing of the peace. I then, by the advice of the physician who attended me, embarked on board a Swedish ship bound to Havre de Grace, (there being no other means of my getting away at that time) leaving behind acting midshipman Clapp and five men, having lost one, soon after my arrival in that place, with the small-pox.

On the 1st instant, in lat. 47° N. long. 18° W. we fell in with the American ship Oliver Ellsworth, from Havre, bound to this port. I took a passage on board of her, and arrived here two days since, after being upwards of an hundred days at sea. I am at present unable to travel, and shall therefore await either your orders, or the orders of the commandant of the marine corps at this place.

I have the honor to remain,

With the highest respect and esteem,

Sir, your obedient servant,

JOHN M. GAMBLE.
